DR. ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL TAIT, the late Primate of the Episcopal Church of England (whose portrait appears in the left-hand corner of the upper portion of the frontispiece), was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, on December 22d, 1811, and died at his residence at Addington Park, on December 3d, 1882, in the seventy-first year of his age. He was the youngest son of the late Mr. Craufurd Tait, of Harviestoun, in the county of Clackmannan, who was Writer to the Scotch Signet. His mother was Susan, daughter of the late Sir Islay Campbell, who was for some time Lord President of the Court of Session of Scotland.

EDUCATION AT GLASGOW AND OXFORD.

Like most of the sons of the gentry of Scotland, he received his education in "Modern Athens," at the famous Edinburgh Academy, and subsequently at the High School, where he showed an aptitude for study beyond the majority of his fellow-pupils. In the year 1827 he entered the University of Glasgow, and by close application gained, in 1830, an exhibition scholarship, which enabled him to gain admission to Balliol College, Oxford.

A story is told on the authority of the late Dean Stanley of Westminster that when young Tait first went up to Balliol and called on Dr. Jenkyns, at that time Master of the College, the Master said to him, "Well, Mr. Tait, what have you come to Oxford for?" "To improve myself, sir, and to make friends," was the reply of the future Archbishop of Canterbury. The answer was prophetic, for Tait's career at Oxford was a brilliant one, and many of his Oxford friendships lasted throughout his life, and retained a singular warmth of affectionate cordiality on both sides.

BRILLIANT ACADEMICAL DISTINCTIONS.

The Glasgow career of Mr. Tait had been of a very unusual kind, remarkable for its great industry, and the great success with which that industry was rewarded. His Oxford course was equally splendid. He became "scholar" of Balliol, graduated "Frst Class" in honors in 1833, and in due course became Fellow, College tutor, and public examiner. He took his M.A. degree in 1836. He also for some time became a member of a third university, that of Bonn, on the Rhine. During his residence at Oxford, Mr. Tait was one of the most prominent members of that historically famous institution, the "Oxford Union Society," where, in common with many illustrious statesmen, he gained a clear, accurate, forcible debating style, which ever afterward characterized him on the platform and in Parliament.

ORDINATION AND CURACY.

In 1836, and when he was twenty-five years old, Mr. Tait was ordained deacon by the Bishop of Oxford, and priest in 1838. For a time he discharged the duties of the curacy of Baldon, near Oxford, but about this time Sir Daniel Sandford, the learned and eloquent professor of Greek at Glasgow, died, and Mr. Tait, who had been one of his favorite pupils became a candidate for the chair. However, there was a legal difficulty in a clergyman of the Episcopal Church holding a professorship in a Scotch University, and so Glasgow lost the services of Mr. Tait, who, in the Providence of God, was to employ himself in a different way.

When the notorious "Tracts for the Times" threw all Oxford, and the whole country, into commotion, and excited apprehension that many eminent clergymen were abandoning evangelical Christianity, and bending their steps toward the bondage of Rome, Mr. Tait entered fearlessly into the conflict. In 1841 he was one of the "four Oxford tutors" who drew the attention of the university to the famous "Tract 90," and procured the summary condemnation of its doctrines.

HEAD MASTER OF RUGBY SCHOOL.

In June 1842, the sudden death of the great Dr. Arnold caused a vacancy in the Head Mastership of Rugby School, and Mr. Tait was selected as his successor against a very formidable field of competitors. During the seven years he continued in this important post, the selection was fully justified by its results. A list of his pupils at Rugby would include many eminent names; among them may be mentioned the present Earl of Derby and M. Waddington, formerly Prime Minister of France, who entered at Rugby in 1841. To follow a master so efficient and so beloved as Thomas Arnold was itself no easy task; but to have succeeded as Dr. Tait did in the management of Rugby School was a sufficient proof of his possession of that practical wisdom, and those elements of personal popularity, which justified his subsequent advancement to still higher posts.

MARRIAGE.

Mr. Tait had not been settled long in Warwickshire before he was introduced at Elmdon Parsonage to the family of the late venerable Archdeacon Spooner, and became attached to Catherine, the Archdeacon's daughter, who was a cousin of Bishop Wilberforce. The marriage took place in the summer of 1843, and the union was one of singular happiness. Until her decease on December 2d, 1878, Mrs. Tait cordially entered into the arduous duties of her husband with zeal, and engaged in a multitude of good works for the poor and ignorant with indefatigable energy.

UNREMITTING INDUSTRY.

Dr. Tait was always in the school before the first stroke of the clock at seven, not to leave it again, except for refreshments, before the day's work was done, and then in the evening some of the boys were entertained by the Head Master and his wife, so that they both might become acquainted with them all. The holidays were also utilized in visits to the poor of the neighborhood, or other useful occupations, and even the summer vacations were but preparations for the work of the ensuing term, Dr. Tait visiting the scenes of classic history that he might communicate to the boys of the sixth form the results of his tour. But his hard and unintermitting work began to tell seriously upon his health, and, in February 1848, he was seized with a dangerous attack of rheumatic fever, from the effects of which he never entirely recovered.

APPOINTED DEAN OF CARLISLE.

Dr. Tait resumed his labors at Rugby after Easter, but in the course of the year 1849, the Deanery of Carlisle becoming vacant, it was offered to him, and was gratefully accepted. The parting from Rugby took place with many manifestations of affection and honor. The Head Master took his leave of the school by publishing a volume of sermons which he had preached in the chapel, entitled "Lessons for School Life."

HIS INFLUENCE UPON THE NEIGHBORHOOD.

Whatever a deanery may be to some deans, it was certainly no sinecure to the new Dean of Carlisle. His successor, Dr. Close, afterward declared that he found it hard work to keep pace with all that Dr. Tait did in Carlisle. It is no exaggeration to say that the advent of Dean Tait and his wife changed entirely the life of the Carlisle folk. Hitherto the Dean had attended to his own duties, such as they were, often in the most perfunctory manner, but taking little heed of the vice and misery which a garrison is apt to spread around its neighborhood. This was soon changed, for the new Dean wished for no post of indolent retirement. An additional pulpit service was originated on Sundays in the Cathedral, and generally conducted by himself, while the poor were systematically visited and the young and ignorant were instructed. The poor neighbors of the Dean were encouraged to come to the Deanery to make known their spiritual and temporal necessities; while for the benefit of the adult members of the community a night-school was established. A dean's chief ostensible duty lies wi[th] the fabric of his cathedral, and during Dr. T[ait's] residence $75,000 was spent in restoring the [ancient] pile.

DEATH BY FEVER OF FIVE DA[UGHT]ERS.

From six to seven years of quiet [in] Carlisle, filled with Christian labor, glided pe[ace]fully away, four daughters, born in Septemb[er] 1850, June 1852 August 1854, and Februa[ry] 1856, respectively, having been added to their family, making, with those previously born, seven children, the eldest of whom was at the time to which we now refer but ten years of age. It was in the early spring of 1856 that it pleased the Lord to visit Dr. Tait with almost overwhelming sorrow, for in six weeks five of his young daughters were taken from him by scarlet fever, leaving him but his only son—a boy of seven—and an infant but a few weeks old. One after another the five children were laid low, upon one after another the devouring fever worked its will—all the more to be deplored as it was feared that the fever had been communicated to the children through their parents, brought by them from some sick-bed where they had been to comfort the living and tend the dying—and one after another their bodies were laid to rest within sight of the old Cathedral, and near the quiet waters of the Eden.

THE BISHOPRIC OF LONDON.

In September 1856, Dr. Tait was appointed Bishop of London, in succession to Dr. Blomfield, who, from increasing age, had resigned the See. The career of the new Bishop, during the twelve laborious years in which he administered England's greatest Diocese, fully justified the exceptional interest displayed when he was introduced to office. His first act gave assurance of his broad and all-embracing charity. By joining the British and Foreign Bible Society, he acknowledged the great truth that all evangelical denominations are brethren in Christ, and all denominational differences should be merged in the great work indicated by the original command—that of "preaching the Gospel" by placing the Scriptures within the reach of all men.

Among the enterprises commenced by the new Bishop were: Week-day evening discourses to East End weavers who were asked to "come in their working clothes," addresses to London omnibus-drivers and cabmen in an Islington stable-yard, and open-air sermons in Covent Garden Market.

MRS. TAIT'S GARDEN PARTIES.

The episcopal duties of hospitality were not forgotten amid the sterner occupations of the See of London. Mrs. Tait, who shared and seconded all her husband's labors as only a woman can—was indefatigable in her efforts to promote a kindly social intercourse between the Bishop and his clergy. Her garden-parties at Fulham, at which the clergy of the whole diocese were wont to assemble, were made by her the pleasantest and not the least valuable characteristics of Dr. Tait's episcopate.

THE STORY OF THE AFRICAN EMU

which was sent to the Bishop from Australia is perhaps well known, but it is good enough to bear repetition. At one of these pleasant gatherings, says Mr. Benham, the emu was turned out into the meadows to be inspected by the guests; but the cows resented the intrusion and gave chase to the unfortunate bird. "Halloa!" exclaimed Mr. Milman excitedly, "there goes Colenso, and the bishops after him."

Of these garden-parties, the late Archbishop has said: "Persons who had never met elsewhere met on the Fulham lawn as common ground. There was always a large infusion of the clerical element, and men and women, tired with the routine of London gayeties, were not sorry to spend a quiet Saturday afternoon in that peaceful garden, a place full of old associations, and there to meet clergy, statesmen, literary men, and most of laborers in the various works of charity in which my wife delighted. One element was never wanting—a large concourse of joyous children who came to romp on the lawn, and ride the two or three old ponies which Mrs. Tait always caused to be trotted out for their amusement." (A picture of one

BISHOP TAIT IN A STORM.

The illustrative panel on the right-hand side of our frontispiece presents an episode which occurred in the autumn of 1864. Dr. Tait and his family were then at Lochgilphead, Scotland, at the residence of Bishop Ewing. The following is the late Archbishop's description of the circumstances: "On Tuesday, August 30th, by special invitation of the lieutenant commanding, H.M. steamship on this station, we went to Arran. We had a good day; and then, as it got dark, and set in unfortunately for a rainy night, we all sat together talking pleasantly under canvas, and scarcely noticed how dark and very wet it had become. The clock struck, or rather the bell rang, eight. In a moment a cry, 'Breakers ahead!' 'Stop her!' 'Back her!' then three tremendous bumps under our feet—a horrid scraping noise; the vessel was fast on the rocks, and to all appearance, if she ever got off them, would either swing over or would go down, from the hole which we could not doubt was drilled in her bottom. 'All hands astern!' a frightful rushing of seamen and marines. Some of them, half-dressed, turned out of the berths into which they had just turned in. The darkness was intense, but breakers and land within a hundred yards were dimly visible

LANDING THE PASSENGERS.

"Every one behaved beautifully. The ladies were as composed as possible. We then had a little prayer together; but in two minutes the captain had made up his mind: 'Lower the boats; ladies and passengers on shore.' The landing was not very easy. The sea was running very high; the boat could not come within some yards of the rocky beach. A sailor, who was incautious enough to insist on taking Catherine (Mrs. Tait) on his back, came down like a shot in the water, and she waded from the boat. But, providentially, some time before half-past eight, we found ourselves on land, without any accident."

MADE ARCHBISHOP.

In 1868 Archbishop Longley died, and the Bishop of London was appointed his successor. In 1862 he had been offered the Archbishopric of York, and had declined it by the advice of his wife. "This," says the Archbishop himself, "was before the organization of the Bishop of London's Fund, and at that time I was in more vigorous health, and much work in London to which my strength was equal seemed to lie before me. The offer of the Archbishopric of Canterbury presented none of the difficulty which must have attended a migration from London to York." The offer was made by Mr. Disraeli during his first tenure of the Premiership, and the selection did great credit to his sagacity and freedom from party ties in the exercise of ecclesiastical patronage.

ERECTION OF ST. PETER'S ORPHANAGE.

One of the first works of the new Archbishop, aided by his noble-hearted wife, was the erection of St. Peter's Orphanage in the Isle of Thanet, where he had purchased a country residence. For a fortnight before the laying of the foundation stone, on December 22d, 1869, he had been seized with a dangerous illness, and for days lay at death's door. He had returned home from the transaction of some business in London, and retired to rest, and rose the next morning as fresh as usual, but while dressing he fell prostrate and unconscious on the floor. Gradually his strength returned, and he was able to view from one of the windows of the house the laying of the foundation-stone by Mrs. Tait.

DEATH OF HIS SON AND WIFE.

On May 29th, 1878, Craufurd Tait, the son of the Archbishop, died. On December 2d, Mrs. Tait went to rejoin her loved ones who had gone before, only surviving her beloved son six months and three days. Surely sorrows fell heavily upon the venerable Primate, and well might Dean Close, his successor at Carlisle, write to him, "Your heavenly Father must love you very much, or He would not chastise you so sorely, opening the tender wounds again and again."

FAILURE OF HEALTH.

From this crowning sorrow the Archbishop never recovered. He accepted his affliction with resignation and with that true humility which ever distinguished him. Last year he suffered from overwork, and the depressing effects of the fog-laden atmosphere of London. He accordingly sought in the spring of the year for ozone and sunlight on the shores of the Mediterranean, but returned to England shortly after Easter somewhat better for the change, in time to officiate at the marriage of Prince Leopold. He again devoted himself, without thought to his own weakness, to the duties of his office, until on August 18th last, he was again seized with illness and a fatal termination was then feared. He, however, sufficiently recovered from that grave attack to lead his friends to hope for his recovery.

HIS LAST SERVICE FOR THE QUEEN.

In the early part of August he had received the command of the Queen to attend at Osborne for the purpose of performing the ceremony of the confirmation of the Princes Albert Victor and George, the sons of the Prince of Wales. He was then strongly advised to excuse himself on account of the state of his health, but he declared, "It is the last thing I shall do for the Queen, and I mean to do it." He accordingly went, and in the course of the journey caught a severe cold. This was followed by an attack of bronchitis, which afterward developed into more serious disorders, and finally led to his fatal illness.

DYING WORDS.

The story of the few final days of Dr. Tait's illness is not one of severe suffering; it seemed at last rather that the sands of life had run out than as if death were the result of absolute disease. On Thursday night, November 30th, he said he thought he was dying, and, as he became colder, the doctor once or twice found the pulse cease. All the family were summoned to the bedside, but the pulse revived and the Archbishop, though in a state of great prostration, was able to talk, and took leave of his children. They were all round him, and prayer was offered.

On Friday, December 1st, he suffered much. While this state continued, the Archbishop said, "If this is death, it is not so bad." In reply to kindly questions as to the pain, the reply was, "Oh, it is not pain," and then he added, "Oh, my God, I am happy." Now and again he quietly exclaimed "Oh! when shall I be at rest? God relieve me and let me go." When he realized that he was dying, he inquired, "What day is it?" Some one answered, "The 1st of December." He then remarked, "The very day poor Catherine died; we shall soon meet." It is, however, noteworthy as evidence of something more than a coincidence of dates that he never looked on the anniversary of her death as the 1st of December, but as Advent Sunday, the very day on which he himself passed away.

DEATH AND INTERMENT.

On Saturday, December 2d, the Archbishop fell into a state of semi-sleep, rousing now and then, apparently knowing everything that was going on around him, but unable to speak. There was no great change until seven o'clock on Sunday morning, when he fell asleep, his breathing becoming slower and slower, until about a quarter past seven, when he drew his last breath and died without any suffering. All the members of the family were present when the end came, including his three surviving daughters, two of them unmarried, and his elder sister Charlotte, now in her 82d year, and by whom (his mother having died soon after his birth) the Archbishop is stated to have been brought up. His family declined the proffered honor of his interment in Westminster Abbey, and, according to his own wish, he was buried at Addington on December 8th, where the dust of his wife and son lie awaiting the resurrection of the just.

THE LATE REV. CRAUFURD TAIT.

CRAUFURD TAIT, the third child and only son of Archbishop and Mrs. Tait, was born at Rugby School, of which his father was head master, on June 22d, 1849, and at the time of his death at Stonehouse, on May 29th, 1878, he was in the twenty-ninth year of his age. Nothing could exceed in tenderness the affectionate friendship which characterized the mother and son. He was about five years old when his five sisters died of scarlet fever, the boy's conviction that his little playfellows were gone to be with Christ, and that there was a place prepared for him with them, became the very education of his life, and developed, with God's blessing, into a faithful and gracious manhood.

SCHOOL AND UNIVERSITY CAREER.

On January 21st, 1858, it was deemed advisable to send him to school, at Blackheath, where he remained for nearly four years. In September 1862, at the age of thirteen, he became a pupil at the great public school at Eton. In 1869 he entered as a student at Christ Church, Oxford. While there he shunned all approach to dissipation and frivolity, and sought chiefly the society of those whom he could respect for their moral and intellectual character. In July, 1872, he took his B.A. degree, and was placed by the examiners in the first class of the Law and History school.

JOURNEY TO THE EAST.

On November 19th, 1872, he left England for the East with his future brother-in-law, and at Alexandria he was joined by three other college friends. He was absent for more than seven months, and visited Egypt, the Nile, the Desert of Sinai, Petra, Jerusalem, the land of Moab, Lebanon, Damascus, Athens, Constantinople, and the Danube.

ORDINATION AND CURACIES.

In 1874 he was ordained by the Bishop of Dover, and at once entered on his work as a curate at Saltwood, under the Rev. Canon Knollys. He aiso accepted the charge of a poor district in the town of Hythe, containing 900 persons. "Not nine of them, I suppose, have ever been to church," he wrote, "so I shall have lots to do. I hope, by having mission services among them, to get hold of them gradually."

After fourteen months' successful work at Saltwood, he returned home; and in 1875 his father ordained him Priest at Croydon parish Church, and he accepted a curacy for a few months in one of the poorest of the London parishes, his object being to see something of London work under a good worker. But in the summer of the same year it was deemed advisable for him to settle as domestic chaplain to his father at Lambeth and Addington.

VISIT TO THE UNITED STATES.

His health requiring a complete change, he determined to carry into effect a long cherished plan of visiting America, and sailed for New York on July 17th, 1877, where he landed on August 1st. In the month of October he delivered his father's greetings to the American House of Bishops, at their General Convention at Boston. Dr. H. C. Potter, of New York, thus wrote of the event: "As secretary, it was my office to arrange for his reception. Those who witnessed the scene will not soon forget it. It is doubtful if, in all its history, the House had ever been addressed by one so young. Indeed, the contrast between the venerable presiding Bishop, bent with the weight of more than fourscore years, and the youth who stood before him was strangely impressive. With singular modesty, but with the most entire self-possession, Mr. Tait discharged the duty which had been assigned to him, and delivered the greetings with which he had been charged. Every one who heard him was alike won and charmed." (A picture on page 12 illustrates this episode.)

After three months' absence, Mr. Tait returned home, having rapidly visited the chief cities on the Hudson, Saratoga, Niagara, Chicago, Boston, Washington, and other cities, receiving everywhere a cordial welcome.

INDUCTED AS VICAR OF ST. JOHN'S.

On February 3d, 1878, Mr. Tait was inducted as Vicar of St. John's, Notting Hill, near London. This was his first and last appearance as incumbent in that church. Twelve days afterward his strength altogether broke down; fever set in with violence, and on February 16th he was in danger. Then followed three months of intense anxiety. He lay very ill but did not himself suppose he was

THE STAR.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached on Sunday Morning, Dec. 24th, 1882.

"And lo, the star which they saw in the East went before them."—MATT. 2 : 9.

The Night of Jubilant Commemoration—The Pointing Finger of Night—The Beckoning Star—I. A Sidereal Escort—Its Welcome Voice—II. The Obeisance of the Stars—The Organ of the Universe—Its Broken Stop—All Worlds to be Accordant—III. The Homage of Earthly Wisdom—The Scientists of the Day—The Stars Their Special Study—The Wisest Men Always Christians—The Matter in Ounces—The Sages of the West—IV. Born in the Winter—A December Christ—For People Snowed Under—V. An Alleviation for Animals—VI. The Three Presents—The Gold—Consecrated Affluence—The Myrrh—Bitterness and Sorrow—The Frankincense — Worship — The Two Censers of To-day.

THE old sexton of the village church is about to put his hand on the rope of the bell. The cylinder of the chime of the city belfry is being readjusted. All around the world the air will vibrate with sweetest tintinnabulation punctuated with the roar of cathedral tower, the jingle of the lighter metal submerged by the overmastering boom. When this afternoon at thirty-eight minutes past four o'clock the sun sets, there will come on a night of jubilant commemoration.

THE FIRST CHRISTMAS.

Two plain people centuries ago hoteled in a village barn after a walk of eighty miles, too long a trudge for one in poor health. No lords of state awaiting in antechamber as when other kings are born, no messengers mounted at the doorway ready to herald the advent from city to city, no medical skill in attendance, no satin-lined cradle to receive the infantile guest; but a monarch born in the hostelry called the house of Chim Ham; the night with diamonded finger pointing down to the place; the door of heaven set wide open to look out; from orchestral batons of light dripping the oratorios of the Messiah; on lowest doorstep of heaven the minstrels of God discoursing of glory and good cheer.

Soon after the white-bearded astrologists kneel, and from leathern pouch chink the shekels and from open sacks exhale the frankincense and rustle out the bundles of myrrh. The loosened star the escaped doxology of celestials; the chill December night aflush with May morn; our world a lost star, and another star rushing down the sky that night to beckon the wanderer home again shall yet make all nations keep Christmas.

I. A SIDEREAL ESCORT.

Are there no new lessons from the story not yet hackneyed by oft repeatal? Oh, yes. Know in the first place, it was a sidereal appearance that led the way. "Lo, the star which they saw in the East, went before them." Why not a black cloud in the shape of a hand or finger pointing down to the sacred birthplace? A cloud means trouble, and the world had had trouble enough. Why not a shaft of lightning quivering and flashing and striking down to the sacred birthplace? Lightning means destruction and shattering and consuming power, and the world wanted no more destruction.

THE VOICE OF THE STAR.

But it was a star, and that means joy, that means hope, that means good cheer, that means ascendancy. A star! That means creative power, for did not the morning stars sing together when the portfolio of the worlds was opened? A star! That means defence, for did not the stars fight in their course against Sisera and for the Lord's people? A star! That means brilliant continuance, for are not the righteous to shine as the stars forever and ever? A star! That means the opening of eternal joy. The day star in the heart. The morning star of the Redeemer.

The unusual appearance that night may have been a strange conjunction of worlds. As this recent transit of Venus was foretold many years ago by astronomers, and astronomers can tell what will be the conjunction of worlds a thousand years from now, so they can calculate backward; and even infidel astronomers have been compelled to testify that about the year one there was a very unusual appearance in the heavens. The Chinese record, of course entirely independent of the Word of God, gives as a matter of history that about the year one there was a strange and unaccountable appearance in the heavens.

But it may have been a meteor such as you and I have seen flash to the horizon. Only a few nights ago I saw in the northern sky a star shoot and fall with such brilliancy and precision that if I had been on a hill as high as that of Bethlehem on which the shepherds stood, I could have marked within a short distance the place of the alighting. The University of Iowa and the British Museum have specimens of meteoric stones picked up in the fields, fragments flung off from other worlds, leaving a fiery trail on the sky. So that it is not to me at all improbable, the stellar or the meteoric appearance on that night of which we speak. I only care to know that it was bright, that it was silvery, that it flashed and swayed and swung and halted with joy celestial, as though Christ in haste to save our world had rushed down without His coronet, and the angels of God had hurled it after Him!

Not a black night of threat, but a gleaming star of hope is our glorious Christianity. One glimpse of that stellar appearance kindled up the soul of the sick and dying college student until words flashed from his fingers and the star seemed to pour its light from his white lips as Kirke White wrote these immortal words:

"When marshalled on the nightly plain
The glittering hosts bestud the sky,
One star alone of all the train
Can fix the sinner's wandering eye.
Hark, hark to God, the chorus breaks,
From every host, from every gem,
But one alone, the Saviour speaks,
It is the star of Bethlehem.

"Once on the raging seas I rode,
The storm was late, the night was dark,
And rudely blew the wind that tossed my foundering bark;
Deep horror then my vitals froze,
Death struck, I ceased the tide to stem;
When suddenly a star arose,
It was the Star of Bethlehem."

STELLAR OBEISANCE.

II. Notice also in this scene, that, other worlds seemed to honor our Lord and Master. Bright star of the night, wheel on thine orbit. I must come nearer and I must bend and I must watch and see what you do with my Jesus. Another world that night joined our world in worship. That star made a bow of obeisance. I sometimes hear people talk of Christ's dominion as though it were to be merely the few thousand miles of the world's circumference; but I believe the millions and the billions and the quadrillions of worlds are all inhabited—if not by such creatures as we are, still such creatures as God designed to make and that all these worlds are a part of Christ's dominion. Isaac Newton and Kepler and Herschel only went on Columbus's voyage to find these continents of our King's domain. I think all worlds were loyal but this. The great organ of the universe, its pedals and its pipes and its keys all one great harmony save one broken stop, save one injured pedal—the vox humana of the human race, the world, the disloyal world.

Now you know that however grand the instrument may be, if there be one key out of order, it spoils the harmony. And Christ must mend this key. He must restore this broken stop. You know with what bleeding hand, and with what pierced side, and with what crushed foot, He did the work. But the world shall be attuned and all worlds will be yet accordant. Isle of Wight larger in comparison with the British Empire than our island of a world is compared with Christ's vast domain. If not, why that celestial escort? If not, why that sentinel with blazing badge above the caravansery? If not, why that midnight watchman in the balcony of heaven? Astronomy surrendered that night to Christ. This planet for Christ. The solar system for Christ. Worlds ablaze and worlds burnt out—all worlds for Christ.

Intensest microscope cannot see the one side of that domain. Furthest reaching telescope cannot find the other side of that domain. But I will tell you how the universe is bounded. It is bounded on the north and south and east and west and above and beneath by God, and that God is Christ, and that Christ is God, and that God is ours. Oh, does it not enlarge your ideas of a Saviour's dominion when I tell you that all the worlds are only sparks struck from His anvil? that all the worlds are only the fleecy flocks following the one Shepherd? that all the islands of light in immensity are one great archipelago belonging to our King?

THE HOMAGE OF THE SAGES.

III. But this scene also impresses me with the fact that the wise men of the East came to Christ. They were not fools, they were not imbeciles. The record distinctly says that the wise men came to Christ. We say they were the magi, or they were the alchemists, or they were the astrologists and astronomers, and we say it with depreciating accentuation. Why, they were the most splendid and magnificent men of the century. They were the naturalists and the scientists. They knew all that was known. You must remember that astrology was the mother of astronomy, and that alchemy was the mother of chemistry, and because children are brighter than the mother you do not despise the mother.

It was the lifelong business of these astrologers to study the stars. Twenty two hundred and fifty years before Christ was born the wise men knew the precision of the equinoxes and they had calculated the orbit and the return of the comets. Professor Smith declares that he thinks they understood the description of the world from the map. We find in the book of Job that the men of olden time did not suppose the world was flat as some have said, but that he knew and the men of his time knew the world was globular. The pyramids were built for astrological and astronomical study.

Then, the alchemists spent their lives in the study of metals and gases and liquids and solids, and in filling the world's library with their wonderful discoveries. They were vastly wise men who came to the East. They understood embalmment as our most scientific men cannot understand it. After they had gone on in studying hundreds and thousands of years, they only came up to the point where some of them began to forget. I believe the lost arts are as mighty as the living arts.

They were wise men that came from the East, and tradition says the three wisest came, Caspar, a young man; Balthazar a man in mid-life, and Melchior, an octogenarian. The three wisest men of all the century. They came to the manger. So it has always been—the wisest men come to Christ, the brainiest men come to the manger. Who was the greatest metaphysician this country ever has produced? Jonathan Edwards, the Christian. Who was the greatest astronomer of the world? Herschel, the Christian. Who was the greatest poet ever produced? John Milton, the Christian. Who was the wisest writer on law? Blackstone, the Christian. Who is the mightiest intellect in Great Britain to-day? Gladstone, the Christian. Why is it that every college and university in the land has a chapel? They must have a place for the wise men to worship.

Come now, let us understand in ounces and by inches this whole matter. In post mortem examination the brain of distinguished men has been examined, and I will find the largest, the heaviest, the mightiest brain ever produced in America, and I will ask what that brain thought of Christ. Here it is, the brain weighing fifty-eight ounces, the largest brain ever produced in America. Now let me find what that brain thought of Christ. In the dying moment, that man said: "Lord I believe; help Thou mine unbelief. Whatever else I do, Almighty God, receive me to Thyself for Christ's sake. This night I shall be in life and joy and blessedness." So Daniel Webster came to the manger. The wise men of the East followed by the wise men of the West.

BORN IN THE WINTER.

IV. Know also in this scene that it was a winter month that God chose for His Son's nativity. Had it been the month of May—that is the sea of blossoms. Had He been born in the month of June—that is the season of roses. Had He been born in the month of July—that is the season of great harvests. Had He been born in the month of September—that is the season of ripe orchards. Had He been born in the month of October—that is the season of upholstered forests. But He was born in the month of December when there are no flowers blooming out of doors, and when all the harvests that have not been gathered up have perished, and when there are no fruits ripening on the hill, and when the leaves are drifted over earth.

It was in closing December that He was born to show that this is a Christ for people in sharp blast, for people under clouded sky, for people with frosted hopes, for people with thermometer below zero, for people snowed under.

A DECEMBER CHRIST!

That is the reason He is so often found among the destitute. You can find Him on any night coming off the moors. You can see Him any night coming through the dark lanes of the city. You can see Him putting His hand under the fainting head in the pauper's cabin. He remembers how the wind whistled around the caravansery in Bethlehem that December night, and He is in sympathy with all those who in their poverty hear the shutters clatter on a cold night.

It was this December Christ that Washington and his army worshipped at Valley Forge when without blankets they lay down in the December snow. It was this Christ that the Pilgrim Fathers appealed to when the Mayflower wharfed at Plymouth Rock, and in the years that went by the graves digged were more in number than the houses built. Oh, I tell you, we want a December Christ, not a Christ for fair weather, but a Christ for dark days, clouded with sickness and chilling with disappointment, and suffocating with bereavement, and terrific with wide open graves. Not a springtime Christ, not a summer Christ, not an autumnal Christ, but a winter Christ.

Oh, this suffering and struggling world needs to be hushed and soothed and rocked and lullabied in the arms of sympathetic omnipotence. No mother ever with more tenderness put her foot on the rocker of the cradle of a sick child than Christ comes down to us, to this invalid world, and He rocks it into slumber and quietness as He says, "My peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you." Oh, you broken-hearted, oh, you persecuted and tried souls, oh, you burden bearers, this day I declare unto you a December Christ.

MERCY FOR ANIMALS.

V. Notice also a fact which no one seems to notice, that this Christ was born among the sheep and the cattle and the horses and the camels, in order that He might be an alleviating influence to the whole animal creation. It means mercy for overdriven, underfed, poorly sheltered, galled and maltreated creation.

Hath the Christ who compared Himself to a dove no care for the cruelties of the pigeon shooting? Hath the Christ who compared Himself to a lamb no care for the sheep that are tied and contorted, and with neck over the sharp edge of the butcher's cart, or the cattle train in hot weather from Omaha to New York, with no water—fifteen hundred miles of agony? Hath the Christ whose tax was paid by a fish, the coin taken from its mouth, no care for the tossing fins in the fish market? Hath the Christ who strung with His own hand the nerves of dog and cat no indignation for the horrors of vivisection? Hath the Christ who said, "go to the ant," no watchfulness for the transfixed insects? Hath the Christ who said, "behold the fowl of the air," Himself never beheld the outrages heaped upon the brute creation which cannot articulate its grief? This Christ came not only to lift the human race out of its trouble, but to lift out of pang and hardship the animal creation.

In the glorious millennial time the child shall lead the lion and play with the cockatrice only because brute and reptile shall have no more wrongs to avenge. To alleviate the condition of the brute creation Christ was born in the cattle pen. The first bleat of the Lamb of God heard amid the tired flocks of the Bethlehem shepherds. The white horse of eternal victory stabled in a barn.

THE THREE PRESENTS.

VI. But notice also in this account the three Christmas presents that are brought to the manger. Gold, frankicense and myrrh. Gold to Christ—that means all the affluence of the world brought to Christ. For lack of money no more asylums limping on their way like the cripples whom they helped, feeling their slow way like the blind people whom they sheltered. Millions of dollars for Christ where there are now thousands for Christ. Railroads owned by Christian stockholders and governed by Christian directors and carrying passengers and freight at Christian prices. George Peabodys and Abbott Lawrences, and James Lennoxes no rarity. Bank of England, Bourse of France, United States Treasury, all the moneyed institutions of the world for Christ. The gold for Christ.

Gold not merely paved the way for Joseph and Mary and the divine fugitive into Egypt, but it was typical of the fact that Christ's way shall be paved all around the world. The gold for Christ, the silver for Christ, the jewels for Christ. Australia, Nevada and Golconda for Christ. The bright, round, beautiful jewel of a world set like a solitaire on the bosom of Christ!

THE MYRRH.

But I notice that these wise men also shook out from their sacks the myrrh. The cattle came and they snuffed at it. They did not eat it because it was bitter. The pungent gum resin of Abyssinia called myrrh brought to the feet of Christ. That means bitterness. Bitter betrayal, bitter persecution, bitter days of suffering, bitter nights of woe. Myrrh. That is what they put into His cup when He was dying. Myrrh. That is what they put under His head in the wilderness. Myrrh. That is what they strewed His path with all the way from the cattle pen in Bethlehem to the mausoleum at Joseph's country seat. Myrrh. Yea, says some one, "all thy garments smell of myrrh." That is what the wise men wrapped in the swaddling clothes of the babe. That is what the Marys wrapped in the shroud of a crucified Christ. The myrrh. Oh, the height, the depth, the length, the breadth of the Saviour's sorrow. Well might the wise men shake out the myrrh.

THE FRANKINCENSE.

But I notice also from another sack they shake out the frankincense. Clear up to the rafters of the barn the air is all filled with perfume, and the hostlers and the camel drivers in the furthest part of the building inhale it, and it floats out upon the air until passers-by wonder who in that rough place could have by accident dropped a box of alabaster.

Frankincense. That is what they burned in the censer in the ancient temple. Frankincense. That means worship. Frankincense. That is to fill all the homes and all the churches and all the capitals and all the nations from cellar of stalactitic cave clear up to the silvery rafters of the starlit dome. Frankincense. That is what we shake out from our hearts to-day, so that the nostrils of Christ once crimsoned with the hemorrhage of the cross, shall be flooded with the perfume of a world's adoration. Frankincense. Frankincense in song and sermon and offertory and handshaking and decoration. Praise Him, mountains and hills, valleys and seas, and skies and earth and heaven—cyclone with your trumpets, northern lights with your flaming ensign, morning with your castles of cloud, and evening with your billowing clouds of sunset.

Do you know how they used to hold the censer in the olden time, and what it was made of? Here is a metal pan and the handle by which it was held. In the inside of this metal pan were put living coals, on the top of them a perforated cover. In a square box the frankincense was brought to the temple. This frankincense was taken out and sprinkled over the living coals, and then the perforated cover was put on, and when they were all ready for worship, then the cover was lifted from this censer and the covers were lifted from all the other censers, and the perfumed smoke arose until it hung amid all the folds and dropped amid all the altars, and then rose in great columns of praise outside or above the temple, rising clear up toward the throne of God.

TWO CENSERS.

So we have two censers to-day, of Christmas frankincense. Here is the one censer of earthly frankincense. On that we put our thanks for the mercies of the past year, the mercies of all our past lives, individual mercies, family mercies, social mercies, national mercies, and our hearts burning with gratitude send aloft the incense of praise toward the throne of Christ. Bring on more incense, and higher and higher let the columns of praise ascend. Let them wreathe all these pillars and hover amid all these arches and then soar to the throne.

But here is the other censer of heavenly thanksgiving and worship. Let them bring all their frankincense—the cherubim bring theirs and the seraphim theirs and the one hundred and forty and four thousand theirs, and all the eternities let them smoke with perfume on this heavenly censer until the cloud canopies the throne of God. Then I take these two censers — the censer of earthly frankincense and the censer of heavenly frankincense—and I swing them before the throne, and then I clash them together in one great hallelujah unto Him to whom all the wise men of the East brought the gold, and the myrrh and the frankincense as the star in the East went before them.

False Props Knocked Away.—Mrs. Adams, wife of the devoted missionary at Kin-hwa, China, speaking of the habits and apparently ineradicable superstitions of the Chinese women, says: "They are quite satisfied if at the regular season they visit a temple devoted to the worship of the Goddess of Mercy, and after presenting money to the priest, and burning incense before the idol, receive a slip of yellow paper declaring the sins of the past months to be atoned for. A few weeks ago two white-haired old ladies came to call on me; they lived a great distance from the city, but had come to worship at the women's temple here. With a look of satisfaction on their poor aged faces, they drew from their pockets slips of yellow paper, and told me what they were; and when I told them of the precious blood of Jesus that alone cleanses from all sin, they seemed quite disappointed and angry at my seeking to remove the props on which they leaned in their old age. But they listened attentively to all I said, and I have since learned that they daily offer a prayer which I taught them, 'In the name and for the sake of Christ, our only Mediator and Advocate.'"

Kept Out of a Theatre by Prayer.—Mr. W. E. Barker, who now resides at Canterbury, New Zealand, narrates the following remarkable incident. He says: "When in England, in 1878–1880, I was a great frequenter of theatres. One evening, as I was crossing from Simpson's restaurant to the Gaiety Theatre, London, I heard the bells of a church near by ringing for service. Something seemed to wrestle within me, persuading me to enter the church instead of the theatre. After wavering for some time, I finally did so, and the sermon seemed to suit my case exactly, convicting me of sin. The next evening, instead of taking that warning as sent of God, I made up my mind to go and see a troupe of minstrels at the Opera House, an entertainment I had been for some time most anxious to attend. On reaching the place, exactly the same feeling came over me as on the previous evening. I again resisted and I walked several times round the building, trying to throw off the unwelcome feeling; but I am now thankful to say the Lord prevailed. This strange interference made me feel nervous, and, on thinking it over, I felt so sure that it was owing to some one praying for me, that I wrote straight off to a friend of mine, telling him all about it, and my firm conviction as to the cause. I also gave him the name of the lady who was praying for me; though she had never spoken to me on the subject, I knew it must be she. I then wrote and asked her, and she confessed with gladness that she had for some time made it a subject of prayer. Her mother, also, had prayed for me. That young lady is now my wife.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Cowardly Soldier.—At a Recent Meeting the Rev. James Scott said: "I once heard of a soldier who, when war broke out, sent in his resignation. Of course it was not accepted. When asked why he did it, his reply was, 'I did not enlist to fight, but only to turn out on parade days.' How many parade Christian workers are there who never turn out except when some great field-day is on hand? What will they say for themselves when they stand before the Master?"

A Lawyer's Opinion Without a Fee.—At the same meeting Mr. R. Hunter Craig said: "Though I had to rise from my bed to attend the Mizpah Choir practice this afternoon, I do not regret having done so, because when Mr. Simpson and I were on the way down we met a well-known leading lawyer of this city, who said to us, 'Although I have been a Christian almost all my life, and teach in a Sabbath-school, I was also a moderate drinker, and thought it was quite right; but now I find it impossible to continue so, seeing the evil results of moderate indulgence, or even using any kind of intoxicating drink.'"

The Half-Emptied Glass.—Mr. Rugg Said, at the same meeting: "Major Colquhoun asks testimony as to the power of God's Holy Spirit to overcome the love of drink. I have already given my own evidence in this church on a former occasion, and now rise to tell you of a case which happened lately. A man was drinking in a public-house. A friend of his went inside and asked him to come outside for a minute. Laying down the half-emptied glass, he complied, and was then persuaded to go to a Blue Ribbon meeting, where the Gospel was preached in all its fulness. That night he gave himself to Jesus, and he has walked consistently ever since."

A Dirty Saint.—The Rev. G. L. Carstairs said: "A friend of mine, not engaged in missionary work, was lately visiting a heathen temple in India. It was a perfect shambles, reeking with the blood of sacrifices offered to their abominable idols. In that place, the shrine of Heathendom, he was enabled to testify of Christ in such a way that the priests were unable to answer him, 'but,' said they, 'If you will come to a certain holy man, he will answer you.' This saint was a man who had not washed himself nor changed his clothing for years! Entering the inner room, my friend preached Christ to him, and the reply he got was, 'We know that you Christians must fill India, and all we can do is to put off the evil day.' This is strong testimony to the value and effect of the missionaries' work and the power of the Gospel of Christ, and that from a man who did not believe in Christ."

A Cry for the Boatman.—At the Same Meeting Major Colquhoun said: "When I used to live abroad I was a great swimmer. Near to my house was the deep, strong running river Garonne. One day I was sailing in my boat upon it, and all at once I determined to have a swim. Without waiting to think, I leaped out of the boat into the current. At first I thought I was swimming all right, but soon noticed that the bearings of the land were different. The big tree opposite, from which a minute ago I was a long way off, was near, and the banks were not the same. Startled, I began to think, 'What is the matter?' when it broke in upon me that I was going with the current; I was in danger. 'Help!' I shouted to my boatman. The need of a saviour to rescue me from drowning was evident, and when I called he came, and I got into the boat. It is so with you, friends. Some are in the current of sin, quite careless and unawakened; some are aroused to a sense of their danger, but will not get into the boat for fear it will sink when they get in; and others are clambering in, and trust themselves to the boatman's care."

Down with the Fever.—Mr. Bowker Said: "A few years ago an epidemic raged in Paris. It was a very peculiar fever, which gradually worked its way to the brain and made the patient insensible, so that the most skilful physician could not foresee whether he was to live or die. An American gentleman of wealth and culture was in Paris at the time, and was smitten with the disease. He sent for an English physician, who, after examining him, said, 'Yes, you are ill with the fever. Have you any friends here?' 'No.' 'Have you made your will?' 'No.' 'Make it at once, for I cannot tell whether you will recover or not.' 'Whom shall I get?' 'I will send some one to you.' On leaving the hotel the Englishman sent a lawyer, in whom he had confidence, to make the will. On his next visit he said, 'In a short time you will become insensible. Give me your will, your purse, jewelry, watch, and passport.' Strange request for a stranger to make, thought the sick man, but on looking at the countenance of the physician he saw candor and truth imprinted on it. With full faith he complied with the demand made. The fever ran its course, and by the blessing of God on the care and attention of physician and nurse, he passed safely through it. After he was well, the physician gave him back everything that was in his hands. See you not what Christ says to you: 'Put your all in My hands while the fever of life has to be passed through.' Afterward He will restore all to you."

THE CHARACTERISTICS AND CONTRASTS OF THE COMING KINGDOM.

By Rev. William Maude.

The Kingdom of Righteousness.

The Essential Connection between Righteousness and Peace—What is Righteousness?—Etymology and Moral Significance—Unrighteousness in the Sphere of Earthly Government—Martin Luther and De Burgh—Unrighteousness in Social Relations—Dives and Lazarus Drifting Further Apart—Progress versus Poverty—The Foundations of Modern Society—A Rationalistic Sneer—The Righteousness of Millennial Rule—The King Himself—An Incorruptible Tribunal—The Future Rulers of the Earth—Need for Discrimination—The Princes of the Coming Age—The Future Condition of Israel—The Banishment of Temptation from the Earth—The Millennium Not a Perfect Age.

IT may be truly said of this our fallen sin-stricken world, that, irrespective, of course, of the supreme individual need of salvation, it has four great wants; viz.: considered politically, it wants PEACE; considered socially, it wants RIGHTEOUSNESS; considered scientifically, it wants POWER; and considered intellectually and spiritually, it wants LIGHT. How the first of these wants will be met when the coming Millennial Kingdom of Christ has been established on the earth, I endeavored to show in my former paper which was printed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last month. In this and two following ones I propose to establish the same conclusion in reference to the three remaining needs.

ESSENTIAL CONNECTION BETWEEN RIGHTEOUSNESS AND PEACE.

Peace is the flower of which righteousness is the root; morally there is an inseparable causal connection between them; there can be no real peace either for man, a nation, or a world, in the absence of righteousness; but if righteousness be poured down from heaven, peace, in sweet responsiveness, will assuredly spring out of the earth. Accordingly we find in Scripture an intimate and inseparable connection between righteousness and peace again and again expressed. So Isaiah speaks of a time when "judgment shall dwell in the wilderness, and righteousness remain in the fruitful field. And," he adds, "the work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness, quietness, and assurance forever." (Isa. 32: 16, 17.)

Again, how beautifully is the same thought expressed by the Lord to Israel, by the same prophet: "Thou shalt also suck the milk of the Gentiles, and shalt suck the breast of kings: and thou shalt know that I the Lord am thy Saviour and thy Redeemer, the mighty One of Jacob. For brass I will bring gold, and for iron I will bring silver, and for wood brass, and for stones iron: I will also make thy officers peace, and thine exactors righteousness. Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders; but thou shalt call thy walls salvation, and thy gates praise. . . . . Thy people also shall be all righteous; they shall inherit the land forever, the branch of My planting, the work of My hands, that I may be glorified." (Isa. 60: 16, 18, 21.) And again, addressing her in another key, He says, "Oh, that thou hadst hearkened to My commandments! then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea." (Isa. 48: 18.) While the Psalmist exultantly exclaims: "Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other." (Ps. 85: 10.)

WHAT IS RIGHTEOUSNESS?

But what is righteousness, and how shall we define it? It comes from two old Anglo-Saxon words signifying right or straight, and wise or prudent. Righteousness, therefore, is keeping to the straight line, pursuing the straight path and avoiding all serpentine deviations therefrom. In like manner, vulgarly indeed, but by the use of a similar analogy, we still speak of acting "on the square," as equivalent to acting uprightly and honestly. So Solomon says, "In the way of righteousness"—the straight open way in which neither robber nor serpent lurks—"is life, and in the pathway thereof there is no death." (Prov. 12: 28.) While concerning Messiah it is divinely declared: "Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever: a rod of straightness is the sceptre of Thy kingdom." (Heb. 1: 8.)

So much for the grammatical meaning of the word; but morally, perhaps, no nobler or more exhaustive definition of "righteousness" could be given than that embodied in the great word of Christ: "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets." (Matt. 7: 12.) Concerning this principle Dr. Watts most truly says:

> "Blessed Redeemer, how divine,
> How righteous is this rule of Thine;
> To do to all men just the same,
> As we expect and hope from them."

But we have only to apply such a criterion as this to what the Apostle calls "the course of this world" to perceive at once, if indeed we have any spiritual discernment, how, throughout its entire history, and in all the departments of human life, the reign of unrighteousness has obtained; and that in such a degree that even the Christian's faith has often been for a moment staggered, and he has been tempted to ask himself, "Is there indeed a reward for the righteous; is there in truth a God that judgeth the earth?" Putting aside the flagrant vices which in their habitual and world-wide prevalence disgrace and degrade ou. common humanity, such as drunkenness, uncleanness, robbery, and murder, let us look for a moment at two only of the diverse spheres in which the world's unrighteousness is strikingly manifested: (1) the sphere of government, and (2) the sphere of social relation.

UNRIGHTEOUSNESS IN GOVERNMENT.

"He that ruleth over men must be just," says David in his "last words," "ruling in the fear of God;" but alas, how little of such rule has the world ever known! What hecatombs of human victims have been slain in order that some ruthless monster might "wade through seas of slaughter to a throne?" What nations of men have been crushed down into slavery and despair by the cruel oppression of crowned and sceptred tyrants! How little have princes and governors in general cared for the welfare and happiness of their people! Solemnly striking and admonitory is the language of the eighty-second Psalm: "God standeth in the congregation of the mighty; He judgeth among the gods." "This is a terrible word of threatening," says Luther, "against wicked 'gods,' or rulers. For they must here understand that they are not placed over stocks and stones, nor over swine and dogs, but over the 'congregation of God,' (as the words 'congregation of the mighty' should be rendered); they must, therefore, be afraid of when they act unjustly." When God thus appears and calls to account the rulers of the earth, named in Scripture "gods," because His representatives and executors, what words does He address to them? "How long will ye judge unjustly, and accept the persons of the wicked? Defend the poor and fatherless," whom ye have so shamefully neglected and oppressed—"do justice to the afflicted and needy."

But the admonition is altogether in vain. "They know not, neither will they understand; they walk on in darkness; all the foundations of the earth are out of course," or "moved." And while these words have a constant application, and are fearfully illustrated by the history of the past; we have here, says De Burgh, "the first intimation of a disorder and moral revolution more general and wide-spread than is usually here suspected. For, it is not a departure from justice, or depravity even such as is here described, in one people or country, that could occasion such a catastrophe as this—"all the foundations of the earth are out of course"—but rather we have here the same crisis and climax of apostasy as before indicated in Ps. 75, where God interposes, saying: "When I shall receive the congregation I will judge uprightly. The earth and all the inhabitants therefore are dissolved: I bear up the pillars of it." (Ver. 2, 3.)

THE DESCENDING SPIRIT.

S. S. Lesson for January 14. Acts 2: 1-21. Golden Text, Zech. 4: 6. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Key of the Dispensation—Man a Temple—A Call to be God-like—The Spiritual First-fruits—The First Instalment of Power—The Gift of Tongues—A Slanderous Accusation—Peter Used to Refute it—A Warrant for Lay Preaching—The Unfulfilled Prophecy—An Undaunted Little Band—The Self of Fanaticism—How Self Hinders the Spirit.

"NOT by might, nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts;" this, our golden text, is the key to the dispensation under which we live. "Thou hast ascended on high, Thou hast led captivity captive; Thou hast received gifts in the Man" (see margin, i.e., in man's nature); "yea, for the rebellious also,

THAT THE LORD GOD MIGHT DWELL AMONG THEM"

(Ps. 68: 18). The very purpose for which God has created man is that he might become "an habitation of God through the Spirit" (Eph. 2: 22).

Who can comprehend this wondrous grace of God which unites us to Himself, which makes man one life, one being with Himself! It is almost inconceivable that the mighty Maker of the universe should choose anything so small, so insignificant in His creation, and make it His home, His dwelling place; that the Creator should inhabit the creature! Yet, so it is, in the Person of the Lord Jesus, and so it is in every man who is really indwelt by the Holy Spirit. God calls man to do God-like things; to rise out of his own nature into God's; to leave the natural for the supernatural; to renounce and ignore self with all its claims, its rights, its powers, that it may be replaced by the Spirit of God. God calls us to deny and ignore our natural tendency, to stand up for our rights by resisting evil, that by the Spirit we may love our enemies; He calls us from the natural self-reliance which belongs to us, to cast all our care on God for He careth for us. He calls us to deny the love of approbation which dwells in each of our hearts by nature, and to be glad when men revile, persecute, and speak all manner of evil against us falsely for His name's sake.

Jesus came to live a new life, a kind of life which no man had ever lived before, a life in which self was unknown, unrecognized, disregarded; and He has made it possible for you and me, dear reader, as we renounce self, and are indwelt by God to live a divine, a superhuman life, which is indeed nothing more nor less than Christ living in us; and therefore living His own life over again in and through us.

We have seen how the little band of disciples had been emptied of self; even the forward Peter, even the doubting Thomas were now occupied with praising and blessing God, although their cause might have seemed, to the eyes of man a lost one. They were neither preaching nor teaching, their Master had left them, their enemies denied the resurrection of Jesus, yet, strong in faith, they gave glory to God, counting on Jesus' Word against all present surroundings and circumstances. And then it was that the blessing came. The day of Pentecost, the time of the offering of the first-fruits (Lev. 23: 15-17) was truly come, and a new order of first-fruits had been offered, "Christ the first-fruits" (1 Cor. 15: 23) of the resurrection had ascended into heaven as a true wave-offering unto God; and now His disciples were "a living sacrifice at His disposal," also "a kind of first-fruits of His creatures" (James 1: 18). They were as really devoted, they had as really staked all upon the Word of their Lord, as though they had been slain in sacrifice.

"They were all with one accord in one place;" here was blessed unity, no divided interests, and here God could bless. "And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing, mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance." This was their special need: commissioned to "go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature," they needed other languages, and of the power of the Holy Ghost, thus coming upon them was the supply of this very need. But they were not masters of the situation; it was not they making use of the Holy Spirit, it was the Holy Spirit clothing, overpowering, and making use of them. They were not employing the Holy Ghost to make their eloquence more eloquent, the Holy Ghost was moving their tongues to convey to the multitude in their own language, "the wonderful works of God." It is probable that they all spoke with a strong Galilean accent, for we may well believe that they were not long in going out into the streets as God's messengers to the multitudes, of the precious tidings of salvation and the people "were all amazed and marvelled, saying one to another, Behold, are not all these which speak Galileans? And how hear we every man in our own tongue, wherein we were born?"

They had no former experience of anything like this, it was a new thing; ignorant men who were too poor to buy a grammar, and too ignorant to study if they had one, speaking with fluency in other languages, and on a subject in which the terms employed could not have been picked up in the markets, or in the way of business. One and the same theme was heard by all, in the sixteen languages mentioned, it was, "The wonderful works of God." No wonder that it made a stir; God was doing an unusual thing, something out of the way. All the hearers were amazed; nobody could count this to be an ordinary occurrence, say what they would, "they were in doubt, saying one to another, What meaneth this?" These men were open to conviction, but there were others mocking; they did not like the subject of the discourse, it touched them too closely, they would put it down if they could do so, in order to bring reproach upon the God-filled men and women who were preaching. They said, "These men are full of new wine."

These latter have their representatives to this day; they are those who say of every real, blessed work of God's Spirit, that it is excitement, and who thus ascribe to an unhealthy state of nerves and brain that which is really brought about by God. And why? Because their own experience does not reach up to it. And instead of solemnly inquiring of God about the matter, instead of searching His Word, to see if these things are so, they give themselves over to condemn the Holy Ghost. It is sadly true that fleshly excitement is often mistaken for the work of the Holy Ghost, but also the reverse is also often the case. If we are filled with the Spirit, we shall learn "to try the spirits whether they be of God" (2 John 4: 1).

Peter was the instrument used by the Holy Spirit to explain this occurrence; and he did it by bringing Scripture to bear upon the men and the circumstances before him; and he did it not in the way of suggestion. As the mouthpiece of the Spirit of God, Peter spoke with authority, "Ye men of Judea, and all ye that dwell at Jerusalem, be this known unto you, and hearken to my words: For these are not drunken, as ye suppose, seeing it is but the third hour of the day. But this is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel; and it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of My Spirit upon all flesh: and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams: and on My servants and on My handmaidens I will pour out in those days of My Spirit; and they shall prophesy."

OH, BLESSED EXPLANATION!

These men and women who were impelled by the Holy Ghost yielded themselves to the impulse to tell the tidings of salvation to perishing men, were fulfilling the Word of God in doing it. Glorious warrant for lay preaching! Glorious encouragement to the daughters and the handmaidens of the Lord to become vessels of the Holy Ghost to bless a lost world!

The latter part of the prophecy which Peter quoted from Joel is, as yet, unfulfilled. "I will show wonders in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath; flood, fire, and vapor of smoke: the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come." But soon, ere Jesus comes, in the time of the approaching great tribulation, all this will most surely come to pass. In any case, the closing words quoted from Joel belong to us now. And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved.

Here were one hundred and twenty men and women sent out to evangelize a world, but with the Holy Ghost dwelling in them they did not stagger at the commission; they did not even wait to hold a council, they worked under the immediate guidance of the Spirit who filled them. Of various education, position, and circumstances, without any previously concerted plan, they all spoke the same thing, did the same work in the same way and in the same power. Why should we not have a perpetual Pentecost? The Holy Ghost is not withdrawn, but there are few men who are thoroughly yielded up to the Holy Ghost, there are few who are empty enough of self to go all lengths with the Holy Ghost without diverging into the self of fanaticism.

God is obliged to do only little things by us, because we are not to be trusted to let Him do great things by us. Self it is, which more than anything else, hinders the Holy Spirit of God. Anything of self-consciousness prevents the Spirit of God possessing the whole man, and His work is limited; anything of self-esteem prevents the eye being single, the affections are called out toward self and not toward God, there is a preoccupation which prevents the full reign of the Holy Ghost. He cannot mix with self, He can and will only take the place which self abdicates. Oh, in face of a lost world, needing God more than all else, a world full of sin, which only God can deal with, full of sorrow which God alone can assuage, full of wrongs which God alone can put right, full of sickness which in many cases God alone can heal, shall we, children of God, whose calling is to bring God and man together, shall we be non-conductors of God, because we let our miserable self come in between?

Paul suffered the loss of all things, shall not we? He counted not his life dear unto him, shall we hold on to ours? The first disciples were of one heart and one soul, shall we not be so? They laid down their lives for the brethren, shall not we be ready to part with ours? What use are health, time, money, position, talent, honor, except to lay at the feet of Jesus, and to place at the disposal of the Holy Ghost? O God, deal closely with us, give us no rest, until we are so surrendered unto Thee, that emptied of self, and filled with God, we may go in pentecostal power to preach the Gospel to all nations for a witness that thousands may be saved, and then our Lord shall come.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Sincere and Hearty Felicitations are Tendered in this, the first issue of the new year, by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to each and all of its readers. Many letters have been received during the past few weeks, from every State in the Union and from all the Provinces of Canada, expressing in the strongest terms the obligations of the writers for spiritual blessings, received through the instrumentality of the paper. Some of them have been aroused, through the blessing of God on its pages, to a sense of their condition before God, and to seek the Saviour; others, anxious for salvation, have found in some part of the paper a word which God has blessed to their guidance to Him "whose blood cleanses from all sin;" while many Christians in doubt, difficulty, or despondency, acknowledge that in reading one or other of the issues of the past year, they have found light and comfort to their souls. That God should have so blessed the enterprise is far more gratifying to those engaged in the work, than would be any amount of pecuniary advantage. But that also God has given. The friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who have derived spiritual profit from it, have introduced it to their acquaintances, who have become subscribers; and professional agents, recognizing its value and its cheapness, have introduced it everywhere with success. The result has been that the circulation this year is largely in excess of that of last year, and the sphere of usefulness is consequently much extended. It is, therefore, in the capacity of a tried and valued friend that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD wishes its readers in the highest and best sense of the phrase, a Happy New Year. The same hand that pens these lines wrote some years ago the words introducing the first number of the paper to the public and has, since that time, week by week, held communication in these pages with an ever-widening circle of readers. That God has permitted him to do this without interruption from illness or other cause, is a fact for which the Editor is humbly thankful, and he now, at the commencement of a new year, asks for an interest in the prayers of the readers of the paper, that his labor may continue to receive the blessing of God, without which it is powerless for good.

The Pendleton Civil Service Reform Bill passed the Senate on December 27th, by a vote of 39 to 5. It will be seen that the attendance of Senators was small, but the attitude of every Senator on the question being known it is easy to calculate what the vote would have been, had every Senator been in his place. In that case the vote recorded against the bill would have been less than a third of the total vote. The bill, as it finally passed the Senate and was sent to the House provides for the appointment of a commission of three members, not more than two of whom are to belong to the same party and each to receive a salary of $3500 and travelling expenses. The commission is to designate examining committees which will conduct examinations of all candidates for office; the examinations to be competitive and on the line of the practical duties of the positions competed for. Promotions also are to be made on the basis of merit and competition. No person appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate is to be subject to examination. Appointments are to be apportioned among the various States and Territories on the basis of population, and every candidate will, after passing his examination, be required to serve a term of probation. Any examiner, who in his report shows animus against any candidate, is to be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to fine or imprisonment. Recommendations of Congressmen are to have no weight whatever with any examining board. Assessments for political purposes are prohibited under penalty of $5000 fine and imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, and no clerk or other office-holder is to be removed from office or otherwise injured because of non-participation in political work of any kind. One of the amendments passed by the Senate prohibits the employment in the civil service in any capacity of any person habitually using intoxicating liquors to excess. The Bill now has to pass the ordeal of the House, where it will encounter some opposition.

The Bill to Regulate the Presidential Succession in the event of the death of President and Vice-President was discussed in the Senate on Dec. 29th. The bill provides that in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability of both the President and the Vice-President, the Secretary of State shall act as President until the end of the term; if there be none, that the Secretary of the Treasury shall act; next, the Secretary of War; next, the Attorney-General; next, the Postmaster-General; next, the Secretary of the Navy; and, last, the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of State Mr. Hoar said, in a speech advocating the measure, was always a man regarded by the mass of the people as well fitted to fill the office of President, and nearly always a representative of the principles and policy of the President, so that his succession to the position of Acting President would be likely to carry out the policy approved by the people in electing his predecessor; and this would give additional security to the life of the President. Who supposed that Booth would have assassinated Lincoln if Seward had been the legal successor to the Presidency, or that Guiteau would have lifted his hand against the life of Garfield to elevate Blaine to the vacant chair?

At the Brooklyn Tabernacle, on December 27th, the children of the Sabbath-school held their annual Christmas festival. The church was densely crowded. Four hundred children dressed in holiday attire were seated on the platform, their ages ranging from three years upward. The building was decorated with evergreens and bunting. The exercises consisted principally of songs and recitations by the infant class scholars. The Rev. Dr. Talmage made an address, and kept the entire audience in a roar of laughter. When Santa Claus himself appeared on the platform, there were tumultuous glee and wild hilarity among the children. Not less than 1700 children were present, and all were provided plentifully with oranges, candies, and cake, while the children of the infant class had their hearts gladdened by a profusion of toys of every imaginable kind. Gifts were also made to the teachers.

A Christian Home for Inebriate Women will soon be in active operation in New York. The well-known temperance philanthropist, the Hon. William E. Dodge, said last week: "A great deal is being done in this city for those who are trying to reform. I have just purchased a fine four-story house in Fifty-seventh Street, which will be fitted up as a Christian Home for Inebriate Women. There is more drinking among the women of this city than most people dream of. This Home will accommodate twenty or thirty persons, and if necessary can be made to accommodate as many more. We hope to have it ready for occupancy in a month or two." Referring to the prohibition movement, Mr. Dodge said: "I think the time will come when there will be a National Prohibition Party organized in this country, the mission of which shall be to drive out the liquor traffic. I have had hard work to induce members of our own association to remain in the Republican party. Many of them desired to assist in establishing a strictly temperance party, but I did not think the time for a new organization had yet arrived, and so discouraged them. The widespread interest in this temperance movement is not to be laughed down. In my opinion, the Republican party will be defeated in the next Presidential election if it does not recognize the temperance element of the voting population. Many of our best people do not believe in licensing sin in any form, and this sentiment is growing day by day. The next generation will see prohibition in nearly every State in the Union."

The Attempt to Produce the Passion Play in New York has happily met with a check, Mayor Grace having refused the application of M. Salmi Morse for a license for the hall in which it was intended to hold the exhibition. Mayor Grace said to a reporter: "I was advised by many of my friends to do nothing in this matter, but after careful consideration I have determined to refuse Mr. Morse's application. There is nothing to prevent his applying to Mr. Edson, when he takes possession of this office, for a license, and if he is again refused he can apply to the courts for a mandamus." In his letter to Mr. Morse the Mayor said: "As it appears from the statement made by you that the hall is to be used for the exclusive purpose of the exhibition of your Passion Play, such exhibition not to take place until some time after the expiration of my term of office, I do hereby deny your application, for the reason that I am satisfied of the impropriety of licensing a place to be used for such a purpose."

An Interesting Service, in which Two Memorable events in an eminent Christian family were commemorated was held on December 24th, when the Rev. Leonard W. Bacon, of New Haven, Conn., lectured in the New Memorial Church Detroit, on the occasion of the unvailing of a tablet to the memory of his grandfather, the Rev. David W. Bacon and his father and mother, the late Dr. Leonard Bacon and wife. The day was a double anniversary. Just twelve months before, Leonard Bacon had drawn the last breath of a long and useful life; and just eighty-two years before, David W. Bacon had been married to Alice Parks, and had, with his seventeen-year-old bride, set out from a pleasant home in the East for the wilds of the West, to preach to the savage Ojibways.

A Remarkably Touching and Graceful Movement has been inaugurated by the employés of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. It is a general subscription to present a house to Miss Jennie Smith, whose Christian work among them God has so signally blessed. The circular, issued by the employés describing their object, states that as they have been led through the divine blessing on Miss Smith's labors to secure a mansion in the skies, "a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens," they have decided to provide her, as an acknowledgment of their indebtedness to her for her indefatigable labors on their behalf, with an earthly home among themselves. The subscriptions are limited to the employés of the road, and are in no case to exceed one dollar. It is expected that at least $800 will be raised. Some other friends of Miss Smith, who have observed her energetic labor and its blessed results, have resolved to supplement the gift of "the boys." Some of these mention that as they travel on the Baltimore and Ohio line, they too are indebted to Miss Smith for increased safety, owing to the habits of sobriety and Christian conduct among the employés, which have resulted from her efforts. They propose to raise a subscription to enable her to gratify a long-cherished desire of adding to the building "a Lord's chamber" where Christ's poor, in need of rest and recuperation, may enjoy a period of peaceful retirement in a Christian home. Contributions may be sent direct to Miss Jennie Smith, 608 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

The Statistics of the Export of Breadstuffs for the first eleven months of the year have been issued, as compared with the corresponding period of 1881. In November the exports were $15,306,494, as against $18,025,880 of 1881; for the five months ending with November they were $100,750,452, as against $98,337,515; for the first eleven months of the year they were $165,606,693, as against $210,318,432. This is a falling off in values in the last period of about twenty-one per cent, while there is a slight excess within the last five months. The first six months of last year showed a decrease of nearly $47,000,000, which will be only slightly overcome in the month of December.

A Man on Horseback on Fire, was the Strange and terrible spectacle witnessed at Lexington, Ky., on December 26th. A Louisville despatch says that a lamp-lighter named O'Neill, while lighting the gasoline street lamps in the outskirts of the city, overturned a lamp, and the burning fluid poured down, completely saturating his clothes and covering the horse he was riding with a sheet of fire. The terrified animal ran down the street at the top of its speed, and finally, in turning a sharp corner, threw its rider. O'Neill, in a perfect blaze, ran to the nearest house, but was fatally burned before the flames were smothered. His entire body to the waist was burned to a crisp, and his horse was literally roasted. It is thought that if the man could have disengaged himself from his horse directly the lamp fell his life might have been saved, but the animal's alarm goaded it to such speed that its rider was doomed. His horrible fate was a fit type of the condition of some wretched beings whose passions, burning like a fire, are carrying them swiftly to destruction (Isa. 33 : 12).

Choked by a Slate Pencil was the Singular cause assigned for the death of a child at Wilkesbarre, Pa., on December 27th. A despatch from that city narrates that a woman named Gannon, went to a physician's office, bringing with her a child which she said had swallowed a piece of slate pencil. The child was half-suffocated and suffering with spasms. The physician, after examining the child, said that the only way to save the child was to cut open its throat and extract the pencil. The mother, however, refused to allow the operation to be performed before the arrival of her husband, who had been sent for. He did not arrive until two hours later, and within a few minutes after his arrival the child expired. The mother's reluctance to submit her child to so terrible an operation, without her husband's approval, can be understood, but it would appear that it lost the child the only chance it had of life. There come crises in the lives of many people when their spiritual life is imperilled, like the natural life of that child. Then it is only by a painful sacrifice, terrible as the loss of a right hand, that the way of escape is opened (Matt. 18 : 8).

A Prisoner's Objection to Enjoy a Privilege had a pathetic basis according to a recently-published reminiscence of a prison official. Among a large number of curious recollections of prison-life, related by ex-Warden Haynes, is that of a man who, on account of his good behavior, was offered the highly-prized privilege of working in the garden outside the prison walls. To the general surprise the prisoner declined it, and the warden inquired the cause. He hesitated a moment, but finally told it. He had a wife and two children, who were ignorant of his being in prison. In the small yellow house, he said, directly opposite his cell-window and near where he would have to work, should he go outside, they were then living. He had watched his children all through the summer, playing in a vacant lot of land belonging to the prison, directly under his window, and so near him that he could hear the voices; and he could see his wife passing in and out of the house, or sitting at her window, little dreaming that he had been so near them for almost two years. His wife supposed he was in the West trying to obtain work, while he was really in prison for stealing. His feelings were regarded, and he was allowed to serve out his sentence without being discovered. The prisoner said that his punishment had been aggravated by the sight of his dear ones so near to him, yet to whom he must not speak. It is not improbable that such suffering, far more intense in degree and duration, may be experienced after death by the godless head of a believing household (Luke 13 : 28).

Swearing Through the Telephone has Been made the ground of a lawsuit in Cincinnati, O., which was heard last week before the Superior Court. The petition recited that on the 1st day of April, 1882, the plaintiff, wishing to communicate with a certain person on business, went to the telephone in his (the plaintiff's) office and gave the customary signal. The operator at the Exchange called up the wrong person, whereupon the plaintiff remarked through the telephone, "If you can't get the party I want, you may shut up your —— telephone," and it was shut up and afterward removed by the telephone company on the ground that profane language had been used through it, which is against the company's rules. The suit was brought to compel the company to restore and maintain a telephone in the plaintiff's office. The court was divided, but the majority of the judges endorsed the action of the company. It may be hoped that there will be no reversal of that judgment. The horse-car companies and the elevated railroad company, who suffer the ears of those who use their vehicles to be polluted with the oaths of men, who swear unchecked by the officers, may well follow the example of the Cincinnati Telephone Company (Psa. 59 : 12).

A Set of Diamonds in the Fire Caused a Panic in a lady's breast recently. A Pennsylvania journal states that a short time ago a gentleman and his wife were staying in an hotel, at Harrisburg, Pa. Before retiring the lady wrapped her diamond ear-rings, valued at $1000, in tissue paper, and placed them on the bureau. Next morning, after completing her toilet, she was arranging things on the bureau, and, seeing the tissue paper, picked it up and threw it into the open grate. As she did so it flashed through her mind that her diamonds were wrapped in the paper, and she made a snatch for it as the blaze caught and consumed it. One of the earrings was pulled out with the blazing paper, but the other remained in the midst of the red-hot coals. The lady, forgetting her pain, picked the jewel from the fire with her fingers, burning them considerably. The diamonds were rescued in time, thanks to the lady's promptitude and courage; but the gold setting was spoiled. This kind of heedlessness is going on in many families where the existence of something far more precious than diamonds is involved. Mothers are throwing their children into the fire of temptation from which, when they realize the danger, they cannot rescue them, even though they brave personal peril themselves. (1 Sam. 3 : 13).

Conversation by Signals between Vessels at sea can be carried on with marvellous precision and comprehensiveness, by means of the international code, which it was supposed contained a signal for every communication that it was likely a captain would need to make. In the course of a description of the code, recently published, however, it is stated that one omission was made, which, had it been discovered earlier, might have prevented a disaster. Three years ago, when the Guion steamship Arizona ran into an iceberg on the banks of Newfoundland, she could have received warning of her danger on the previous day had there been a signal which denoted that ice was ahead. The Anchoria, of the Anchor Line, which had sighted the iceberg, passed the Arizona about twelve hours before the accident, and the Captain of the Anchoria, finding there was no signal in the code having reference to icebergs, suffered the Arizona to pass unwarned, and she afterward struck with such force that but for her water-tight bulkheads she must have sunk. There was, however, a signal which might have been used with advantage. It was the signal "You are running into danger" which is well known, and often used. The excuse is sometimes made that the Bible contains no specific warning against intoxicating liquor, theatre-going, card playing, etc. It is forgotten that to all such evils the Bible contains the warning to those who indulge in them "you are running into danger" (1 Thess. 5 : 21-23).

THAT HORRIBLE EAST WIND!

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And let the peace of God rule in your hearts, to the which also ye are called in one body; and be ye thankful."—COLOSSIANS 3 : 15.

A Troublous Time—The Miseries of the East Wind—The Infallible Remedy—I. Have the Peace of God—What That Implies — Peace with God—As to His Providences—Such as He Commends—Such as God Works—II. Let It Occupy the Throne—III. Strengthen Yourself with Arguments — The Only Way to Spiritual Health — To Church Prosperity—IV. Healthy Mental Occupation—Be Thankful — To God and Man.

I DO not know how it is, but during the last two or three days I have been called to sympathize with an amount of sorrow such as I have seldom met with before in so short a space of time. One messenger of misery has followed on the heels of another, each one with heavy tidings. Nor is that all; for I have also been perplexed with a large amount of sinning, quarrelling, and fault-finding. People are murmuring, grumbling, fretting, and fighting on all sides. So much has this tried me that I feel little fitted to act as comforter, for I need comfort myself. I have endeavored to cheer others till I have drunk of their cup of sorrow, and put my own mouth out of taste; I have tried to make peace for others till I am half afraid of losing my own; I have answered the people's grumblings till I am tempted to have a growl or two on my own account. Perhaps I may relieve my own mind by the sermon which I hope to deliver.

I said to one whom I greatly esteem, "I do not know how it is, but everybody seems out of sorts with everybody else just now." His wise answer was,

"THE WIND IS IN THE EAST."

This fact accounts for a great deal, for

"When the wind is in the east,
'Tis neither good for man nor beast."

This is that ill wind which seems to blow no man any good. Some humanities feel the east wind terribly: it sets their teeth on edge, and they feel that they must bite the first person they meet. I am glad to find some sort of excuse for my fellow-Christians, and if I can find it nowhere but in the east wind I will make the best I can of it; but I earnestly hope that the wind may soon blow from another quarter, and not come from the east again till we have had a little respite, and laid in a new stock of patience. If a cutting wind causes despondency, vexation, discontent, and bad temper, may soft gales visit us frequently, and bring us healing in their wings. As fair weather will not last forever, it will be well to prepare ourselves to breast the blast.

When I turn over in my mind the events of the last few days I do not suppose that there is more discord or discontent in the world just now than at any other time; but it happens that a number of black lines have all found their centre in my person, and my thoughts have had to travel out in all those directions; all which is trying enough, but all the more so when the wind is in the east. It is a coincidence, but the like has happened before. I have had to unravel many tangled skeins in my time, out of love to others; I did not get the threads into a ravel, but people are very fond of bringing me their snarls to disentangle, and when I have a hope of succeeding I try my best. Gladly would I be a peace-maker, but it is much easier to make a snarl than to put it straight again, especially in the east wind. I have tried to set things right, and meanwhile I have asked myself, for these mischiefs?" I feel assured there is such a remedy. Family discomfort, husbands and wives that cannot agree, domestic difficulties, brothers and sisters that fall out, church troubles, members that are not treated kindly by others (not generally the kindest sort of people themselves, I notice), difficulties in business, difficulties in preaching—the world teems with these things when the wind is in the east. We meet with many people who cannot earn enough wages, others who do not believe they were ever well treated since they were born; others, again, who are highly deserving people, but have never yet been appreciated as they should be; and these all come out in crowds when the wind is in the east. Good men become rabid for something new, find fault with old friends, invite debate, and quarrel about nothing; and this happens most often when the wind is in the east.

"IS THERE NOT A REMEDY

When this kind of spirit gets among Christian people it is very sad; but surely there must be a remedy for it. Many nostrums are proposed, many quacks are ready to prescribe this and that form of remedy for troubles and discords, but the results of the east wind are not to be removed in that way: a higher power is needed. I have heard of pills for the earthquake, and medicine for the comet; but I have no such patent physic for the east wind. All I have to tell you is borrowed from an old Book, in which the wisest prescriptions are to be found, prescriptions so excellent that, if they were followed, the inhabitant would no more say, "I am sick."

This windy night I shall take you to the great Physician of souls, Jehovah-Rophi—the Lord who heals us, who is able to cure all our diseases and to give permanent relief from all evil, so that our spirits shall be at rest. I believe that we have a prescription in this verse which, if it be well attended to, will deliver you out of all troubles, make you sing all your lives long, and help you to travel from earth to heaven, and be all the while as happy as the birds in the air. Here it is: "Let the peace of God rule in your hearts, to the which also ye are called in one body; and be ye thankful."

If we dissect our text we shall find in it four pieces of advice.

I. First,

POSSESS THE PEACE OF GOD:

"Let the peace of God rule in your hearts." It cannot rule in your hearts if you have never felt its power; therefore, make certain that you are truly reconciled to God by Jesus Christ. Many persons have peace, but, alas, it is false peace! They have the peace of a soft, gentle, timorous, time-serving character—a mean sort of peace, which, if it hurts no one else, often ruins its possessor. Some have the peace of ignorance, the peace of stupidity, the peace of utter indifference, false peace. These are the followers of those false prophets who cried, "peace, peace," where there was no peace. Woe to the man whose peace of mind is like the deadly smoothness of the current just as it nears the cataract! Many are at ease in a condition which might make a wise man's hair turn gray in a night. They were never emptied from vessel to vessel, and therefore they are settled upon their lees; but they shall be poured out to their utter confusion. They think right well of themselves, but already the axe of judgment is lifted against them.

The peace that we need to possess is the peace of God, which means, I think, first, peace with God. Oh, what a blessed thing it is to feel that the great cause of quarrel between our fallen spirit and the great Spirit is taken away, that we are reconciled to God by the death of His Son, that sin, the great divider, has been cast into the depths of the sea, and that there is established between us and God a happy fellowship! I hope many of you are at this hour enjoying such peace. If you have it, rejoice in it.

Growing out of this there comes, next, a peace with God with regard to all His providences, which can only come through a complete and entire submission to the divine will; for some there are who are not at peace with God, even about a certain providence that afflicted them years ago. They remain quarrelling with God about the decease of a beloved wife or child or mother, and they cannot forgive God for having taken a flower out of His own garden. If they were wise they would not thus rebel, but find in their loving Saviour a recompense for all their losses. Was not that fine of Andromache, when she remembered that she had lost all her relatives except her husband, and, gazing on him with delight, she said

> "While my Hector still survives, I see > My father, mother, brethren, all in thee"?

Cannot a believer say the same of the Lord Jesus? Far be it from us to raise a question about what the providence of God has already done! It must be right.

The point is to

to that providence in what is now transpiring. If for the present the will of the Lord should send me poverty, obscurity, pain, weariness, reproach, I must be at peace with God about it all. If the Lord says to me, "Go across the sea, and leave all your friends," I must not delay. If He says, "Preach unwelcome truth, which will make you enemies;" I must not hesitate. If He says, "Keep the house with rheumatism," I must not come out of doors. If the Lord says, "Lie on thy back and cough," it is not for me to quarrel with Him, and say it ought not so to be. If He denies us that which we think would make us not only more happy, but more useful, it is of no use for us to kick against the pricks. The divine appointment will certainly be fulfilled, and the misery to us will be in struggling against the yoke, in endeavoring to have it otherwise than divine love and infinite wisdom have determined it should be.

This peace of God is, also, peace such as God commends—such as God approves of. That, you know, is first, perfect peace with Himself, and then with all men—certainly with His people, but also with all mankind. "If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men." Take heed that ye do not offend; and if you are offended by others, do not offend in return, but accept the offence in patience; forgive it and forget it. Forbear, and, when you have done so, forbear, and, when you have done so again, forbear, and, when you have forborne seven times, still forbear. I will not repeat the advice seventy times seven, though if I did, I should not go beyond the measure of forbearance and of forgiveness which the Lord Jesus would have us display. Be so at peace with God that you feel perfectly at peace with your fellow-men. This is a sweet part of the peace of God; cultivate it carefully.

But this peace is called the peace of God because it is peace which God works in the soul. I think I hear you exclaim, "To have such a peace as that—a perfect consciousness of full forgiveness, complete acquiescence in the will of God, perfect forgiveness toward all mankind, and an intense desire to live in both saints and sinners—how can I get such a peace within me?" Ah, indeed, how can you? It is impossible to unrenewed human nature. Man by nature is worse than any one wild beast, for he is a menagerie. There is lion in him, and there is serpent in him; there is tiger in him, and there is wolf in him; there is dog in him, and there is devil in him. He is half beast and half devil through the fall. I do not caricature him; his body allies him to the beast, and sin makes him a child of Satan.

Shall the leopard get rid of his spots? Well, that is difficult; but still the task of taking spots out of leopards would be small compared with the miracle of taking evil out of the very core of our wild beast-like heart, and putting into it the peace of God that makes us love. God only can do it. God's own mighty Spirit must put forth that same energy with which He will raise the dead out of their graves at the resurrection; for nothing short of creation and resurrection power is able to transmute this beastly, devilish heart of ours into a heart in which the peace of God shall reign supreme. Well is it called the peace of God.

My dear hearer, do you know this peace? If so, you will understand that, because of its excellence, it is called the peace of God. It is a Hebraism: for among the Hebrews they called certain mountains that were higher than others the hills of God; and certain gigantic trees, such as the cedars of Lebanon, were the trees of God that were full of sap. So the peace that is greater than every other peace is called the peace of God—it means the holiest, deepest peace. It is "perfect peace"—peace that nothing disturbs: deep peace—"the peace of God, which passeth all understanding": solemn peace at which you almost stand in awe—a hush within the soul in which there is heard nothing of discord or of fear, but a stillness reigns like that which was maintained in the Holy of Holies, within the veil, where seraphim were silent above the mercy-seat. "The peace of God." Oh, I have known it! You, too, my brethren, must have known it when the Lord Himself has dwelt within your hearts, and kept all adversaries far away. You have then known days of heaven upon the earth. It has left nothing to wish for except the perpetuation of itself, for you have been satisfied with favor and full of the goodness of the Lord, filled with all the fullness of God, anchored fast, settled, grounded, established.

> "My heart is resting, O my God!
> I will give thanks and sing.
> My heart is at the secret source
> Of every precious thing."

That is the peace of God.

Win it, dear friends, and wear it. By God's good Spirit enter into this serene haven. Rest in the Lord, and be happy in Him, for He is our peace! When the Lord and Giver of peace once comes to tarry in your heart let Him rest there; and charge all about you, by the roes and by the hinds of the field, that they stir not up nor awake your love until He please.

II. But now the second piece of advice that grows out of the text let us consider. If you possess that peace of God,

LET IT OCCUPY THE THRONE:

let the peace of God rule in your hearts.

In order to there being any peace in the heart, or anywhere else, there must be a ruler. Those people who are for putting down all kings and principalities and powers may bid farewell to peace. Anybody who is inclined to anarchy should read Carlyle's "French Revolution" through with care, and ask himself whether the worst king is not, after all, a deal better than the despotism of the mob, the carnival of misrule, wherein every man doth that which is right in his own eyes, and all eyes love darkness rather than light. Let loose the reins of government, let everybody be equal to everybody else, and a little bigger than everybody else as well, and you will soon see what confusion ensues. See how it is in a house! I hear that there was great deliberation over those census-papers in many families to know who was the head of the household; but I am quite clear that it was not a happy household where that question took long to answer; for the husband is the head of the wife, and where he is not so, everything is out of order, monstrous, outrageous.

Where the head is not the head, the hand is not the hand, the eye is not the eye, the heart is not the heart; and nothing is itself at all. All is what it should not be, and all is misery. You must have a governing faculty somewhere; and, within your own soul, if nothing governs, I tell you boldly the devil governs. That man who does not control himself is controlled by the devil, for he must have a master somewhere. We cannot have two masters, but it is quite as certain that we must have one. One power or another will master you. Shall it be your Creator, or His enemy? your Saviour, or your destroyer?

It is a blessed gift of grace if a man is enabled by the Holy Spirit to say, "The peace of God shall rule in my heart." Paul advised this: "Let the peace of God rule in your hearts:" if it is in your hearts at all, it must rule, for it has power to put down all rebellion. You know, when we have a government and a magistracy with power at their back, if a riot arises, we appeal to the lawful power to come and protect us, and put down the uproar. So in our hearts, if we have and that master principle is the peace of God, we may warrantably pray, "O Lord, put down this riot. I am tossed to and fro in my heart about my circumstances; I do not like them, and I quarrel with God about them. Come, peace of God; come, and put down my murmuring. Come and calm my wicked, discontented spirit."

Or do I feel some discord in my spirit toward one whom I ought to love? I must cry, "Come, peace of God. Come, and arrest this bad temper of mine. Handcuff it. Take it off to prison.

Give it hard labor and short commons; bring it down till it is no longer able to rebel as it does. Come, peace of God, and help me in the struggles of my daily life, that I may not break out into anger, and wrath, and malice, and all uncharitableness. Come, peace of God, put forth thy mighty power over my soul." This is the great remedy for the discord within and the discords without; the grand cure for all distempers of the east wind, and all beside.

We ought to have the peace of God ruling in our hearts so as to let it decide our course, and lead us to do that which is consistent with with God. I do not know how you find it, but I know that I cannot afford to be angry. It takes so much that is valuable out of me. I am sure it does.

It does a man an immense mischief physically; to some men it is a dangerous thing to get excited, it even endangers their lives. But, spiritually, I believe that to get into a state of enmity toward anybody is one of the most grievous diseases which can befall a Christian. In such a case you cannot pray as you did; you cannot read some passages of Scripture as you did; you cannot look the Well beloved in the face, and say, "I am acting in a way that pleases Thee." It is, therefore, a very serious thing for a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ to break his own peace—serious to himself as well as to those that are round about him.

Let the peace of God always rule, or otherwise you will not always be safe. Especially let the peace of God rule your affections. Be satisfied that you love God, and that your heart cleaves to God, and does not follow after any other. Be at peace with God as to your heart, and, when that is so, and the affections are dominated by conscious love to God, it is then that you fight the battles of life with comfort to yourself, and with honor to the name of Him to whom you belong.

III. Very briefly, I want, in the third place, to say,

STRENGTHEN YOURSELF,

dear friend, by God's Spirit, with arguments, in order that you may let the peace of God rule in your hearts, and may be kept from any breach of that heavenly peace.

Remember, you can only yourself be happy in heart and healthy in spirit as long as you keep the peace of God. You are sure to become wretched and unhappy, you are sure to stumble here and there into faults, if that peace of God be gone. As you would be in the best possible trim for walking with God in joy while here below, look to your peace. This is no mean argument; try to feel the force of it.

And, next, only thus can the church of God prosper. I am grieved when I receive members from other churches, who come because they say that they are weary of the incessant bickerings and jealousies which have disturbed their rest. I am sure that there can be no blessing where there is no peace. A house divided against itself cannot stand. A church disputing is a church committing suicide. Many and many a church has come to its death by bleeding inwardly through strife; otherwise it might have defied the whole world, and hell itself. It is generally the little churches that squabble most; if they cannot excel in anything else, they certainly claim

THE FIRST RANK IN QUARRELLING.

A few Christian people get together to serve God, and the devil comes in at once and sets them by the ears; they are good men and true, but Satan bewitches them so that they dispute about nothing at all.

Whenever I have to settle a dispute, I always like to have some big, bad thing in it. This I can point out, and we soon agree to set the matter right. When I cannot with microscopes on my eyes find out what it is all about, I find that brothers and sisters are hardest to be reconciled. It is easier to shoot an owl than a gnat. Little differences rankle like tiny thorns, and you cannot get them out of the flesh. Oh, that the Spirit of God would come upon the churches, and turn them into masses of fire; then they would not fall to pieces through intestine strife!

Remember, next, that God cannot be glorified unless there is the peace of God in our hearts. My dear friend, if you are always troubled, and fretting, and anxious, I do not see how you can glorify God to any large extent. Seek more faith, more trust, more confidence, more calm of mind, and you will personally glorify God.

The passage from which our text is taken offers us other reasons. It says this: "To the which also ye are called." You were called to the peace of God. My dear brother, if you are not a peaceful man you have not inherited your true calling. When the Lord called you out from the world, He called you to be

A PEACE-MAKER.

He called you on purpose that the Spirit of peace might be shed abroad in your heart, and that afterward you might carry that peace with you into your own family and among all your neighbors, and spread it everywhere. The Lord Jesus never called a man to be a maker of strife. If a Christian woman, as she calls herself, goes from house to house with tittle-tattle, she was not called by God to do so; of that I am certain. A man goes into his pulpit, and preaches a personal sermon on purpose to empty out his own spleen. God did not call him to that, for God loves not firebrands. The man may have been sent as a messenger from other regions, but certainly not as an ambassador from heaven, when he preaches gall and wormwood.

Some seem, wherever they go, to make mischief as speedily as possible; their mission is contention, whereunto they certainly were not called of God. You who are the true heirs of heaven are called to peace; seek peace, and pursue it. Wherever you go, labor earnestly to make peace. If you see two boys fighting, make them leave off. If you see two girls in a bad temper, try to make them happy with one another. If you see two people disagree in business, do not back one of them up, and cry, "Go to law with him," but plead for peace and mutual concession. "Blessed are the peace-makers." Whatever you may be in a household, whether father or child, husband or wife, master or servant, son-in-law or mother-in-law, let your soul be seasoned and savored with that blessed word, "Peace."

There is always a war party in England: I fear the Jingo is no foreigner, but the genuine offspring of the British bull-dog.

AN UNCONVERTED BRITISHER

is all for blood, and fire, and glory; and as the unconverted are the majority among us, we remain a fighting nation. Fighting—how we delight in it! Down with the Afghans, down with the Zulus! The Boers—destroy them! We cannot get our fill of glory and honor unless we get knee deep in blood. The policy of peace is voted dishonorable, and so we go from land to land till there is hardly a nation which has not been stained with blood by British hands. How fiercely these English talk; but it is not Christian talk. May the Lord teach us the language of peace. Be you at peace, "whereunto also you were called."

IV. The last point upon which I shall speak is this—to keep yourselves right, OCCUPY YOUR MINDS HEALTHILY.

"How?" say you. The text says, "Be ye thankful." That is the way to keep up our peace with God. "Be thankful." Do not complain, but bless His name for everything. Do not quarrel with Him, but be thankful. Say, "Shall we receive good at the hands of the Lord, and shall we not receive evil? The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, and blessed be the name of the Lord." That is the way to be at peace with Him, to be thankful at all times. "He hath not dealt with us after our sins." Be thankful.

Well, but it does not mean only, "Be thankful to God," but be ye thankful to your fellow-men. Too many receive all kinds of Christian kindness as a matter of course. They look upon the spontaneous kindness of their brethren as a sort of right. Now, that the poor should be helped by Christian generosity is certainly according to Scripture; but this is an obligation not of debt but of grace. Whatever is done in almsgiving and charity should be gratefully and heartily received. It is an unholy spirit which scarcely has the courtesy to say "thank you." Toward one another we ought to have a thankful spirit.

How thankful the child ought to be to his mother and his father! What a happy home we should have if children recognized the deep debt of obligation that is really due to those who have nursed them and cared for them so long! How obliged, I think, the husband ought to be to his wife for all her tender kindnesses—those hundred unseen ministries of love! How grateful, I think, the wife should be to her husband, for all his labors and anxieties! She receives a thousand things from him which make life comfortable. If we live in mutual gratitude, feeling that we are, each one of us, indebted to all others, how merrily will the household wheels go round, and what families of love we shall all gather around us!

I am

NOT INCLINED TO QUARREL

with anybody; I would sooner run a mile than I would fight for half a minute. There is nobody in the world that I would like to contend with; my heart is full of good wishes to all men. It has been a sort of rule with me before I fight him; if he is bigger than I am I know he will beat me, and so I decline battle; and if he is smaller, and I can easily beat him, it would be cruel and cowardly to do so. Nobody in the world is worth contending against as to our temporal interests. Even necessary law is troublesome and vexatious. Be ye thankful, then; and if, with thankfulness to God and thankfulness to those around you, you can fill up the day, oh, how happy will the days be! In the family and in the business God will be glorified; the church will be sweetened and welded together; we shall see better times, and shall no longer grumble at the east wind. May God bless you!

A Ringleader in Mischief in an English City was three years ago as low down in the social scale as it was possible to be. A Mildmay deaconess says: "His attention was first arrested by seeing in our common lodging-house for single men a Christian kneel down in the presence of his companions in the room to pray to God. For the first time in his life he thought there was something real in that fellow's religion, whatever it meant. Marvellously soon came the change over his own bad life to one of such simple, childlike trust in Christ that his face, with its calm, quiet, serene expression, speaks of the inward peace. His workmates in the house where he works as a weaver or maker of fringe have felt the strange power of his changed life, and his new religion, as they call it; and the little deed of kindness done to some who had been cruel in their mocking him at first, and the kind word to those who had been bitter against him, have wonderfully caused the enemy to cease tormenting. He is not more than twenty four years old, and for the last year and a half has been a martyr to rheumatism, from exposure to cold and want of sufficient warm clothing in the winter. From childhood he has had a delicate constitution, and the reckless life he led for so many years, and never being able to have the comforts he needed—all now are telling on his health. The constant pain he suffers in almost every joint of his body makes the struggle for daily bread difficult, and the supply of food for himself and Christian wife is insufficient; yet no murmuring word is heard from either. Their one word ever is, 'Oh! the Lord will help, we know.' It is touching to see his patience in all his weakness." How true it is that "if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature."

Mrs. Tait's Visit to a Dying Christian.

THE REV. CRAUFORD TAIT.

near death, until May 29th, when a new symptom showed itself and he questioned his father as to how the matters stood, and received with perfect calmness the statement of the real truth, that there was great danger, but still hope. "I submit myself," he said, "entirely to God's will."

At five o'clock that same evening his medical attendant observed a sudden change. He summoned the family at once, and said that as far as he could judge, Craufurd could not survive above an hour. The Archbishop again told his son of the immediate danger; he received the intelligence with calmness, and set himself to use the hour, feeling that as before his business had been to live, so now it was to die. The presence of those he loved greatly cheered and comforted him. He was most calm; and having addressed kindly words to each, turned over on his side like a tired child, and fell asleep in Jesus.

THE LATE MRS. TAIT.

THIS estimable lady (whose portrait is given on the front page) was the youngest daughter of the late venerable Archdeacon Spooner, vicar of Elmdon, Warwickshire.

The late Archbishop's first introduction to her was in the year 1834, when she was on a visit in Worcestershire, and when she was only fourteen years old. Major Henry O'Brien, the brother-in-law of Gerard Noel, "the most loved and honored uncle of the family at Elmdon Parsonage," had much to do with the first distinct awakening of the spiritual life in Catherine's mind. It was at the age of 23 years that she was married to Dr. Tait, then Head Master of Rugby Grammar School, in 1843.

No sooner was the pleasant marriage tour finished than the bride and bridegroom plunged at once into their busy life at Rugby. The life of the school-house was always busy, and had naturally many anxieties. Beside several hundred boys outside, there were seventy inside the school-house. The servants, whose business it was to attend to these, formed a large household to be ruled by the young mistress; but she braced herself for each days' duties by prayer in public, from which she returned to family prayer. From the first she began the practice, which she continued all through life, of teaching all the younger maid-servants of her household, and praying with them on Sundays. The boys loved to look upon her face, while those who were in the sick-room were her especial care.

In 1849 her husband removed to the Deanery at Carlisle, and she soon made her home a centre to which the poor looked for sympathy and help. From six to seven quiet, useful, happy years passed away; then, on a day in the early spring of 1856, the clouds darkened and a change came upon the family at the Deanery, with the suddenness and overpowering force of a thunderstorm. In six weeks five loved daughters were laid in the churchyard at Stanwix. "The shock had been overpowering," wrote her husband, "but we cherished our dear little son and baby-girl, and read together and prayed together, and bathed our spirits in the beauties that surrounded us, by God's mercy there came over us a holy calm."

ACTIVITIES IN LONDON.

Dr. Tait having been appointed in September 1856, to the See of London, at once the Bishop's wife began to devote herself to the important work of her new position. She did all she could to make the acquaintance of the London clergy, numbering about one thousand; she threw open the drawing-rooms at London House, and invited to a friendly gathering as many of the clergy as the house could hold. She visited frequently among the poor, both in their cottages and in the almshouses and the poor-house, and interested herself in hospitals and penitentiaries for females.

OUTBREAK OF CHOLERA.

The year 1866 is memorable in the history of this devoted lady's efforts. In the summer, cholera broke out in London. The whole district which had any connection with the river Lea was infected. The Bishop and his wife regularly visited the plague-stricken localities. Not only did she visit the hospitals, but acted as guide to several clergymen who distributed relief among a miscellaneous crowd of those whose families were suffering from the plague.

This visitation of the cholera led to the crowning labor of her life. Mrs. Gladstone, Miss Marsh, and herself—the three Catherines as they were termed—had each of them her spirit stirred to undertake the charge of some of those many orphans whom the cholera left destitute; and institutions, still vigorously at work, were the result. Mrs. Tait hired a house for the girls, and soon established St. Peter's Orphanage, which has continued growing ever since. It cannot be doubted that the ever-present thought of her own children whom she had lost was, after her love for Christ, an incentive to her care for these destitute little girls. In 1869 a permanent orphanage was commenced in the Isle of Thanet.

HER EFFORTS FOR THE POOR OF LAMBETH.

In 1869 her husband, the Bishop of London, was elevated to the Archbishopric of Canterbury. Mrs. Tait accepted the change, and in the spirit of prayer quietly prepared herself for the duties of her new sphere. Soon followed her first visit to stay with the Queen when the Archbishop was called to do homage at Osborne. She was soon plunged in all the social and other duties of Lambeth. How well she bore herself in her onorous position many have testified who were brought within the range of her influence. Lambeth Palace stands in the midst of a dense, poor population, in whose welfare she and her daughters soon became deeply interested, repeatedly visiting among the sick and aged (as shown in the picture on this page).

ILLNESS AND HAPPY DEATH.

During a brief tour in Scotland, just after the marriage of her second daughter, on Thursday, November 30th, 1878, she became very ill, and Dr. Carpenter having been telegraphed for, arrived in Edinburgh on the following Saturday evening. By this time she was utterly prostrated, and spoke to her eldest daughter of what she wished in the event of her death. On Sunday, December 1st, she was worse. By mid-day her case was hopeless. Her speech—from the setting in of congestion of the lungs—had become very difficult, but her mental faculties were unimpaired. Her husband administered the Holy Communion to her. She audibly joined in everything so far as her impeded speech would allow. Her husband tried to repeat the hymn,

"Jesus, lover of my soul," and when he faltered, through grief, she supplied the missing words. Her daughters then sang to her some favorite hymns, and when they had finished, the Archbishop repeated to her the lines:

"And with the morn those Angel faces smile,
Which I have loved long since, and lost awhile."

"Yes, yes," she exclaimed, and spoke of her dear ones who had gone before, stretching out their hands to welcome her. About ten o'clock at night her breathing ceased with a gentle sigh, and she was gone.

Thus ended her earthly life of fifty-nine years, refreshed from her childhood onward, through Divine grace, by a well-spring of joy within which poured forth in acts of kindliness to all whom she could reach.

MRS. ROBINSON'S VISITOR.

"THERE'S another knock, I declare," said Mrs. Robinson; "do go down, Clara, and see who it is. I am that tired with the up and down stairs I feel as if I should faint." Mrs. Robinson did not look the kind of lady addicted to fainting, nor did the healthy color of her face indicate that there was any immediate cause for alarm in that direction, but she was evidently fatigued. She was a little too bulky to bear easily the labor of climbing the steep flight of stairs that led to the upper floor of the house. And she had made many such journeys lately. Her husband was sick and required a good deal of attention, and Mrs. Robinson, being a good wife and being firmly convinced that no one could wait on her William so well as herself, did not spare her footsteps. But she felt tired, nevertheless, and so when she had carried up the teatray, and was sitting down by the bedside to see the sick man enjoy his meal, she was naturally vexed to hear a sharp rap on the door.

"It's a young gentleman," said Clara, when she returned from her descent to the street door. "He says he has called to see you; but you were not to hurry down. He just sat down in the parlor, and said he would wait for you."

"Who can it be? What is he like? Don't you know him?" asked Mrs. Robinson all in a breath.

"No, ma'am," said Clara, answering the last question first. "He does not live about here, I guess. He looks more like a city gent, but I never saw him before as I know of."

Mrs. Robinson's curiosity was excited, but she restrained it until William had finished his tea, and then having tucked him up comfortably in bed, she gave a minute or two to tidying up, first the room and then her own person. A clean cap of the kind she had worn for nearly twenty years, and her mother had worn before her, was put on, and a bright ribbon knot on her bosom, and a clean apron completed her toilet. Then she descended, tea-tray in hand, a little flurried, but otherwise ready to entertain her visitor.

Underwood Appeals to Willie Robinson's Mother.

"Sorry to keep you waiting, Sir," said Mrs. Robinson, apologetically, as she set down the tea-tray on the table, but you see William, that's my husband, he's sick. He's a little particular in his appetite, and I like to see to his meals myself, and as you said you did not mind waiting, I thought I'd just stay till he was through before I came down."

"Now, Sir," said Mrs. Robinson, the subject of the sickness being exhausted, "may I ask you what I can do for you."

There was no help for it now, and the young man knew it. "Well," he said, "nothing for me, thank you, Mrs. Robinson, but I hope you will do something for an unfortunate friend of mine. My name is Underwood, Mr. George Underwood, and I am studying medicine in the university with your son Willie."

"Oh, Sir," broke in the good woman, "there is nothing wrong with Willie, is there?"

"Don't distress yourself, my dear creature," said Underwood. "It is trouble, certainly, but it may be very quickly mended, and no one be any the wiser if you see it in the right light. You know Willie is a very handsome lad, and he is very good company, and he has seen a little too much of it, that is where the evil commenced. Willie does not know when he ought to say 'no,' nor how to say it. He was invited out to some party every night, and then he is too proud and too high-spirited to go to other men's parties without being hospitable in his turn, and then there were cards and dice and high play, and the end of it is that Willie is heavily in debt and in despair."

Mrs. Robinson listened to this brief story with a heavy heart. It was a relief to know that the trouble was not that of sickness or death, but it was very sad to learn that Willie, her darling boy, was dissipated and a gambler. He was her idol, loved and almost worshipped by her fond heart. It was a cruel blow that struck her through her boy. "See," she said through her tears, "Willie is our only son, and all we have will be his, but it is not much, and we too must live. We have pinched and saved, his father and I, all these fifteen years that William might have a good education. He is a cruel, ungrateful boy to have spent his parents' savings in gambling, and to have spent his time in pleasure instead of in study. You must excuse a mother, Sir, but I must say that those who have led him to act in this way will have a deal to answer for." A light flashed from the eyes of the old lady as she uttered those words before which Underwood quailed.

"I know that," he said, with a look of distress, "and I assure you, madam, that I am sincerely sorry for any share I may have had in it. This will be a lesson to me as well as to Willie. I have no mother, but I had one a few years ago whom I loved very dearly, and your tears remind me how she would have felt if she were living. I do not mention it as an excuse, but it may help you to understand our position if I tell you that no one at college knew Willie's circumstances. He was always well dressed and had the manners of a gentleman; we did not know the sacrifices that had been made to send him to college, nor that he was spending his parents' hardly-earned savings in his entertainments. If we had known that, there are some among us who have enough right feeling to have checked it; though I grieve to say there are some who would not have been moved by the knowledge."

Mrs. Robinson was sitting rocking herself and weeping quietly while Underwood spoke, and when he ceased there was no fresh outburst. She was practical and was first to settle to business. She said, "If you will tell me, sir, how much Willie owes and what is his present need, I will see what can be done. It is very hard, but he is our only son, and we cannot see him ruined if we can save him."

"I cannot tell you that," Underwood said, "I do not know how much he owes, but this debt is one of five hundred dollars and I am sure there are others, but it is possible they may be postponed. This five hundred dollar amount must be paid the day after to-morrow, or Willie will be arrested for fraud. He does not know I came to you. I told him I would try to get the money for him, but none of the men who have won money off him would loan me a cent, and after I failed with them I contrived to get your address and came to you, for I feared to tell Willie I had failed lest he should be driven to despair." Underwood forbore to tell the mother that when her boy confided in him he had resolved, in his remorse, on suicide and had bought a pistol to carry out his terrible purpose.

"Five hundred dollars may seem a small sum to a gentleman like you, sir," Mrs. Robinson said, "but it is a great deal to me and my husband. But I think we can find so much, if Willie's other creditors will wait. I will have the money here tomorrow, if Willie will come for it himself. It is better that he should do that. I should take it as a favor if you would come too."

Underwood promised he would do so, and was soon on the cars speeding away to the city to acquaint his friend with the news. Willie Robinson was at first indignant that an application to his mother should have been made, but now that the confession had been made for him and he learned that he was delivered in his desperate strait, his anger soon melted. The next day both young men went down to Willie's home. There the good lady handed Willie the money with tears and prayers and entreaties, and then begging them to wait a short time she told them that she had invited the clergyman to meet them, and she expected him every minute.

Happily for both young men Mr. Bromley, the clergyman, was a man of tact and an earnest Christian teacher. Without any allusion to the trouble that had brought Willie home, he spoke to them as a brother about the temptations of college life; of his own struggles and victory through Christ, and commended them to the same source of strength. They returned to college with a totally new view of their state, and with a firm resolve to make their personal salvation their first business. To those who earnestly seek Him, God is ever near, and it was not many days before both were rejoicing in the assurance of salvation. There were no more drinking and card-playing parties in their rooms, nor were they seen at places where those dissipations went on, but gradually their example attracted others, and they were the means of saving several young men who were about commencing the downward path to ruin.

MARGARET MUSGRAVE'S MISFORTUNE.

By the Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

MICHAEL MUSGRAVE'S HOUSEHOLD.

EVERYBODY knew Michael Musgrave; that is to say, everybody who dwelt within the limits of the manufacturing town of Carchester, and even far beyond those limits, for Musgrave's Bank was popular through all the county of which Carchester was the chief town. There were large numbers of people who, had their opinion been sought as to the comparative stability of that and the Bank of England, would have expressed emphatic preference for the former.

He was not exactly what is called a self-made man, for his father before him had inherited the bank from a still earlier progenitor. But Michael Musgrave, by the aid of remarkable ability, unfaltering perseverance, and indomitable energy, had established it on a vastly broader basis and expanded its operations to such a degree that few provincial banks surpassed it either as to the extent of its investments or the strength of its credit. A keen, clever, hard-headed man of the world was Michael Musgrave. Making money and hoarding it was with him a passion in which principle was not permitted to exercise any serious control. Get money honestly if you can, but still get money, was the unspoken, unacknowledged, but yet the governing motto of his life.

As in many another case of the same kind, Michael Musgrave became rich; but whether he did not discover that, as in many another case, he had put his money into a bag full of holes, the sequel will disclose. His urban mansion with which the banking establishment was close allied, was one of the most imposing specimens of architecture of which Carchester could boast. Within its walls were found abounding evidence of luxury and wealth, and one glance at Mrs. Musgrave and their daughter Margaret, full clearly told that these were conscious of their riches, for alike in dress and bearing they were evidently to the manner born.

A tall, commanding-looking matron was Mrs. Musgrave, with whom it was not by any means an easy business or a speedy, to feel thoroughly at home. Quite as sensible of the value of bank-notes and gold as her successful husband was, she was more ambitious than he for rank and influence in the social scale. Her daughter Margaret, equally tall and even more handsome than her good-looking parent, had inherited in an intensified form both these peculiarities. Wealth and position were the gods before which she bowed down to worship, and at their shrines she offered daily sacrifice like the loyal votary she was.

Gifted with a remarkably clear intellect, Margaret Musgrave was, in her way, a reader of books, and her tastes in that direction were such as are not usual among women. Such literary outcomes of a somewhat sceptical age as John Stuart Mills' philosophy, Herbert Spencer's positivism and the like had charms for her which were probably to be accounted for more by her desire to be rid of the irksome restraints of practical Christianity, than any clear conviction of their intrinsic truth. She had a conscience, and would fain travel in the paths of moral rectitude; but, according to her thinking, the afore-mentioned gods of wealth and position demanded greater elasticity of service than the received and formal dogmas of religious faith and practice seemed able to permit. Kindly and generously disposed, she was not slow to aid in matters of charity and philanthropic beneficence, for these enabled her to pay due honor to the deities she worshipped.

The Musgraves were constant in their attendance at the old Abbey Church of Carchester, and Sunday after Sunday they sat in state in the old-fashioned, well-cushioned, high-backed pew which had been the property of the owners of the Musgrave mansion from time immemorial.

The worthy vicar, the Rev. Abel Forsyth by name, was a close and intimate friend of theirs—an intimacy which was strenghtened, in all probability, by the fact that he was somewhat of a worshipper at the same shrine. His highly respectable and careful method of discoursing vaguely on the moral duties chimed in with their own tastes, and never rudely questioned the right of wealth and position to occupy the place of divinities to the children of men. When the Sabbath morning's service was ended, and the Musgrave household stepped into their carriage at the church-door, they rolled homeward perfectly satisfied with themselves and with their vicar, and with their gods—a satisfaction with which, it is to be feared, the God of the Abbey Church had little to do.

The daily life of the Musgraves may readily be implied from what has already been said. The father went about the daily round and common task of money getting, and the chiefest music in his ears all the livelong week was the crisp rustle of bank-notes and the chink of gold. His chief anxieties consisted of choosing the most prudent and remunerative investments, and keeping a careful watch on the solvency of all the names registered on the books of Musgrave's Bank. The old lady found congenial employment in the somewhat magisterial control of her domestics, the maintenance of a proud position in the highest social circle of the city, and in due attention in a somewhat oppressive style to such city organization of a charitable character as enabled them to keep the name and fame of the Musgraves prominently before the citizens.

The sole child and heiress of their house and gear, the handsome Miss Margaret, trod a somewhat similar path, except in domestic affairs, in which she took small concern. Her spare hours, which sooth to say were numerous, were spent in conning the pages of questionable theology, and unquestionable doubt; a study which was relieved in turn by careful ponderings on all the subtleties of the latest fashions, and by turning the vapid pages of the numberless three-volumed effusions which came to hand from Mudie's perennial and exhaustless stores.

It was only a low and somewhat unworthy plane of existence for a young lady, good looking and intelligent, of five-and-twenty summers, to move on, especially with two such genii as wealth and position to act as slaves to the lamp of her will; but you see these were not slaves as they ought to have been, but deities worshipped and obeyed, and that makes all the difference. Whether this unsatisfactory state of things will be suffered to continue, or whether this young life will find a nobler and more elevating sphere of action will in due time be seen.

Matters in Michael Musgrave's household continued in much the same fashion, until the advent of a new curate at the Old Abbey Church introduced quite a new element into their experience. The Rev. Abel Forsyth had for some time past been conscious of the failure of his physical powers. His eye was dim, and his natural strength abated. This failure did not appear greatly to affect his mental abilities, probably because there was less room for it there to do so. Like a sensible man, he had come to the conclusion that it would be well to secure an assistant in the not too arduous duties, as he read them, connected with his clerical office. True, his devotion to the twin deities of wealth and position made it difficult for him to spare even a curate's humble stipend from the very liberal income he enjoyed as vicar of the Abbey Church. Still, there were compensations; a little more ease, a little more time at his disposal; and the credit of showing such interest in the welfare of his parishioners were to be reckoned on the other side.

So it came to pass that the Rev. Noel Cleveland was installed in the office of curate at a not too liberal stipend of four hundred dollars a year. Of course, the position occupied by Mr. Cleveland gave him entrance into circles even of the Musgrave level; but the sadly meagre limit of his wealth sensibly and prejudicially affected the warmth of his welcome at the banker's house. At the church, however, they were bound to recognize him as their clerical instructor. The high-backed, well-cushioned pew must be regularly occupied; their wealth and position alike demanded it. Therefore, whoever occupied the pulpit and the desk, must be regarded for his office' sake.

As the Rev. Noel Cleveland will prove to be a somewhat prominent character in this brief story, it will be requisite to give him a fuller and more complete introduction to the reader. He was the only son of his mother, and she a widow. The death of his father while he was but a boy, left his widowed parent in somewhat straitened circumstances. A kindly disposed relative, who had both the means and the will, undertook to secure Noel's education and training for clerical life. In coming to this decision he was not guided, as is too often the case, by the sole idea of providing the youth with a livelihood. In childhood and early youth, Noel had been studious and thoughtful beyond his years; and under the godly influence and pious teachings of both his parents, he had in early life become a decided Christian; and had constantly expressed his hope that some day or other he might become a preacher of the Gospel.

His college career was not marked by the attainment to any high honors in scholarship; but his character and conduct, his zeal and sincerity, had won for him the high esteem of his tutors and the love of the best of his compeers. He might in all probability have secured, so far as emoluments were concerned, a better position than that which the Rev. Abel Forsyth had given him; but his kindly relative resided in Carchester, and desiring to have him near, he advised its acceptance, and promised to afford his young protégé a welcome addendum to his meagre salary.

Noel Cleveland was a somewhat stalwart and thoroughly good-looking young man. He had a pleasant, open face; and his dark and somewhat piercing eyes, arched by expressive brows, had a peculiar faculty of catching and holding the attention of lookers-on almost in spite of themselves. When his face was in repose, earnestness of purpose was its most prominent expression; at other times, it was lighted up with a quiet and winsome smile; and at others, those dark eyes of his, aided by two perpendicular lines on his brow, could express reproof, disapprobation, wrath, in a fashion that made the object of the look exceedingly uncomfortable.

Thus far, his outward appearance and deportment and gentlemanly manners were quite sufficient to secure a certain dignified approval and semi-patronage from the stately Mrs Musgrave, and her equally stately and handsome daughter. Michael Musgrave could not be induced to see that there was "anything in him;" but that probably meant that as his pockets had not anything in them, it did not much matter what else he had. According to his judgment, wealth and position made a very good pair; but position without wealth was a very limp affair indeed.

The first time that Mr. Cleveland made his public appearance in the Abbey Church, he had but to conduct the Liturgical service, the Rev. Abel Forsyth having arranged to preach the usual sermon himself. The worthy vicar had an idea, you see, that his position was somewhat elevated in his having a clerical servitor at command, and so he lost no time in reaping the honor which was attached thereto. On this occasion the Musgraves deigned to be perfectly satisfied, and even to express themselves as more than pleased with the way in which the new curate read the beautiful Liturgy of the Episcopal Church.

Miss Margaret expressed her opinion that he would do very well indeed; she thought he was a little more energetic, and threw a little more feeling into the work, than there was any occasion for; but she dared say that that was due to nervousness in his new position, and, she might have added, in the presence of the Musgrave household. This favorable verdict, however, soon came to be materially modified, for the worthy vicar, having done himself the honor of introducing Mr. Cleveland to his congregation, soon found it convenient to leave the entire service in Mr. Cleveland's hands.

When in the pulpit, the new curate departed entirely from the lines so long laid down and followed by his superior. So far from dealing in empty platitudes, vague moralities, and meaningless formulas of speech, the Rev. Noel Cleveland preached an earnest, powerful, evangelic sermon; preached it, let it be understood, not read it; and in such a fashion, as for once in his life, at any rate, to prevent even Michael Musgrave from enjoying his usual snatch of slumber in the high-backed pew. As the curate gave the message of his divine Master—a message of warning, expostulation, exhortation, and Gospel promise—the congregation, which had sat so long lulled by the somniferous periods of Mr. Forsyth, were fain to look at the preacher with wonder, and then with equal wonder at each other, marvelling whereto all these things would grow.

After the first sermon, Miss Margaret Musgrave said but little; after the second, she expressed her disapproval, a disapproval emphatically endorsed by her parents; after the third sermon, in which the curate had been even more than usually faithful, delivering his home-thrusts with unsparing hand, she declared with much vigor that Mr. Cleveland was unbearable, and that she should tell the vicar all her mind upon the subject.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Moral Dynamite is the Weapon now Advocated by Michael Davitt for use against the English Government. In a speech he recently delivered he said he made his recent speech at Navan because it was necessary to remind the government that it must save the people from famine. He did not preach violence or crime. He relied solely on the moral dynamite of ideas, in which there was sufficient strength to crush landlordism. Mr Davitt took occasion to inveigh bitterly against crime in Ireland. Agrarian crime, he says, killed the Land League, and it must be done away with, no matter who is responsible for it. Speaking on the pacification of Ireland, he said an orderly state of things could never be established while an alien government and an alien rule were maintained in that country. He asserted that public works, such as drainage and the improvement of waste lands, if carried out, might do away with the necessity for emigration. He suggested that a committee of independent English and Irish gentlemen should be appointed to inquire into Irish grievances. A resolution was unanimously adopted declaring that the only satisfactory solution of the Irish difficulty was the government of Ireland by Irishmen.

The Floods in Germany are Reported by cable as continuing their destructive work. The Rhine and its tributaries, from the Lake of Constance to Cologne, continue to rise rapidly. Many bridges and banks of dams have been destroyed. A bridge near Lörrach, in Baden, gave way and twenty persons were drowned. The river Inn has overflowed its banks at Passau, and the Danube has overflowed in Upper Austria. On Friday the despatches from the flooded district said there seems to be a ceaseless downpour of rain. The Rhine has risen ninety centimetres at Cologne during the night, flooding the lower town and part of the quay. Frankfort-on-the-Main is flooded. At Mannheim the river Neckar has risen considerably, and the firemen and soldiers are ordered to be ready to assist the population. The rains have flooded Stursuline. Several towns in the valley of the Doubs are inundated. The Jura and Berne Railway has been serious damaged. The Salzkammergut district in Austria is threatened with inundation. The Danube River Steam Navigation Company has notified owners of merchandise stored in the Prater Quay, Vienna, to remove their goods. The Linz Quay is under water.

The British Court, it is Reported, has Decided on resuming diplomatic relations with the Pope. It is now three centuries since England last sent an ambassador to the Papal Court. A prominent secular journal calls attention to the fact as "a sign of the times," and also draws attention to a remarkable coincidence in which two other European Powers are concerned. It says: For the first time since the outbreak of the Culturkampf, a Prussian minister has been accredited to the Pope, and an equally important concession has been made by the Czar of Russia in the acknowledgment of the right of the Roman See to appoint the Polish bishops. A still more important sign of the times is the proposal of Great Britain to send a diplomatic representative to the Vatican on the same footing as that occupied by the Prussian envoy. If it shall turn out that arrangements for such official recognition have been made upon terms satisfactory to both parties, the object will have been attained for which a strong body of English Catholics, headed by Mgr. Capel, have long earnestly contended on the ground that such a resumption of diplomatic relations is the legitimate outcome of the policy inaugurated by the Emancipation act of 1829.

The Leaders in the Egyptian Insurrection have been finally sentenced by the Egyptian Government under the guidance of Lord Dufferin, the British diplomatist. Arabi Pasha Toulba, Abdelal, Mahmoud Fehmy, Ali Fehmy, Yakoub Sami, and Mahmoud Sami, condemned to exile in Ceylon, were accompanied to Suez by Mr. Mark Napier, one of the counsel who defended them. The Moniteur Egyptien publishes decrees concerning other rebel prisoners. Emin Bey el Shemsy and eleven others will be placed under surveillance for various terms of years, during which they are forbidden to quit their estates. They are to be placed under heavy bail for the faithful observance of this injunction. Hassan Moussa-el-Akid and Ali Roubi are to be banished to Massowan for twenty years. Three others will be banished to Suakim or Kosseir for shorter terms, and twenty others, including Kadr-Kadr and Riforat Bey, will be banished for various terms of years.

The Future of Egypt, According to Despatches from European courts, appear to be shaping itself under a British protectorate. The Paris correspondent of the London Times states that England proposes to send a note to the Powers, including France, explaining what she intends doing for the reorganization of Egypt. England decided to send the note because it was evident that M. Duclerc, President of the French Council, influenced by considerations connected with the maintenance of his position, would not otherwise either come to an agreement with England or break off negotiations. The correspondent adds that the great majority of the Powers would be willing to assent to a British protectorate over Egypt.

Another Immense Fire Occurred in London on December 26th. A cable despatch to the New York Herald says: The two upper floors of William Whiteley's furniture store, on Queen's Road, Bayswater, have been burned out. Notwithstanding only the two floors were destroyed, the damage is very great, as the establishment is one of the largest in London. Twenty-five engines were engaged in subduing the flames. A detached warehouse, six stories in height, belonging to Mr. Whiteley, was also burned out. Mr. Whiteley's loss by to-night's fire is $100,000. Another establishment in which the same merchant does business was destroyed by fire on December 17th. No clew to the origin of the fires has been obtained.

Renewed Complaints in Regard to the Treatment of the Jews are again appearing in the Russian newspapers. It is stated that the railway companies have ordered the discharge of their Jewish employés. The Prefect of St. Petersburg has ordered that no indulgence shall be shown to Jews residing in the capital without official leave. The Senate has decided that no court can authorize the transfer of land to a Jew.

The Anarchists of Europe, their Ceaseless intrigues and protean disguises, continue to make demands upon the most vigilant attention of the governments of the Continent. France seems to be in a volcanic condition, and at any hour an unfortunate coincidence of circumstances might precipitate a disastrous eruption. Russia has her hands full of domestic difficulties, and is troubled by foreign imbroglios. Moscow and St. Petersburg are veritable hotbeds of Nihilistic revolutionism, which derives not only passive recognition but also active support from the intelligent and professional classes of the land, headed by the students of the universities. Hungary and Austria suffer, in common with their national neighbors, from an almost intolerable incubus of lawlessness and apprehension, their own subjects profiting apparently by the unhandsome and barbaric example recently set by the officials of the Dual Government toward the Jews. Germany is being crushed by the oppressiveness of her indigenous militarism, while her internal condition is one of discord and socialistic disintegration. Everywhere, in Europe, at least, the immediate outlook is most portentous, and the "signs of the times" presage the accelerating nearness of catastrophe, political, moral, and social.

A Gloomy Picture of the State of Ireland is drawn by an influential English journal which says: "Disturbing intelligence comes from all parts of Ireland. The tone of the meetings that have lately been held in different quarters is more threatening than ever. The declarations respecting the failure of the Land Act and the general collapse of the Arrears Act are almost universal in the country. The political ill-feeling is being fed by the agricultural distress, especially in Connaught. If we may believe the Carrick-on-Shannon Board of Guardians, something not short of absolute famine is impending over the district which they control. One half the grain crops, it is said, was never gathered, on account of the severe weather which prevailed toward the end of the harvest time, and the potato crop in many parts is a complete failure. In short, the outlook is, if possible, gloomier than ever; and, however much the contrary is to be desired, it is to be feared that England is a long way yet from being rid of the burden of her Irish trouble." The London Graphic also remarks: "Never, perhaps, since the outbreak of 1798, if then, have the citizens of Dublin felt so insecure as they feel just now. The Phœnix Park butcheries were inflicted on officials, and every one is not an official; but when, within a few days, a judge, a detective, and a juryman were attacked, the alarm spread like wildfire."

Prince Krapotkine, the Russian Agitator, has been arrested on French soil and has been sent to Lyons for trial. He was suspected of complicity in the recent outbreaks in Lyons, and the police were instructed to search his house. Compromising documents were found, and he was, in consequence, arrested on December 20th. He is an untiring worker in the cause of Nihilism. He was arrested in 1877 by the Russian Government and imprisoned in a fortress near St. Petersburg, but he effected an escape and is supposed to have since spent most of his time at Geneva.

Mr. Eli Johnson's Lecturing Tour in Australia is arousing a powerful temperance movement there. A Launceston journal describes an enthusiastic meeting held in that city in the Mechanics' Institute, at which Mr. Johnson delivered an address. Ministers of the various denominations occupied seats on the platform and took part in the proceedings. Mr. Johnson's appeals and the revelations of his black box have made a deep impression wherever he has gone, and it is hoped that a genuine and permanent revival of Gospel temperance in Australia has commenced.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BINDER.

NUMEROUS applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case, in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding, at the end of the year. To meet this demand a stock of such covers has been prepared and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address, on the receipt of one dollar. Application should be made to THE MANAGER, 63 Bible House, New York.

AMONG the names of the heroes of the missionary field who have laid down their lives in that noble cause, is that of John Furniss Ogle, whose portrait, together with sketches of four scenes in his life, appears this week on the front page. He was born on February 1st, 1823, in the rectory-house of the parish of Skirbeck, near Boston, England. He was the eldest son of the Rev. J. F. Ogle, an Episcopal clergyman. His mother was a woman of refined mind, and of much intellectual vigor, which seems to have been inherited by her son. She fell asleep in Jesus before he had attained the age of four years.

EARLY RELIGIOUS TRAINING.

Mr. Ogle owed much in early youth to the careful education and watchfulness of his father's sister, Charlotte Ogle, who took charge of the four children that were left motherless. This lady was assiduous in the religious and moral training of those thus committed to her, and by her care John's memory was early stored with considerable portions of Holy Scripture.

In the year 1838, when he was fifteen years old, the lad was sent to Rugby. There, though conspicuous among his sunny-hearted fellow-pupils for his amiability and cheerfulness of temperament, he manfully persevered in the daily habit of prayer and reading the Bible, in spite of the annoyance which he received from some of his school companions. His abhorrence of bad language and of untruthfulness, or unfairness of any kind, drew down upon him much treatment that was hard to bear.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.

After spending a year with a private tutor, Mr. Ogle, in 1842, entered as a student at Jesus College, Cambridge, where his father had held a fellowship. Mr. Ogle read much, but not steadily. His imagination beguiled him from the prescribed path of university study to topics which those studies suggested. Concurrently with this irregularity in his course of study, other irregularities of habit and acts of self-indulgence took hold of him. His health gave way; he was subject to great nervous prostration, which he never entirely lost, and to palpitation, which made him at times feel certain that he was suffering from serious and mortal disease of the heart, and the only relief he obtained was in boating and out-door exercise, which temporarily restored him.

SKETCH BY A SISTER.

The young man's condition at Cambridge has been very touchingly described by his sister: "Of his religious life at Cambridge little that is satisfactory can be said. 'A Siberian winter' had fallen upon his soul. His views upon the sanctity of the Sabbath, upon inspiration, and upon some other questions, were shaken; he entered into metaphysical inquiry, and to anxious friends at home his mind seemed to be tossed upon the troublous ocean of human speculations, and reasonings on things divine; in danger of losing his anchor-hold, and of drifting into a restless and miserable scepticism. It was the time of battle between the pride of intellect and the spirit of faith within him; and though he came forth not unscathed out of the battle-field, yet his spiritual life, being sustained by Jesus, survived the agonizing conflict, while by it he was enabled in after years to help those who had fallen into the same temptation and to sympathize in their sufferings and difficulties."

SPIRITUAL DARKNESS.

It is only too evident that Mr. Ogle had fallen from his first love, had become careless, had sinned against conscience, and in mercy God hid His face from him. He was now made to taste "the pains of hell and the sorrows of death," that he might know from what a doom he had been rescued, and might the more prize his deliverance. He was also taught at this period, that if he would make progress in the Christian life, he must cherish a spirit of simple, humble dependence on Christ; not only as his Saviour from hell, but also as his Deliverer from the power of sin. Brought at last to the very brink of despair, and made to feel himself the chief of sinners, he went forth into the world to tell men that in him they saw "a brand plucked out of the burning," and to intreat them to cast themselves on the same all-sufficient Saviour whose mercy had been so gloriously illustrated in himself. Much of the zeal of his after life, and the clear knowledge which shone in his teaching, may have come from these hours of darkness.

About this time he took a short voyage with a friend, who in his own yacht visited the coast of Spain and Portugal. This cruise proved to be the first link in the chain of providences by which he was eventually drawn to devote himself to the evangelization of

THE SPANIARDS IN ALGERIA.

He acquired a sufficient knowledge of the language to enable him to enjoy its treasures of literature, and come home full of pity for the condition of a noble and chivalrous but a priest-ridden people.

He accepted a tutorship, in which he remained three years. Early in 1850, he was summoned to his father's death-bed, and the immediate result seems to have been to make him hesitate no longer as to his duty to enter

THE MINISTRY OF THE GOSPEL.

For this office he had been educated, and had in fact been preparing himself while engaged in tuition. In the spring of 1850, Mr. Ogle was ordained, and appointed to a curacy. But, though he labored hard and most successfully, the English climate was found unsuitable to his health, and at the end of five years he was compelled to resign. A short tour in Ireland proved beneficial to him.

NARROW ESCAPE FOR HIS LIFE.

In June 1854, he had a very narrow escape for his life. He and a friend from Cambridge went down to the beach to examine the rocks and to sail upon the water. Alternate thunder-showers and the bright shining which succeeded, the exquisite beauty of cloud, and sea, and shore, tempted them to walk along the beach under the high overhanging cliffs.

During the afternoon two men appeared above them, pursuing their search for eggs of sea-birds hidden on the ledges of the cliffs. Mr. Ogle was watching the dangerous movements of the men. Presently a huge stone, dislodged by the climbers, took a side direction in its fall, bounded on a tuft of grass half way down the cliff, and flew off at an angle toward them. Mr. Ogle darted from the place, and the same instant the stone came crashing down between him and his companion, knocking off a piece of rock where his elbow had leaned a second before. His friend remarked, "Well, John, I never saw a nearer escape for a man's life than that!" (The incident is illustrated in the left-hand section of the upper portion of our front page.)

Later in the year it was again pronounced advisable for him to go away from home for a season, for both body and mind needed bracing anew. He accordingly directed his steps to Orkney and Shetland, where his quick eye, and ready, poetical pen, gathered up and treasured in his letters the novel features of those bleak northern regions.

THE PATAGONIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Having, from conscientious motives, resigned his living as a parish minister, but yet remaining a loyal son of the Episcopal Church, he devoted himself to evangelistic efforts wherever and however God should direct. Having become acquainted with the secretary of the Patagonian Missionary Society, his interest was awakened for "those poor Patagonians, perishing for lack of knowledge," and he thought he perceived the way in which God would have him go. The more he pondered, the more he felt himself drawn to this field of service. The Committee accepted him, and on June 4th, 1856, he sailed from Plymouth, in the company of other members of the mission, as a volunteer to labor in the field at his own charge.

CROSSING THE LINE.

In the middle of July he wrote in a letter home: "The children find a difficulty in conceiving that so much fuss can be about nothing, and hence the questions, 'When shall we see the Line?' 'Where is it, Captain?' to which the captain answered, 'I'll wake you when the ship's keel grates upon it.' 'Oh, then, we shall not see it; it will be dark.' 'No, you'll not see it, but you'll hear it,' says the captain; and, true enough, we did hear it, for the rushing water keeps up a constant rustle as we traverse the zone of ocean which constitutes the Line. We did hear it, for voices raised aloft in songs of praise and prayer and joyous shouts told us the Line was being crossed, and bid us

"'Praise God from whom all blessings flow;'

and, borne on the breeze of night, were the inspiring words of Bishop Heber's hymn:

"'Salvation, oh, salvation!
The joyful sound proclaim,
Till each remotest nation
Has learned Messiah's name,' etc."

The vessel reached Stanley, Falkland Islands, en route for Patagonia, on August 31st, but the missionaries found that no preparation had been made for their reception. But Mr. Ogle was not, and could not be idle. He preached before the governor and townspeople, and visited the ships that put in at Stanley harbor. To some of the crews he appears to have been useful in leading them to the Saviour, or in helping them on in the way of Life.

The difficulties in the way of visiting the coast of Patagonia were such as Mr. Ogle could not foresee before leaving home. He found them, now that he was upon the spot, all but insuperable. While waiting at Stanley for an opportunity of being carried across to his selected mission field, he made occasional excursions among the Falklands.

PURSUED BY A WILD BULL.

At East Falkland an episode occurred (as shown on the right-hand side of the upper portion of our frontispiece). As Mr. Ogle and a Spaniard were one day riding across the country, on horseback, they were suddenly confronted by a wild bull. For a moment the animal stood still, and then charged the horses and their riders. The two riders dispersed, and the bull singling out Mr. Ogle as the object of his attack, gave chase. Matters became so serious that there was a distance of only five yards between Mr. Ogle and the furious monster. But happily after twenty miles more of hard riding, the speed of the bull slackened, and his intended victim reached a place of safety.

At last, Mr. Ogle sailed in an American ship, from Stanley to the neighboring coast of Patagonia, and a few days afterward the opportunity was gladly seized to preach the Gospel of Christ among the natives. He sailed up the river Rio Negro, and on the way encountered numerous perils both from wild beasts and the Indian. Having reached about twenty-five miles from Carmen, he entered into conversation with the people whom he met. He says: "They invited me to enter their booth, which was made of ox-hides stretched over poles of wood, in the same way as gypsies make their wagon-covers serve for tents. The entrance is at a corner; opposite, the beds of the family are arranged; in front of them, the fire. I seated myself upon one of the logs, and taking out my New Testament, read in Spanish several passages illustrative of the love of God in Christ Jesus, and concluded by pressing upon them their need of salvation. They were attentive, and evidently felt every word. I have since sent them a number of copies of the Gospels in Spanish." (This visit of Mr. Ogle is shown in the left-hand section of the lower portion of our frontispiece.)

MISSIONARY TO ALGERIA.

Toward the end of 1858, Mr. Ogle returned to Scotland for the reinvigoration of his health, and halting at Edinburgh, he met with some Christian friends who were planning measures for the evangelization of Spain. He was requested by them to ceding the 7.30 Gospel meeting in the great audience room. In the summer an open-air meeting is held at 8.45 in the public square, only half a block away, after which the large crowd that gathers is invited into the Gospel meeting. After a short practical sermon by Mr. Johnson or some one whom he invites, an invitation is given to the after meeting, always held in the corner room. This room will seat about 150, and is almost always full. The invitation is to Christians who are ready to pray and work for the salvation of sinners, and for those who are ready to accept Christ. This after meeting is the feature of the Sunday evening Gospel meetings. The whole service looks forward to the after meeting. The sermon, the singing, the praying, are all arranged in view of one result, the immediate salvation of sinners. God honors and blesses this aim, and sinners are seen pressing into this corner room and rising for prayer at every Sunday night service. The genial, radiant face and cheerful voice of Mr. Doan are never forgotten by those who attend this after meeting. His hearty welcome and good-by, as he stands at the door and grasps every one by the hand, have the spirit of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. The average attendance at the Sunday evening services is about 1000.

There are meetings for prayer, for testimony, for Bible study, and for temperance, held every night of the week except Friday.

The cost of the building was about $10,000, which stands on a lot owned by the C. C. C. and I. Railroad Company, and loaned to Mr. Doan without rent for the purpose.

THE CHARACTERISTICS AND CONTRASTS OF THE COMING KINGDOM.

By Rev. William Maude.

The Kingdom of Righteousness.

UNRIGHTEOUSNESS IN SOCIAL RELATIONS.

Again, as regards the unrighteousness which pervades the social relations of different classes of the community, even now at the close of the nineteenth century of the Christian era: the unrighteousness of trade; the war of capital against labor, and labor against capital; the iniquities of class legislation; the lawless violence of the masses driven well-nigh to despair by want and suffering; how little hope is there of any effectual amelioration. How sadly applicable even in our own day and in our own country are the prophet's words: "Judgment is far from us, neither doth justice overtake us: we wait for light, but behold obscurity; for brightness, but we walk in darkness. In transgressing and lying against the Lord, and departing away from our God, speaking oppression and revolt, conceiving and uttering from the heart words of falsehood. And judgment is turned away backward, and justice standeth afar off; for truth is fallen in the street, and equity cannot enter. Yea, truth faileth, and he that departeth from evil maketh himself a prey." (Isaiah 59: 9, 13, 15.)

As a recent writer has remarked, in a book which has attracted much attention: "Unpleasant as it may be to admit it, it is at last becoming evident that the enormous increase in productive power which has marked the present century, and is still going on with accelerating ratio, has no tendency to extirpate poverty, or to lighten the burdens of those compelled to toil. It simply widens the gulf between and makes the struggle for existence more intense. The march of invention has clothed mankind with powers of which a century ago the boldest imagination could not have dreamed. But in factories where labor-saving machinery has reached its most wonderful development, little children are at work; wherever the new forces are anything like fully utilized, large classes are maintained by charity or live on the verge of recourse to it; amid the greatest accumulations of wealth men die of starvation, and puny infants suckle dry breasts; while everywhere the greed of gain, the worship of wealth, shows the force of the fear of want. The promised land flies before us like the mirage. The fruits of the tree of knowledge turn as we grasp them to apples of Sodom that crumble at the touch.

"It is true that wealth has been greatly increased, and that the average of comfort, leisure, and refinement has been raised; but these gains are not general. In them the lowest class do not share. I mean that the tendency of what we call material progress is in nowise to improve the condition of the lowest class in the essentials of healthy, happy, human life. Nay, more, that it is to still further depress the condition of the lowest class. The new forces, elevating in their nature though they be, do not act upon the social fabric from underneath, as was for a long time hoped and believed, but strike it at a point intermediate between top and bottom. It is as though an immense wedge were being forced not underneath society, but through society. Those who are above the point of separation are elevated, but those who are below are crushed down."

PROGRESS VERSUS POVERTY.

And these melancholy conclusions are virtually endorsed by the London Times newspaper (October 28th, 1882) when it says, "By some grave defect of our civilization, the advance of the mass (or rather the more favored part) of a nation seems to be accompanied by the degradation, to a point unknown in less developed societies, of a certain number of men and women. . . . . Perhaps we do not always sufficiently consider that the social order from which we reap perennial and solid advantages presents itself under a very different aspect to whole classes of our fellow-citizens.

"When every allowance has been made for the vices so glibly enumerated by those who hold the comfortable theory—that their own ample possessions are a Providential recognition of their virtues and importance in the universe, every serious man must perceive that there is a great mass of hardship which no industry or frugality can greatly alleviate. There are thousands of hard-working and honest men whose life is one long struggle with want, and who escape, if they escape at all, only by leading a joyless existence oppressed with sordid care. . . . Wherever these classes become numerous, they are a danger to society, and wherever they exist at all they are its reproach. Instead of singing pæans about progress which has left thousands, even among ourselves, as poor and as miserable as men ever were in this world, we should do better to aim at extending to them the blessings of Christianity and civilization."

THE FOUNDATIONS OF MODERN SOCIETY.

Now, whatever plausible explanations of this state of things may be given, and whatever superficial and transitory causes thereof may be pointed out, the truth remains that—fundamentally it arises from the fact that—modern society, so-called Christian society, rests to a large extent upon unrighteous bases; or, to repeat the words of the Psalmist, that "the foundations of the earth are out of course." In point of fact we have developed the maxim of Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?" into a science—a "dismal" one truly—which we call political economy; by which we vainly endeavor to charge upon God's providence the misery which arises from our own selfishness and greed. And to be found? Is it, as the Nihilist and the Socialist madly dreams, to be found in revolutionary anarchy? Nay; that were but to substitute for one form of unrighteousness another still more terrible. Is it in the wider extension of Christianity? Alas, it is in the midst of the most Christian nations that misery has assumed its most hopeless and concentrated forms. No; there is one hope for humanity, and only one, the coming of the Lord and the establishment of His righteous government.

A RATIONALISTIC SNEER.

This "blessed hope" may be scoffed at by "advanced theologians" as the dream of "a few fantastic Millenarians, whose visions deserve no elaborate refutation."* It may only excite the smile of worldly Agnosticism which asks, as it was divinely foretold it would ask, "Where is the promise of His coming, for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation." Nevertheless "the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." "For yet a little while, and He that shall come will come, and will not tarry." (2 Peter 3: 37.) And "He shall not fail nor be discouraged, till He have set judgment in the earth." (Isaiah 42: 4.)

MILLENNIAL RULE WILL BE ABSOLUTELY AND DIVINELY RIGHTEOUS.

Let us note, then, some of the great forces which will "make for righteousness" in that kingdom of righteousness and peace whereof we speak.

1. The supreme and universal power and rule will be absolutely and divinely righteous. "Behold," says Isaiah, "a King shall reign in righteousness." And this King is none other than the Lord Jesus Himself; for Zechariah says, "And the Lord shall be King over all the earth; in that day shall there be one Lord, and His name one." (Zech. 14: 9.) Of His solemn investiture, Daniel had a sublime revelation when he "saw in the night visions, and, behold One like the Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of Days, and they brought Him near before Him. And there was given Him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve Him; His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." (Dan. 7: 13–14.)

THE KING HIMSELF.

Now concerning this King it is said, "He shall not judge after the sight of His eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of His ears; but with righteousness shall He judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth. And righteousness also shall be the girdle of His loins, and faithfulness the girdle of His reins." (Isaiah 11: 3-5.) While of Him the Psalmist sings, "The Lord shall endure for ever, He hath prepared His throne for judgment; and He shall judge the world in righteousness, He shall minister judgment to the people in uprightness. The Lord also will be a refuge for the oppressed, a refuge in times of troubles." (Psalm 9: 7-9.)

And if this were all, what an unspeakable blessing would it prove to the world! An absolute monarchy is undoubtedly the only perfect form of human government; but it involves the possession and exercise of a power which cannot with safety be intrusted to any fallen man. But to His Son, God can with divinest confidence say, "Thy throne, oh God, is forever and ever," because He can add, "Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquity, therefore God, even Thy God, hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above Thy fellows." (Heb. 1: 8,9.)

AN INCORRUPTIBLE TRIBUNAL.

Again, how profoundly would it affect the conduct of men toward their fellows, whether inferior or superior in station, to know that there was on earth and within reach a Supreme Authority, not only armed with irresistible power, but whose decrees were infallibly true and incorruptibly righteous; and which was, moreover, accessible to the poor as well as the rich, to the servant as freely as his employer, nay, which made the former his special care, seeing that it is written, "with righteousness shall He judge the poor," and will be "a refuge for the oppressed." What a blessing, I say, would this be to the world; how completely would it alter the complexion and constitution of all human society. "I appeal unto Cæsar," said Paul, when he feared that justice was not to be had at a lower tribunal, though Cæsar did not rule in righteousness. But when the poorest and humblest shall be able to say, "I appeal to the King of kings," how will injustice shrink back appalled and selfishness hang its head in confusion and dismay.

(To be concluded.)

* Dr. Robertson Smith, "Prophets of Israel," p. 338. But, mark the momentous admission which this writer immediately afterward makes, and which many orthodox theologians will do well to ponder: "If we repudiate the dream of an earthly Millennium, with Jerusalem and a Jewish restoration as its centre, we have no right to reserve for literal fulfilment such details of the prophecies as seem more capable of being reconciled with the actual march of history, or to rest the proof of the prophets' inspiration on the literal realization of isolated parts of their pictures of the future, while it is yet certain that, as a whole, these pictures can never be translated into actuality." Ah! even so; but where will this lead us?

in every part of the United States and Canada.

This number of the "CHRISTIAN HERALD," like that of last week, is mailed to some subscribers whose term expired on Dec. 28th last. Their names have not yet been removed from the mailing list, because in many cases, we are informed, they intend to renew, but have omitted doing so, owing to forgetfulness, absence from home, or holiday engagements. All renewals received during the ensuing week will be promptly recorded on the list, and the names of those who do not renew will be erased. The publishers have good reason for hoping that with the large number of new subscribers who have sent in their names, they will retain all those who subscribed last year. Subscriptions should be sent promptly. P. O. orders to be made payable to The Manager.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Pendleton Civil Service Reform Bill was passed by the House on Thursday after a debate of only thirty minutes. This result was a genuine surprise to the country; for a very determined and strenuous opposition to the measure was expected. Mr. Kasson's committee which had charge of the bill reported it exactly as it was received from the Senate. Even the minor errors the committee detected in it were allowed to stand so that no delay might ensue in sending the bill to the President. The opposition to the measure was based chiefly on the fact that it is incomplete and does not extend to the higher grades of the service. An impression prevailed, however, that it was the best bill that could be passed this session, and as it was evident that public opinion is aroused on the subject there was a general reluctance to take the responsibility of opposing it. The bill passed the House by a vote of 155 to 47. The majority was composed of 100 Republicans, fifty Democrats, and five Independents. The minority consisted of forty Democrats, six Republicans, and one Greenbacker. The operation of the bill will be carefully watched by the people. It is avowedly tentative, and if its provisions result in purifying our system of appointments in the lower classes of the service, a principle will have been established which may be adapted to the higher offices. It will not be difficult to evade the provisions of the Bill, if there is a disposition to do so, but the will of the people has been so plainly and emphatically expressed on the subject that it will be dangerous to trifle with the spirit or letter of the new law.

Secretary Lincoln sent an Adroit Reply to Congress in response to the resolution asking for information as to the River and Harbor Bill. The Secretary informed the House that it had been the practice of the Department to refrain from expressing any opinion as to the wisdom of appropriations. It had not been considered the duty of the Department to extend its recommendations beyond matters relating to the practicability of the method of accomplishing the results indicated by Congress. The Secretary states that he did, however, in compliance with the resolution, make an investigation, and that it appeared to him that in many instances the results of substantial benefits to general commerce were so obscure and apparently insignificant as to vindicate the doubt on the part of the House of Representatives indicated by the inquiry presented in the resolution. The Secretary also says that the appropriations have been withheld from new works in cases where a temporary suspension of the commencement of the work would not substantially delay the completion. From the paper accompanying the Secretary's report some idea may be obtained of the shamelessness of this diversion of public funds. One of the most grotesque is that of a harbor for the improvement of which fifteen thousand dollars was appropriated. It appears that this harbor is "the mouth of a creek which can barely float sawlogs. It contains only a single sawmill, and the timber is nearly exhausted." Yet to complete this work would take one hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars, and before it can be completed all the timber accessible to the creek will be exhausted.

Mayor Edson of New York has Refused his permission for the production of the Passion Play in the city. The application to ex-Mayor Grace, who is a Roman Catholic, having failed, it was renewed on January 5th before Mr. Edson, who is a Protestant. "It is alleged," said the Mayor, "that the play contemplated by Mr. Morse is the Passion Play. It appears to me that the statute gives the Mayor power to use his discretion in the matter, and if there is nothing to be said on that point I can render my decision right now. As the matter has been already heard and the play contemplated is obnoxious to a large part of the community, my duty is to decline to grant the license applied for, and that will be my decision." The Mayor might very justly have given his decision on the merits of the case instead of making it a concession to public opinion, but the decision being right there will be little disposition to quarrel with its grounds.

The Shah's Present to the President has been put to a good use. In refitting and refurnishing the White House the carpet which the Shah of Persia presented for the great East Room, and for which it was not suited, as well as the carpet laid in that room, became useless, and would ordinarily have been bundled off to the auction-room, to be sold for a song. But the President had them cut up into rugs, with tasteful borders, and sent them to the Soldiers' Home, where they appear as good as new and far prettier than they were in their original shape.

An Unpleasant Surprise was Caused by the announcement on January 6th that the State Treasurer of Tennessee had absconded, and that defalcations had been discovered in his office. The Treasurer was well known in financial circles, and the report of his flight was at first received with incredulity, but further reports from Nashville confirmed it. The total defalcation is stated to amount to $402,666, and is believed to have been lost in stock speculations and in loans to friends engaged in similar business. The Treasurer's bond was only $100,000. He was highly respected in the State. He is fifty-one years old, is a graduate of West Point, and served four years on the frontier. He was a captain of artillery in the Confederate army, and lost a leg at the battle of Shiloh. He afterward served on the staff of General Leonidas Polk, to whom he was related. After the war he resided on a farm near Bolivar, Tenn., until elected Treasurer, six years ago. He is a nephew of the late President Polk, has a large family, and occupied a high social position in the State. A leading newspaper of Tennessee commenting on the affair says: "There is no question but the habit, of a large section of our press and many of our public men of treating lightly, scornfully, and flippantly the claims of the State's creditors, has had a most damaging effect on public morals in general and has lowered especially the tone of official morals and sense of obligation. Colonel Polk was without doubt a victim both to the wretched looseness of the laws and the administration of executive business at Nashville; but he was also a victim of the prevailing low tone of public honor fostered by the spirit of repudiation."

Intelligence of the Death of Dr. Titus Coan, the veteran missionary to the Sandwich Islands, is published. Dr. Coan died on December 1st after a period of service of forty-eight years. He was eighty-one years of age, and it was fifty-nine years since he was licensed to preach. In August 1833, he was one of a party of missionaries sent to Patagonia by the American Board of Missions, where he remained a year. On December 24th, 1834, Dr. Coan and his wife, with five other missionaries, sailed from Boston in the ship Hellespont for the Sandwich Islands. From this date the life-work of Dr. Coan began. He was stationed with his wife at Hilo, and in addition to preaching the Gospel to the natives as a missionary, he was obliged to act as the physician of the town for the first fourteen years of his labors. Of a singularly mild and affectionate disposition, he won the confidence of the Hawaiians at the beginning, and with his wife, who had established a school for girls, was blessed of God to the conversion of a large number of the native men and women. He soon had a native church established at Hilo, and in a short time trained native converts to act as missionaries among their own people. Dr. Coan revisited America but once after his departure for the Sandwich Islands, and this was in 1870, when he passed about six months here, and then returned to his work. He was stricken with paralysis last September and the news is just received that his noble career in this world terminated on December 1st.

The Gospel of Socialism According to Herr Most, the German Socialist, who is now delivering lectures in our chief cities, deserves the attention of all our citizens. There has been considerable doubt as to the aims of the socialists as the utterances of one leader have been often repudiated by another. But Herr Most is a recognized authority in the order, and he has spoken out in a very unequivocal manner. The people may now learn exactly what is the aim of socialism and should be put on their guard by the exposition. In the course of a lecture recently delivered in Chicago, Herr Most is reported to have advocated the wholesale use of petroleum and dynamite; the gutting of every bank in America and Europe, and the destruction of all governments and institutions now in existence. He said that the entire world was conducted on false doctrines and in detriment to the interest of the great mass of the people. These utterances apparently embody the socialistic creed, and it is well that the people should understand it. We are warned in prophecy that such teachers would appear in the last days (2 Pet. 2 : 10–12).

At the Celebration of the Eighty-fourth birthday of the Rev. Alpheus S. Packard, D.D., vice-president of Bowdoin College, on Saturday, December 23d, amid the personal congratulations of the Maine Historical Society and a shoal of letters from absent friends, it was stated that he entered Bowdoin as a student in 1812, just six years after the first class had been graduated. He was graduated in 1816, became tutor there in 1819, and a professor in 1825. Thus he has been a teacher for sixty-three years, and of the 1994 young men graduated at Bowdoin since the foundation of the college, more than 1900 have been under his immediate instruction.

A Prosecution was Abandoned last Week in New Jersey on a somewhat remarkable ground. The prisoner was charged with having concealed himself in the prosecutor's house with the design of robbing the premises. The case was adjourned, and the defendant released on bail. When the case was again called up the prosecutor declined to press the charge, and it was stated in court that during the interval between the first and second hearings the prisoner had married the daughter of his accuser, who, finding that the defendant was his own son-in-law, naturally desired to withdraw the charge. The relationship contracted had effectually disarmed the prosecutor's hostility to the offender. In a different way and on higher grounds the sinner saved by grace may lose his fear of the judgment of God. He has become by faith one of the sons of God, and his sins are absolved (Rom. 8 : 1, 14).

Another Automatic Railroad Signal has been patented. It consists of a box filled with mercury placed under the rail at the required distance from a bell. When a train passes over this box the mercury is so agitated as to form contact with the wire communicating with the bell and thus makes it ring. If this device fulfils the purpose for which it was designed, it will be invaluable and may save many lives ; but all the automatic signals yet invented are liable to get out of order by some unforseen cause, and so disappoint those who trust in them. It may be, however, that an agent, so sensitive as mercury, may be relied upon invariably to give the needed warning. The wish has often been expressed by thoughtful men that some such signal existed by which men might be warned in their journey through life of the approach of moral and spiritual danger, that Satan might not take them unawares. God has granted that privilege to those whose supreme desire it is to live near to Him. Their souls are filled with His Spirit, and they become increasingly sensitive to His guiding hand, and are conscious of danger when others of less elevated life suspect it not (Jude 20–24).

An Offer of Marriage was Made and Accepted in an amusing way in a Pennsylvania city a few days before Christmas. The young man was bashful, and he had been for months vainly endeavoring to muster courage to say the words that were to put his hopes to the test ; but somehow, had never been able to find an opportunity. The two young people were very intimate friends, and as the holidays approached, the young lady asked the young man to give her a hint of what he would like to have for a Christmas present. The young man saw his chance, and replied, "Nothing could please me better than yourself." The young lady saw her chance also, and answered, "All right ; call around for me Christmas morning, and bring a minister with you." So promptly, at last, was the momentous petition made and granted. Doubtless, the young lady would not have consented with so much apparent levity to make a present of herself had not she decided long before what she would do in the event of such a request being made. The gift of self involves consequences too serious to be lightly incurred. That gift in the highest and holiest sense Jesus asks for, and with good reason, for He has bought us with His blood (Rom. 12 : 1).

An Adventure in a Dark Cavern of Tennessee, in which three college boys incurred no trifling danger, is described in a Monroe journal. It appears that on December 23d three boys started from the college to explore Craighead Cavern, three miles away. They entered the cave with a torchlight, and after wandering about became lost in the labyrinthine passages. For some hours they endeavored in vain to find their way out again. Their light began to flicker, but, fortunately, it did not expire till they had passed the pit, said to be ninety feet deep. Then Egyptian darkness was all about them. They searched their pockets for matches, but could find but one, and that missed fire. There they were, in a vast living tomb, utterly unable to extricate themselves. At the college the day wore away, but the three boys were missing. With the night came on cold, drizzling rain ; but a band set off with lights through the mud and rain to the cave. They entered and called aloud for their lost comrades. At length their shouts were answered. The lost were found, cold, shivering, hungry. By one o'clock in the morning of the next day the lost ones reached their rooms at the college, sadder, but wiser than when they stole their march on the previous morning. Their experience may appropriately remind them that, deplorable as their plight was in the dark cavern with a pit ninety feet deep near at hand, their condition before God would have been still more terrible had not Jesus come to guide them out of the darkness (John 1 : 9).

An Amusing Explanation is Given of the sudden extinguishing of the electric lights, a few nights ago in a Chicago store. A large number of lights are used in the building, and as when they went out the store was crowded with people, there was no little alarm experienced. As rapidly as possible the gas-jets were lighted and everybody looked surprised, none more so than the members of the firm. The engine was running as rapidly as usual, and the dynamos were working properly when an investigation was made. Under the dynamo there stood a rat, with one leg raised up as if about to take another step. The rat was dead and rooted to the spot. The machinery was stopped, the rat taken off, and then when the machinery was again started the lights burned as well as usual. That so mean and insignificant a creature as a rat should have been able to throw the brilliantly-lighted building into darkness, might well cause surprise. A similar feeling has been experienced by Christians, when they have seen the soul lighted up with faith and hope become dark under the quibblings and sceptical arguments of an atheist (Psa. 14 : 1).

A Dog Saved the Life of his Companion in a remarkably intelligent way, recently. The correspondent of a Boston journal, who relates the incident, states that he has two dogs, Grouse and Scott. One morning they were both missing. After having been gone the greater part of the day Grouse returned home pretty well tired out, but was able to jump around the coachman, looking up into his face, barking and running ahead as if he would say, "Do follow me." So he followed Grouse far into the woods. At last they came to a stone wall. Grouse jumped over and he followed, and there they found poor Scott, caught in a trap by one of his forefeet, crying most pitifully. When extricated, his foot was found to be very much swollen, but fortunately no bones were broken. If it had not been for faithful Grouse, he never would have seen his home again. I need not say that Grouse jumped around with delight to see his friend again free. The conduct of the faithful Grouse may teach Christian workers a lesson. They often find sinners held fast in the meshes of Satan's trap, and cannot release them ; but the dog in like case went to one who could deliver. So may the Christian go and tell Jesus (1 John 5 : 16).

A Convicted Murderer's Last Words are Seldom very edifying, as it often happens that they are merely the expression of conviction that the speaker, in spite of his crimes, is going straight from the scaffold to Heaven. The dying words of James Tracy, recently executed in Chicago are, however, an exception to the rule. They deserve the careful attention of young people who think that it is a fine thing "to see life" by which they generally mean vicious life. Tracy said : "I do not believe any man who has known the life of virtue can ever be contented with a life of vice. The farmer who has spent his life on his farm, never seeing more of the world than the road to market, or more of society than the village congregation, is happier than the 'sport' who gets his money easily but questionably, and sees society in its wildest dissipation. I hope that my fate may prove a warning to young men who are cheating themselves with the idea that there can be any peace, happiness, or prosperity in a crooked life." Perhaps the readers of dime novels and young people attracted by the pleasures of vice will heed the solemn statement of a man who was qualified to speak with authority, even though they despise the same warning given in the Bible (Proverbs 13 : 15).

THE ORPHAN'S FATHER.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

THE Lord God of Israel, the one only living and true God, has this for a special mark of His character, that in Him the fatherless findeth mercy. "A Father of the fatherless, and a Judge of the widows, is God in His holy habitation." False gods of the heathen are usually notable for their supposed power or cunning, or even for their wickedness, falsehood, lustfulness, and cruelty ; but our God, who made the heavens, is the Thrice Holy One. He is the holy God, and He is also full of love. Indeed, it is not only His name, and His character, but His very nature, for "God is love." Among the acts which exhibit His love is this—that He executeth righteousness and judgment for all that are oppressed, and specially takes under His wing the defenceless ones, such as the widow and the fatherless.

This is very notable if you look into the subject in connection with holy Scripture. We see this soon after the giving of the law. We have the law in the twentieth chapter of Exodus ; and in the twenty-second chapter of the same book, close upon the heels of the law, you have God's word concerning the fatherless. Listen to Jehovah's words ; they are strong and forceful ; there is a thunder about their sound. "Ye shall not afflict any widow or fatherless child. If thou afflict them in anywise, and they cry at all unto Me, I will surely hear their cry ; and My wrath shall wax hot, and I will kill you with the sword ; and your wives shall be widows, and your children fatherless." These are the words of that Jehovah who spoke the ten commands on Sinai. See how very lies the cause of the widow and the fatherless.

The Lord gave the law a second time in the book of Deuteronomy. If you turn to the tenth chapter of that book, at the seventeenth verse, you will find such a statute as this : "For the Lord your God is God of gods, and Lord of lords, a great God, a mighty, and a terrible, which regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward : He doth execute the judgment of the fatherless and widow, and loveth the stranger, in giving him food and raiment." Those are two strong and striking proofs of the fact that the cause of the fatherless lies near to the heart of God.

LAWS WERE MADE ON THEIR BEHALF, and among the rest was the institution of tithes. I have read some amazing statements upon the divine right of tithes. It seems to be established in the minds of some that if God gave the tithes to Levi He must, therefore, have given them to Episcopalian ministers ; an inference which I fail to see. I should just as soon draw the inference that He had given them to Baptist ministers ; certainly it would be no more illogical. The idea of our being priests, or Levites, in order to get compulsory tithes, would be too abhorrent to be entertained for a moment. But while I have often seen the divine right of tithes stated and argued, I have never heard it urged that the tithes should go to those for whom God set them apart under the legal dispensation.

Now, if you will turn to Scripture, you will find that the tithe of all the produce of the land was to be given to the Levite and to the stranger, and to the widow and the fatherless ; and whenever tithe comes to be properly distributed, if there be any divine right in it at all, it will most certainly be given to the widow and the fatherless. We should agree to its being given in part to the Levite when he turns up, but as we do not know who the Levite is at present, we may keep his portion in abeyance till he appears. But the widow and the fatherless are still here among us, and the poor shall never cease out of the land; and as the institution of the tithe was as much for them as it was for the tribe of Levi, let them have their share.

The tribe of Levi had certain rights, because, while the other tribes had each one a portion, that tribe had no inheritance, and therefore took out its share in having a part of the tithe, and certain cities to dwell in. Read Deuteronomy 14 : 29 : "And the Levite," (because he hath no part nor inheritance with thee), "and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, which are within thy gates, shall come, and shall eat and be satisfied; that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hand which thou doest." I do not know that Episcopalian clergymen have given up their earthly inheritances any more than Nonconformist ministers, and I cannot therefore see that they have the Levite's claim; but I see clearly the right of the widow and the fatherless, and I pray that the day may come when they will get their share of what is undoubtedly theirs, if it is anybody's at all.

Another ordinance was made about the widow and the fatherless—that when the people gathered in the harvest, if they omitted they were never to go back for it, but were to leave it for the widow and the fatherless. "When thou cuttest down thine harvest in thy field, and hast forgot a sheaf in the field, thou shalt not go again to fetch it; it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow; that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hands." In gathering in the corn the field was not raked, but all that fell was left to the widow and the fatherless. It was expressly commanded that when they gathered the grapes they were never to gather a second time, but were to leave the bunches to be ripened for the widow and the fatherless. "When thou beatest thine olive-tree, thou shalt not go over the boughs again; it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow."

Nobody was forgotten in the divine rule when Jehovah was King in Israel; but especial mention was continually being made of these two classes—the widow and the fatherless, and the poor strangers that happened to be within Israel's gates. "Thou shalt be kind to the stranger," said the Lord, "because thou wast a stranger in the land of Egypt, and thou knowest the heart of a stranger." I call your special attention to this, and beg you to look through Scripture, and see how again and again God calls upon His people to take care of the widow and the fatherless. Job, that upright man whom God accepted, disclaimed for himself the charge that he had ever forgotten the widow and the fatherless; and you know how, under the New Testament, it is written, "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world."

It is established, then, that God, even the God of Israel, is one in whom the fatherless findeth mercy; let us take care of them too. "Be ye imitators of God as dear children," and select as the objects of your charity those whom God specially cares for.

This, however, is not my subject at this time. I wish you to become yourselves objects of the divine charity by and putting yourselves under His protection, that you, like the fatherless, may find mercy at His hands. If we ourselves are sad at heart, troubled in spirit, full of needs, full of wants and trials, let us be encouraged to come to God, because in Him the fatherless findeth mercy.

First, here is encouragement; secondly, here is encouragement as to what to do; and, thirdly, here is encouragement as to what to expect.

I. First, here is encouragement. Here is encouragement, though such as none spy out but needy ones. You notice that the people who said, "In Thee the fatherless findeth mercy," are the people who had fallen by their iniquity, and who were bidden to return unto the Lord, saying "Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously." They were a people who renounced all self-confidence, and cried out, "Asshur shall not save us; we will not ride upon horses: neither will we say any more to the work of our hands, Ye are our gods." They were a people with whom God's Holy Spirit had so dealt that they were stripped of their pride, and made conscious of their guilt. Then it was that they spied out this precious fact, that in God the fatherless findeth mercy.

A tear in the eye is a fine thing to clear it. He that never saw his sin has never seen the mercy of God. David never sang of the lovingkindness and tender mercies of God so well as in that fifty first Psalm, when he mourned his great sin. A broken-hearted sinner has a sort of instinct for finding out the tender points in God's character. The ungodly man who is self-satisfied, and has never been made to know the truth about his condition, often likens God to an austere man, reaping where he has not sown, and gathering where he has not strawed; but once let the man know his guilt and mourn it, and then he looks with all his eyes to God to spy out mercy in Him; and he is the man who delights to learn that God is merciful to the fatherless. This becomes a fountain of hope to him.

Have I here any sin-stricken sinner? Are you desponding and despairing? Did you come here feeling that there could be no mercy for you? Catch at this word. "In Thee the fatherless findeth mercy." He is a merciful God; He is tender, kind, considerate. He evidently looks after the helpless and hopeless. He is the patron of those whom others desert. Widows without friends, the fatherless without protectors—these are the care of God. May you not hope that He will care for you? May you not in the depth of your sin and brokenness of heart come to Him and say, "O Lord, I hear thou art be a Friend to me?" It looks like a candle put in the window of your Father's house to guide you home through the darkness. May God help you to see it; but I know that you will not care to see it if there is not a tear in your eye, for none but the needy perceive this gracious truth.

This encouragement is, moreover, one which is a strong inducement to cast away all other confidences. If God be the Friend of the fatherless, He may be a Friend to me; would it not be well for me to trust Him, and leave off trusting those other things that I have relied upon? You see how the text runs, "Asshur shall not save us; we will not ride upon horses." These were their great trust and confidence, and then they go on to say—neither will we worship false gods, for we can see that the true God is kind, kind to the fatherless ones, and therefore we may come and trust Him. When a man gets some little hope, then he says to himself, "I will even venture to look to the Lord."

When the prodigal son in the far-off country had spent all his living, what was it that brought him back? Why, it was this thought, "How many hired servants of my father have bread enough and to spare!" This made him resolve to go home again. I know he will tell you that there is no mercy for you. He is an old liar. There is abundant mercy for the greatest sinner. What does the devil know about it? He never sought mercy, and he has never had any, and never will have any, for he will never seek it; but for you, poor soul, there is bread enough and to spare in your Father's house; and why do you perish with hunger? Why not arise and go unto your Father? If God be the Father of the fatherless, this should induce us to hasten to Him, and rest in Him.

"May I trust in Jesus Christ?" says one. "May I?" Of course you may; it is your sin if you do not, and, indeed, the chief and most ruinous of sins. Many of you are trusting in your sacraments and your priests, or in your good works and your prayers, or your own feelings, because you think that you may not trust Christ. But you may! for He who takes the fatherless under His blessed wing invites you to come to Him. "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." If He had ever repulsed one, He might repulse you. But since the fatherless find mercy in Him, and all that come to Him find mercy in Him, come along with you, and trust in the merciful One at once.

Furthermore, there is much encouragement in my text, because it gives us a clear look into the heart of God. I always like to see how a man treats children. You learn a great deal about a man when you see that. Some men abhor children, and almost wish that they could exterminate them. As to the fatherless children they say, "Let them go to the workhouse; we cannot be troubled with them." The gentle-hearted One never sees a little child in want without feeling the utmost pity. I feel more sorry for a suffering child than even for a man or a woman. Adults have a measure of a power to help themselves; but if there be poverty in the house, the little one may pine away, but it cannot get relief. Little boys and girls have suffered much in this great city when their parents' home has been desolated by poverty, frequently caused by drink and other sins.

Who knows the sufferings of the little ones when father dies? I confess it touches my heart that little children should suffer as they do. When men are wicked, one is almost thankful that there should be poverty following their sin to whip them out of it; but these lambs, what have they done? Any tender heart feels this. Is not this a wonderful text which lets us gaze into the heart of God while we read, "In Thee the fatherless findeth mercy?"

Great God, the seraphim adore Thee. Angels, day without night, in serried ranks stand waiting to do Thy bidding. Thy voice is the thunder, and the glance of Thine eye is the lightning. At Thy bidding kings die, dynasties decay, and empires are blotted out, and yet Thou carest for little children and widows. It is very beautiful to me. I feel as if I could trust Him all the better for that, and come with my daily burden and daily cares—ay, and my sins, too, and feel sure that He will not refuse me. This is

THE FATHER OF JESUS,

I am sure of it. Oh, how like the Son is to the Father, for if the Father is thus the children's Patron, what think ye of the Son, and of His likeness to His Father, when He said, "Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Does not this encourage you to come, as you see the heart of God laid bare in the blessed statement of the text, "In Thee the fatherless findeth mercy?"

There is this encouragement too, that our cases are like those of the widow and the fatherless. The orphan has no father, no helper, no means of sustenance. And you, my hearer, are in that state, without God. If there be no God, you have no father. If you have no God to trust to, you have no protector, and you are undone. There is no light for you if God be not your light, no hope for you if Christ be not your hope. Do you feel that? Well, then, you are an orphan; you are a fatherless one. Come along, for Jesus has said, "I will not leave you orphans. I will come unto you." Come to Him, and look up into the face of the orphan's Father, and say, I plead that word of Thine, "In Thee the fatherless findeth mercy." Lord, let me find mercy, for my case runs parallel with theirs.

If there is a heart here that wants encouraging, it will spell out my meaning. But if you do not need it, and some of you do not, for you are fine fellows, full of your own righteousness, then I have nothing to say to you but this, "The whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick. Christ came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance."

II. Secondly, for every poor, needy sinner here is encouragement as to

WHAT TO DO.

First, if you want to find salvation to-night, take the text as a sort of spiritual guide-book, and plead your need. Do not say anything about your merits; the less said about them the better. Your position is like that of the Irish servant, who said, when asked for his character, that the gentleman at his last place told him he would do better without his character than with it. You are just in that case, only that you will be asked for your character, and the best thing you can do is to say, "My character is as bad as it can be;" and then plead for mercy.

"Lord," it says in the text, "in Thee the fatherless findeth mercy. It does not say that they are good and holy, but simply that they are fatherless. It does not say that they find reward, but that they find mercy, Lord, that is all I have to say to Thee. I am in need: I am in awful need; and because I am such a sinner, it makes my need all the worse, for that is where my need lies; I need righteousness; I need a new heart; I need a right spirit. I need a total change. I need everything, for I have nothing but sin and misery. O Lord, I only urge that as Thou dost help the fatherless, simply and only because they are needy, I pray Thee save me irrespective of my character, for my need is great."

The next lesson for you is this; be sure to take a hold of this text by the handle, and

ASK FOR MERCY.

"In Thee the fatherless findeth,"—what? Findeth mercy. Mercy is the handle of the text. When you go to God, ask for mercy, not for justice. A mother once went to the Emperor Napoleon to ask for mercy for her son. He had committed some breach of the French law; and the emperor replied, "Madam, this is the second time the boy has offended; justice requires that he should die." She answered, "Sire, I did not come to ask for justice. I beg for mercy." He answered, "He does not deserve mercy." "Sire," said she, "it would not be mercy if he deserved it. I ask for mercy." When she put it in that way, the emperor replied, "Well, then, I will have mercy."

My unsaved hearer, you deserve to be in hell tonight. It is of the Lord's mercy that you are not consumed. Do not dream of asking for justice, for justice will be your ruin; but get a hold of this word, "Lord, I ask for mercy," and if something whispers, "Why, you have been a hardened sinner," say, "Lord, it is true; but Lord, I ask for mercy." "But you have been a backslider." Reply, "Lord, that I have; but I ask for mercy on that account." "But you have resisted and rejected grace." "Lord, that is true; but I shall want all the more mercy because of that." "But there is nothing in you to argue for forgiveness." Say, "Lord, I know there is not, and that is why I ask for mercy. I put it wholly on that ground. Display Thy mercy in me, I beseech Thee." That is the way to plead. Mind you keep to it. That is the straight way.

YOU WILL GET HEAVEN SO, for you will get Christ so, since His mercy endureth forever.

Learn another lesson, you that want to get peace with God at once, and I hope that some of you do. Cast your sin, trial, and sorrow upon God. The text says, "In Thee the fatherless findeth mercy;" so the business of the fatherless ones is to come to God, and just look to Him for mercy; and that is your business. Do not, I charge you, look to anybody else but the living God to help you. It is a snare, and a horrible one, for people to trust to priests; and I will say, in addition to that, to trust to ministers, to trust to any man whatever. I have known persons when they have heard an address and have been impressed, to say, "Oh, I shall find Christ in the inquiry-room!" That inquiry-room may be a snare to you if you talk thus. You want to speak to the man who preached to you, do you? Do not speak to him; go to Jesus direct. "But I wish to see that good man who spoke to me the other day." Very well, so you may by-and-by, but mind you do not put that good man or that good woman in the place of Christ. The text says, "In Thee the fatherless findeth mercy," and it is in Christ, and in Him alone, that mercy is to be found. Go directly and distinctly to Jesus.

God is everywhere. Let your spirit be conscious that God is present, and now let your heart speak to Him. To Him confess your sin; do not pour that rubbish into the ear of mortal man. To God lay bare your heart, and to Him alone; it is not a fit sight for any human being. Tell the Lord Jesus all your wants and woes, and He will help you, for in the Son of God is the help of the sons of men. Oh, that I knew how to speak these things, but they will surely go home to those who are in spiritual need! You that are not in need, you, that are good you that are self-righteous, will see nothing in the text for you. No, and there was not meant to be, for the Lord has a people that He will draw unto Himself, and these people are known by this—that they are weary of themselves.

God's chosen people exercise the natural art of the weak, namely, clinging. They are made to feel their poverty and their need, and then when they hear of the fulness of Christ they haste to lay hold on Him. Have you never noticed how the plants that God has made weak are all endowed with

A NATURAL FACULTY FOR CLINGING?

One of the first things that the vine does is to put forth its tendrils for something to cling to. The hop, the woodbine, the sweet pea, they have all a little hook ready to lay hold on a support. Now, if God is about to bless you at this hour, you have a little tendril that is being put out to find something to lay hold of, and as the gardener carefully puts his stick for the sweet pea, or as the farmer puts his pole for the hop, I have tried to set my text in your way. I would set the blessed Lord before you, and, say, In Him the fatherless findeth mercy, cling to Him; cling to Him. It is our life to do it. Cling firmly! The limpet by the seashore can do little, but it can cling, and so it does cling, and very firmly too. That is the one thing you can do, poor sinner, and I pray the Holy Spirit to lead you to do it at once. God help you at this moment to cling to Christ, and if you do, you are saved, yes, saved at once. In him the fatherless findeth mercy. Cling to Him, and you shall find mercy too.

III. Now, lastly, here is encouragement as to

of God. "In Thee the fatherless findeth mercy."

What do the fatherless expect of us when we stand in God's place to them, and take them into our Orphanage, and try to be as a father to them? What do they expect of us? Well, I do not know that the younger ones have intellect enough to know all they expect, but they expect everything. They expect all that they want, and though they do not quite know what they do want, they leave it to us. They believe that all will be found that they require. I like a poor Christian who does not know all he wants; but yet knows that his God will supply all his needs. He trusts Jesus for all. He trusts His heavenly Father as a child; He does not know what He may require today, and require in the unknown future, but then His heavenly Father knows, and He leaves it all to Him.

As our orphan boys grow older, however, they begin to have a perception of their wants, and they trust that they shall have everything provided which their own fathers would have provided for them, and more, perhaps. So is it with us when we come to the great Father. We say: all that I would provide for my children, if I had everything, and could give them all that wisdom could desire, my God will provide for me, for He will be a Father to me. If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, much more shall He, who has taken you into His family, though you once were fatherless, give all good things to you. You shall have food and raiment, and sufficient for this life. You shall have protection, guidance, instruction, and tender affection. You shall have every now and then, and that is among your choice mercies; but you shall also have all the cherishing of His sweet love; and by-and-by, when you are fit for it, He will take you home from school, and you shall see His face, and you shall live forever in His house above, where the many mansions be.

Oh, if you come and put yourselves by a simple faith into the blessed custody and keeping of God, He will admit you into His Salvation Orphanage, and He will take care of you, and you shall find Him a better Father than you will be to your own children—a better Father than the best of fathers could ever be to the best beloved of sons. "I will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be My sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty." I will not say more, but I should like to leave John's choice sentence as my last word. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God!" Blessed be Thy name, O Lord, that we also have been led of Thy Spirit to prove that in Thee the fatherless findeth mercy!

THE BURNING OF A ROYAL PALACE.

HAMPTON COURT PALACE, which was partially destroyed by fire on December 14th last, as was mentioned at the time in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the department of Foreign Topics, is about fifteen miles from London. Queen Victoria does not occupy it, but she uses it as a kind of genteel almshouse. Widows of officers and others who have performed services for their country are granted, on the nomination of the Queen, free residence there. The palace is divided off into separate suites of apartments, and is like an aristocratic little town.

The building is well known to American visitors to Great Britain, who always visit it, attracted thither by its numerous historical associations. It was for many years a royal residence, was at one time a royal prison, and occupies a prominent place among English historical buildings. Early in the sixteenth century Cardinal Wolsey began its erection, and in 1515 he received a lease of the mansion and grounds for ninety-nine years. He spent immense sums of money upon the buildings and grounds and succeeded in making so pretentious a palace that the sovereign, Henry VIII., showed some signs of envy. After occupying it for eleven years the Cardinal, in 1526, presented the place to the King, telling him he had designed it from the beginning for his use. It became Henry's favorite residence, and he spent more fortunes upon it to make it suit his fancy. He built several additions, including the great hall and chapel, in the Gothic style. Only two of the original five quadrangles now remain, but a third was erected by Sir Christopher Wren for William III.

THE FIRE.

On the morning of December 14th, 1882, smoke was seen to be issuing from the eastern wing of the Palace, and flames speedily burst forth with great fury. Despite the efforts of those residing within its precincts and the military stationed at the Palace, it appeared as if the east wing was doomed, and every effort was made to prevent the fire spreading to the other parts of the building. The flames were speedily extinguished, but not before much damage was done. The burned rooms were immediately above the picture gallery, the curiosities and tapestry in which were considerably damaged by water. The tapestry, which suffered the most, is part of that which represents Alexander the Great entering Babylon and the battle of Granicus. In Queen Anne's bedroom the celebrated painted ceiling was damaged. Pictures by Rembrandt, Rubens, and Kneller, and Lely's celebrated "Beauties" had a narrow escape. The rooms known as the Queen's Gallery, the King's and Queen's private chambers and private drawing room were partially flooded by water. The loss is roughly estimated at $50,000. The greatest excitement prevailed among the residents in the

The Burning of Hampton Court Palace on December 14.

Palace, the people in the vicinity, and those to whom the fire became known. The ladies residing in the Palace all escaped, but one hired domestic was suffocated before she could be extricated.

HOW IT BECAME A ROYAL PALACE.

The history of Hampton Court as a royal palace recalls a series of striking incidents illustrative of men and times familiar to every American school boy. There King Henry VIII., of vicious memory, stood by his garden gate, in his gown of russet velvet furred with sables, while Cavendish, the secretary of the deceased Cardinal, before him, gave an account, on his knees, of his master's property. Then history describes Henry building the great hall, and revelling there with his new queen, Anne Boleyn; then rejoicing over the birth of his son and heir, Prince Edward, and mourning over the death of the babe's mother, Jane Seymour; then come pageants in honor of Catherine Howard; and next the marriage of Catherine Parr; and last, days of disease, when the tyrant becomes a prisoner and can no longer hunt and take his pleasure as aforetime. The Palace was sold by Parliament in 1641, but it afterward fell into Cromwell's hands, and continued to be one of the principal residences of the English sovereigns until the time of George II. It was the birthplace of Edward VI. and the meeting-place of the conference held in the reign of James I. to settle the dispute between the Presbyterians and the State clergy, and it served as a prison for Charles I.

OLIVER CROMWELL'S RESIDENCE.

The scene changes, and Hampton Court is found in the occupation of a far different personage, Oliver Cromwell, whom we here discover sauntering up and down the long gallery, or seeking to soothe his mind, burdened by the cares of empire, by the music of the great organ, removed hither from Magdalen College, Oxford. And then, in the death-chamber of the Lady Claypole, his daughter, we see him for fourteen days watching over the sufferer, and afterward mourning over the dead.

The beautiful gardens, which are still numbered among the finest in England, were laid out at the desire of William III., and contain forty-four acres. They are in the formal Dutch style, with elevated terraces, long shady walks, and a labyrinth called the "Maze," which is always an object of great interest to visitors.

The whole palace is one immense picture gallery, containing more art works than some national galleries, many of them of great value. Among them are portraits of the celebrated beauties of the Court of Charles II., while among its artistic treasures was a fine picture of Charles I. on horseback, which was painted by the great Vandyke. It contained, for a time, the famous cartoons of Raphael, but several years ago these were removed to South Kensington Museum.

The principal embellishments of the palace were made by William III., whose delicate health rendered residence in London injurious to him. He therefore fixed on Hampton Court as his home and prepared it to become once more a royal palace. Macaulay gives an extended description of the expensive improvements within and without. "Much idle ingenuity was employed," he says, "in forming that intricate labyrinth of verdure which has puzzled and amused five generations of holiday visitors from London. A new court, not designed with the present taste, but stately, spacious, and commodious, rose, under the direction of Wren. The wainscots were adorned with the rich and delicate carvings of Gibbons. The staircases were in a blaze with the glaring frescoes of Verrio. In every corner of the mansion appeared a profusion of gewgaws not yet familiar to English eyes. But the new palace was embellished with works of art of a very different kind. A gallery was erected for the cartoons of Raphael. Those great pictures, then and still the finest on our side of the Alps, had been preserved by Cromwell from the fate which befell most of the other masterpieces in the collection of Charles I., but had been suffered to lie many years nailed up in deal boxes. The expense of the works at Hampton was a subject of bitter complaint to many Tories, who had very gently blamed the boundless profusion with which Charles II. had built and rebuilt the dwellings of the Duchess of Portsmouth."

It is, therefore, a matter for thankfulness that the Palace was not destroyed by the fire, both on account of its historical associations, and because it at present affords an asylum to those who, reared in affluence and refinement, would in their old age and poverty, but for that institution, find their adversity by contrast especially painful.

A MENTAL CONFLICT ON THE SEA BEACH.

SOME years ago I was prostrated by a severe illness from which it was believed by the physician who attended me and by the kind friends who nursed me that I should never recover. By the blessing of God, however, the crisis passed, and very slowly and wearily I began to retrace my steps from the shadow of death to health and strength.

My physician having prescribed tonics without much effect, ordered change of air and scene. Accordingly, one lovely summer morning, I set out northward for a city on the Atlantic coast. It was during my stay there that an incident occurred which is one of the most memorable in a not uneventful life.

One day I had accomplished the quantity of exercise prescribed for me with less fatigue than usual, and as I stood at my window after sundown, the light of the moon on the waves and the soft balmy air attracted me out of doors for another stroll before retiring to rest. I hesitated some time before going, and it seemed as if a hair might turn the balance whether I went out or not, but the attraction increased, and I went. I know now, though I had no idea of it at the time, that Providence was leading me.

I walked for about a mile along the sands from my hotel, and was about returning, when my attention was drawn to a man, apparently a fisherman, dragging a boat to the beach. Some one else was watching him, too. I saw to my astonishment the figure of a woman lying prone on the sand in the shadow of a schooner, and intently regarding the man who was dragging the boat. As I looked at her more carefully I doubted my first impression. She seemed to be staring into vacancy rather than looking at the objects before her. Who was she? Why was she stretched there at that hour, having on neither bonnet nor shawl, in spite of the chilliness of the evening air?

At first I thought she might be the wife or daughter of the approaching fisherman, but the delicacy of her features and the costliness of her attire, both revealed in the light of the moon, satisfied me that whoever she might be, she did not belong to the fishing community, with the majority of whom I was acquainted. An instinctive feeling of delicacy prompted me to pass on and not intrude myself on her attention, but I could not leave her. There was a look of blank despair on her face that appalled me, and her attitude was one of mute but severe suffering. I waited for a few moments and watched her until I became convinced that the expression of hopelessness in her face had an element of activity in it denoting the intending suicide. Here was work for me to do. God had directed my steps to this point, I felt certain, that I might be the instrument of saving a soul from death.

Overcoming my constitutional reluctance to address a lady who was a total stranger to me, I walked to a spot near to that on which she lay, and affecting not to notice the peculiarity of her being there in that strange position, I made a remark on the singular beauty of the scene. She did not resent the intrusion as I expected she would have done, but merely said in reply, "Yes; it is always very lovely at this hour." She evidently desired to convey the impression that her being there was no unusual circumstance. But I thought otherwise.

"God has made the world so beautiful," I said, "that even if we had no other ties, that alone would make us reluctant to leave it."

She responded almost fiercely: "All do not feel that reluctance. There are troubles and sorrows which cannot be soothed by nature's tranquillity. It mocks and irritates them rather by its contrast."

"That is true," I said; "It would be a sad thing for us all if there were no other refuge in trouble than the material world; beautiful as it is, it often fails to calm the perturbation within; then we can take our case where it will certainly be put right for us. That is, after all, the only unfailing source of peace and rest. Broken hearts and brains half maddened with woe have been healed there. If it were not so, there are thousands of people with a burden so heavy that they would prefer death to life. But happily there are none who need do that."

"She Lay Prone Looking Hopelessly on the Water."

I shall never forget the expression of her face as she turned and looked at me when I said those words in a tone of calm, settled conviction. I saw what a struggle was going on within her breast. The stolid despair that had held her relaxed its hold for a moment, and there shone in her eyes a light that was almost hope. Then she seemed to realize, as with a flash, the peculiarity of the situation. She raised herself to a sitting position, and said, with an attempt to assume the conventional tone of society: "You are a stranger to me, sir, why have you spoken in this way?"

"Forgive me," I replied, "for venturing to address you, but I have been too familiar with trouble of all kinds not to recognize the signs of its presence when I saw you prostrate on the sands. I hoped that perhaps I might be privileged, if you are in trouble, to direct you to One who is 'commissioned to bind up the broken-hearted.'"

"You speak so kindly, and your motive is apparently so unselfish, that I cannot be angry, though you have shown a disregard of the usages of society. But I am afraid your effort is wasted; I cannot apply for help to Him."

She said this in a tone of firm conviction, in which I detected a sorrowful accent that encouraged me to proceed. I said, "Cannot is not the word to use in this case, my dear lady. I have no knowledge of the nature of your trouble, but this I know, that for near two thousand years men and women have been taking their troubles to Him, and not one has been repulsed. There is no limit to His invitation, 'Come unto Me all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' Whatever your trouble may be, there are no obstacles in the way of your getting relief, but such as are raised by your own will."

"I think God must have sent you to me," she said; "I came here after bitter suffering, resolved on ending my life this night. You speak as though you were sent with a message to my soul. I cannot die if there is hope, as you say there is. I must go home now and think. But I will be here at sunset to-morrow. Will you do me the further kindness of meeting me then?"

I gladly consented, and she walked hurriedly away in the direction of a hotel near the beach, while I went back to my own quarters to thank God that He had led me to a spot where one of His suffering creatures needed such help as I could give.

The next day I was at the appointed place an hour before sunset, but, early as I was, I found my acquaintance of the night before already there. She greeted me eagerly, and though I could see by her dress and manner that she belonged to the upper ranks of society, she displayed no hauteur. She thanked me for speaking to her the preceding night and at once entered on the question of Christ's willingness to save sinners. I reminded her of the invitations of the Gospel, and as God gave me utterance, I urged her to go to Him with her burden and assured her that He would receive her. Satan had used her own conscience against her, and he seemed to stand before the door of hope with his darts to drive her away. But before God's Spirit he quailed, and I could see that the feeble grasp she had on Jesus was being strengthened. Before I left her she promised that the prayer of the publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner," should be offered that night with all her heart.

The next day I met her again, and then she told me her story. It was a very sorrowful one. She had been bereft of her mother in infancy. Her father, cold, proud, but ever indulgent to her, had brought her up until she arrived at womanhood. She had moved in a gay circle and had fallen before the designs of a wicked, crafty man. When she discovered his villainy and saw her own shame she was horror-stricken. She had made an excuse to her father for a brief absence from home, and had come to this place fully determined that she would take her own life rather than brave the anger of her father and the contempt of her friends. By the blessing of God the words I had been led to utter at our first interview were used of Him to check that desperate scheme, and though the intention was not finally abandoned, I hoped that it might be.

Many earnest prayers did I offer for guidance in dealing with this poor, erring, despairing woman, and many were the interviews in which I combatted the doubts and despondency by which Satan sought to hold her in his power. Ultimately, by God's grace, she was brought to trust herself wholly to Jesus, and found peace in Him. For a long time she could not bear the thought of returning to her home, and the prospect of confession to her father was very terrible to her. But through this, and the troubles that followed, she was mercifully supported. Bitter as they were, humiliating as her position was—and how that gentle womanly spirit suffered no one could realize—she clung to Jesus and found rest to her soul. Nor was her social trouble to be permanent. She came forth from the furnace of trial chastened and purified, and the chastisement having done its work in her soul God permitted her to rejoice in the love of a Christian man who knew her story, and who was proud to make her his wife. It is with hearts full of gratitude to Him who receiveth sinners that both husband and wife rejoice that in that terrible crisis that moonlight night on the sands, God interposed to save the soul of His erring daughter from destruction.

A Story by Rev. Jackson Wray.

The Banker's Gods.

THE opportunity desired by the irate heiress of the house of Musgrave was not long in coming to hand, for the Rev. Abel Forsyth and his good lady were speedily favored with an invitation to dine at the Musgrave Mansion. The objectionable character of the new curate's ministrations were not adverted to during the progress of the meal; it may have been because of the acknowledged unwisdom of mingling the discussion of exciting topics with the important business of dining, which ought to be prosecuted, for the sake of ultimate digestion, in calm enjoyment. Over the walnuts and the wine, however, though neither the banker nor the vicar did much execution among the former, the latter perhaps demanding too much attention, Michael Musgrave opened up a perfect battery of denunciation against the luckless curate who had come between the wind and his nobility.

"What on earth induced you to select such a Puritanic curate, Vicar?"

"Puritanic, eh," said the Vicar, "I'm sorry you don't like him, Mr. Musgrave. I assure you he came to me with the very highest recommendations, both from Cambridge and from the clergyman for whom he has been doing duty."

"Hang his recommendations!" said the banker, wrathfully, "you may buy recommendations anywhere for a pound a bundle."

It may here be said that everything and everybody had a money value according to the banker's estimate of men and things.

"And then," continued Mr. Forsyth, "he is a relation of Mr. Cranswick, the great cotton spinner, you know, and he was very anxious that he should be located here."

"Hang Mr. Cranswick too," retorted the banker, who was not to be conciliated, "he has got a Puritanic bee in his bonnet, and you don't suppose that the whole congregation of the Abbey Church is to be insulted out of deference to him, do you?"

"Why, there it is, you see," answered the Vicar, dropping his voice to a serious semi-whisper, "I find that the congregation on the whole are mightily pleased with the young man. They are speaking of him in strong terms of approval, and congratulate themselves on having secured so good a man."

"Then hang the congregation too," said the banker, stamping his foot upon the ground with vexation, and calling up his two divinities, wealth and position, to aid him in the fray. "I tell you plainly, I don't like him, Mrs. Musgrave doesn't like him, Miss Musgrave doesn't like him, and I want to know if Michael Musgrave isn't to have some consideration shown him. The congregation! Pshaw! I could buy the whole of 'em without disturbing Musgrave's Bank a week."

"Well, but let's talk it over a little while," said the Vicar, in tones which were intended to throw oil upon the troubled waters. "Tell me what it is you don't like in this young man. He is a man of capital presence and good address. He has a voice clear as a bell and pleasant to listen to, and the way in which he reads our glorious Liturgy is far better than common, and—

"Yes, yes; all that may be true enough. I don't deny it. But as soon as he gets into the pulpit, he begins to make a fool of himself. He talks to us as though we were all on a dead level. He has no respect for wealth and position. He tells us that we are all big sinners, and—and, in short—makes himself confoundedly disagreeable."

Here the Vicar felt himself to be getting on slippery ground. He had too much reverence himself for the two ruling deities in the Musgrave Mansion to dare to endorse his curate's levelling views in that presence, and yet he felt a sort of hazy conviction that the curate wasn't wandering far from the teachings of the Book in saying so. He had an idea that his wife would probably be able to help him out of the difficulty; for she, sooth to say, was herself one of Mr. Cleveland's admirers. She had long felt that her worthy spouse was sadly in the habit of beating about the bush when in the pulpit, a process conducted so daintily that scarce a twig or leaflet of thought or feeling was ever shaken thereby; and she welcomed the advent of the new curate, glad to think that a little plain, honest Gospel truth might have a good effect on those who had long been lapped in slumber.

"Let us go and join the ladies, and hear what they've got to say on the subject," said the Vicar, rising to his feet.

"Say! why, they'll say as I say; only they'll put it a good deal stronger, or I'm mistaken."

Arrived at the door of the drawing-room even before it was opened, the Vicar had reason to believe in the truth of the banker's words. Words were evidently running very high inside; and on entering, the first words that caught his ear were an emphatic statement from Miss Margaret.

"The man doesn't know his place. One would think he was talking all the while to nothing but a batch of plough-boys and dairy-maids. His theology is all of the ranting school, and it is evident that he is altogether unacquainted with the more enlightened teachings of modern thought."

"Very likely, my dear," replied Mrs. Forsyth, a pleasant-looking, silver-haired lady with a quiet light in her dark-gray eyes. "The teaching of modern thought, as you call it, hasn't very much in it, so far as I can make out, either to enlighten the conscience or to satisfy the heart."

"Stuff and nonsense! I beg your pardon, madam, but I feel very strongly on this subject," said Michael Musgrave, standing in front of the fire with his legs apart, erect and portly as a Musgrave should, and jingling the money in his pocket as if to get new inspiration from an accustomed source. "What have conscience and heart to do with it? A parson's business is to read the prayers and conduct the service with decorum; to tell the poor to be content with the station in life into which God has called them, and to say a few respectful words to people of wealth and position about the duties they are called on to fulfil. That's his business, I expect, and to let conscience and heart alone."

With all this Mrs. Musgrave cordially agreed. Miss Margaret, to do her justice, was hardly prepared altogether to agree with her father's dictum. As I have already said, she had a conscience; she also had a heart, and had it not been for the two despotic deities who sat on both like a veritable Old Man of the Mountain, she would have seen through a much clearer pair of eyes. To her parents Mr. Cleveland's preaching was an insult, to her it was something more; something which like a barbed arrow rankled within her and disturbed her a good deal more than she cared to own. The discussion of this important matter ended in a compromise. The Vicar undertook to expostulate with his young curate, to induce him to moderate his ardor, to tone down a little the vigor of his utterances, and to place his dogmatic declarations of Gospel truth a little more in the background. With this the Musgrave household strove at present to be content.

It came to be a matter of remark among the good people of Carchester, that Michael Musgrave was beginning to look haggard and careworn. In vain did the banker seek to maintain his wonted dignity of port and impressiveness of demeanor. Those who knew him best were not slow to declare that something was amiss with him, and conjecture was rife as to the cause. It was perfectly true. At last, Black Care had found his evil way even into the mansion of the Musgraves, and the trouble that was disturbing the banker's mind, destroying his appetite, and robbing him of his nightly rest, was a very big business indeed.

The shrewdest men, the cleverest financiers, are at times at fault, especially when, as in Michael Musgrave's case, principle does not keep a strong controlling hand on policy. A huge speculation in which the banker felt certain that he could count enormous profits as clearly and as certainly as he could count his fingers, disclosed an unexpected weakness almost at the crisis of success—a weakness of so serious a nature that the whole fabric of his fortunes was threatened with a fall. In vain he sought to extricate himself, and the desperate fact grew more patent every day that Fortune, which had long treated him as a pampered favorite, was about to trundle her wheel and depart.

Whatever of human love was possible to this lover of gold was centred in his handsome daughter; and now his great anxiety was to see her safely provided for before the blow should fall. For some time past a celebrated and successful French financier, Eugene Lefevre by name, had sought alliance with the house of Musgrave. He was a thoroughly eligible parti except in one respect. Michael Musgrave, in his devotion to wealth and position, had strongly hoped to ally his daughter with an aristocratic house, and by his wealth to secure her an aristocratic title. That was now impossible, but by accepting Eugene Lefevre, wealth at any rate would be secured. That gentleman was, therefore, received with such increase of favor and warmth of welcome that he lost no time in declaring his love and applying for the hand of the handsome Margaret. It suited his purpose, as it suited Michael's, to hurry on the arrangements with all convenient speed.

On a sunny summer's day in June the marriage took place in the old Abbey Church of Carchester; and the Vicar, assisted by his curate, tied the knot. The Rev. Noel Cleveland could not help wondering as he looked into the fair face of the bride, and then into the somewhat haughty, unreadable face of the bridegroom, as to whether either conscience or heart had anything to do with the business, or whether the stately maiden was not being offered, as he shrewdly suspected, on the cold and glittering altar of wealth and position. The stalwart curate may be forgiven if his heart beat a little more rapidly than usual at the sight of so fair a sacrifice.

At the wedding breakfast which succeeded, Mr. Cleveland's considerable conversational powers, his genial manners, and evident interest in the day's proceedings won greatly on the young lady's esteem and regard. She felt half a regret as he warmly wished for her a happy future, and expressed an earnest hope that God's blessing would attend her, that she had held so harsh an opinion concerning him, and promised herself that on their return to Carchester she would give him a franker hearing, and a kindlier heed. Did she, I wonder, make any silent comparison between his manly, openly countenance and the dark inscrutable face of her husband, which was half hidden beneath his huge mustache and raven hair? If so, was that the reason of the involuntary sigh which accompanied her parting shake of the curate's hand?

The wedded pair left the city of Carchester for a lengthened tour, and the Musgrave Mansion, bereft of its chief ornament, became a place of solitude, and, alas, of multiplied anxiety and care. Events move swiftly in financial life, and the trouble which the keen-eyed banker saw looming in the distance, came in upon him like a flood. For days together Michael Musgrave shut himself within his private room, vainly striving to discover means to disentangle himself from the web which his own too eager hands had woven round him. Convinced at last that all hope was gone, he set himself with somewhat of his customary shrewdness to secure from his wrecked fortune a something for his wife and child.

One bright autumnal morning, all Carchester, all the country round, and in a measure all England, too, was startled by the news that Musgrave's Bank was closed; and that Michael Musgrave was stricken by paralysis of so fierce a form as to be deprived of speech, and almost deprived of motion. Mrs. Musgrave's state of mind may be better imagined than described. With wealth and position both gone at one fell blow, her husband little better for the moment than a living corpse, her cup of bitterness was filled to the very brim. The Vicar came duly to condole with them, but alas! it was but little in that direction of which he was capable; his good lady was by far the more effective comforter of the two.

Now it was, however, that the Rev. Noel Cleveland shone at his very best. His big honest heart was filled with real compassion. He felt that the greatness of their straits was an emphatic call on him to do his utmost to administer consolation and relief. Glad of any genuine assistance in her heavy need, Mrs. Musgrave leaned upon him as she would upon a son. He evinced a clever and business tact, and managed her affairs with a diligence and success which brought her material relief; and all the while he sought with winning speech, gentle entreaty, and with the Great Comforter's gracious precepts and promises on his lips, to lead her to cast her burden on the Lord, and place her trust in the Divine Unfailing Friend. The stately lady melted under his influence, and with tearful eye and heart hungry for help, bowed with him at the throne of grace.

Though Michael Musgrave had so thoroughly collapsed, though speech and motion were held in almost absolute suspense, it was evident by the expression of his features and the unspoken, but intelligent, language, of the eyes, that his sense of hearing was untouched. Doubtless the poor imprisoned soul within him was pondering on his fearful fall; looking with dazed eyes upon the remnants of the two shattered Dagons who had come crashing down within the threshold of their temple, and left the poor and pitiful worshipper poor and pitiful indeed. With him sat Mr. Cleveland by the hour together, directing him, as one who well knows how, to the All Merciful Source of succor and of aid. For some time it seemed as though the old man could not understand it, but sore sorrow is a rapid teacher and the heartache opens wide the door for Jesus. Noel Cleveland's inspired message sped home at length, and the trickling tears which dropped from the eyes of the poor invalid told that he, too, longed for rest.

(To be concluded.)

THE BELIEVING PEOPLE.

S. S. Lesson for January 21st. Acts 2:22-47. Golden Text, Acts 16:31. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Delivery of the Message—Demanding Acceptance or Rejection—Neutrality to be Precluded—Persecutors Used as Instruments—Jesus all Life—Proof by Scripture—By Witnesses—The Wounds of Inspired Preaching—Pseudo Conversions—Necessity of Open Confession—Peter's Promise of the Holy Ghost—Man's Responsibility: Save Yourselves—The Sudden Conversions—Wonders in a Believing Atmosphere—A Community of Goods.

PETER had been commissioned, in common with the other disciples to "teach" (or make disciples of) "all nations" (Matt. 28 : 19), they were commanded to preach the Gospel to every creature, and in such a way that they should, after the delivery of the message, find before them two classes, "he that believeth," and "he that believeth not" (Mark 16 : 15, 16). They were to declare, and make people feel, that the kingdom of God was come nigh unto them (Luke 10 : 9, 11), so that it should be impossible for men to continue in a neutral or indifferent position; they were instructed to begin at Jerusalem (Luke 24 : 47); and now the power from on high was upon them—what should be the result?

Peter, as the spokesman of the rest, and surrounded by the remaining eleven, had explained the prophesying of the hundred and twenty men and women who had been filled with the Holy Ghost, by the words of the prophet Joel, and then, guided and inspired by the same Holy Ghost, he directly charged his hearers with their fearful sin against the Son of God. "Ye men of Israel, hear these words; Jesus of Nazareth, a Man approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs, which God did by Him in the midst of you, as ye yourselves also know."

THE PERSECUTORS USED.

Peter pointed to an undeniable fact, the healing and miracles of Jesus were known everywhere, and no rational Jew could attribute them to any other power than that of God. Thus they stood convicted of having fought against God. "Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain." What was this? Was then their deed of darkness a blind carrying out of the purpose of God? Even so. Oh ye, who persecute and calumniate those who are walking with God, take heed; the Lord may use you for the carrying out of His own purposes, but you will not go one step beyond His permission. His children may suffer, suffer intensely through you, but the very suffering which is increasing your condemnation, is purifying them and making them more like the Captain of our salvation, who was made "perfect through sufferings" (Heb. 2 10). Instead of injuring them, you are really tools in God's hands in blessing them even beyond all which could be, had they not, through you, so great a fellowship in Christ's sufferings.

"Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death; because it was not possible that He should be holden of it." Yes, as David prophesied, "His soul was not left in hell, neither His flesh did see corruption." Jesus is "that eternal life which was with the Father" (1 John 1 : 2).

HE WAS ALL LIFE;

spirit, soul, and body, He was Life, and no element of corruption dwelt in Him; when He died He gave up the ghost, His life was not taken from Him, and it was impossible that He should be holden of death. In measure as He Himself dwells in us, life drives out all which is of sin, and corruption, and death in spirit, soul, and body." If the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Jesus from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His Spirit that dwelleth in you (Rom. 8 : 11). "This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses." "In the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established," (Matt. 18 : 16) here were one hundred and twenty witnesses to the resurrection of Jesus.

"Therefore," continued Peter, "being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, He hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear." What then? was that crucified and active in heaven? Was His power not confined to earth but mighty at the right hand of God? Had they made a terrible mistake, and in their blindness fought against fearful odds? It was beginning to dawn upon them how unspeakably great was their culpability. And Peter, still speaking by the Holy Ghost, went on: "For David is not ascended into the heavens; but he saith himself, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit Thou at My right hand, until I make Thy foes Thy footstool." By Scripture, the Scripture which was read in the synagogue every Sabbath day, the case was proved; it was clear that David did not refer to his own body when he said, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer Thine holy One to see corruption," David did not speak of himself when he said, The "Lord said unto My Lord;" who then arose uncorrupt from the dead? who then was David's Lord? Peter said, "Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ:" both David's Lord and God's Messiah. What could Peter's auditors say?

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY WITNESSES

attested the resurrection of Jesus, and these hundred and twenty were testifying now, in a supernatural manner, in sixteen different languages, and in power which riveted the hearers, "the wonderful works of God." The testimony was too strong to be rejected. "When they heard this, they were pricked in their heart, and said, . . . men and brethren what shall we do?"

Such is always the effect of preaching in the power of the Holy Ghost, even when the instrument used is of the feeblest; the heart is pricked, a real wound is made, men are brought to see their right position before God, they are brought to reality about themselves and God, and the one cry of their hearts is, "What shall we do?" Is there any remedy? Is there any way out of this? There is, and it is at hand, "Repent and be baptized" i.e., "Turn right round and let everybody know you do so." Many make great mistakes about repentance. Some speak of it as deep, emotional sorrow for sin, and many people try to produce this in their own hearts. Others make out that the simple acceptance of the fact that Jesus has died and atoned for their sins, is a turning from their unbelief and therefore is repentance, and some do this without definitely breaking with the past, and this leads to miserable so-called conversions, which are the greatest stumbling block to the real work of God.

is a final, definite, and determined break with the past at all costs, and a real taking sides with God, and letting everybody know it. These men must "be baptized for the remission of sins," not because outward baptism changes the heart at all, but because in their case it was the act which committed them before all men as disciples of Jesus; it was the thing which would draw down upon them the reproach of the scribes and Pharisees, and it was, therefore, a testing point as to whether their hearts were right or not.

God is no party to a cowardly slipping into faith in Christ, without open testimony. If we have really passed from death unto life, from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God, if we have received forgivness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith which is in Christ (Acts 26 : 18), it is but due to God that we should proclaim the great things He has done for the sinful and undeserving; and it is due to our perishing fellow-creatures that we should declare to them that God's great salvation lies open to them. Where there is real honesty of purpose, this is the instinct of every saved soul.

Peter boldly promised to every one who should repent and be baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, not only the remission of sins, but also the gift of the Holy Ghost. God most surely meant that every converted man should be a man filled with the Holy Ghost; oh, how is it that a degenerate, enfeebled race of Christians should have arisen, among whom faith and the power of the Holy Ghost is the exception, who speak of the gifts of the Holy Spirit as belonging to apostolic times, as though the Holy Ghost had ceased to be, or had left the world again! "Ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost," said Peter, "for the promise (of the Holy Ghost) is unto you, and to your children, (oh parents, praise God for this), and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call. And with many other words did he testify and exhort, saying, Save yourselves from this untoward generation."

Here we see

MAN'S RESPONSIBILITY;

God saves us from sin, we ourselves must separate from our surroundings, i.e., from our vain conversation (manner of life) received by tradition from our fathers (1 Pet. 1 : 18). God calls us to a life the exact contrary of that lived by most men; they live for time, we for eternity; they live for self, we deny self; they live for the world, and do as the world does; we are "not of the world," and "testify against it that the works thereof are evil;" they love the praise of men, we receive not honor from men; they hate those who injure them, we love our enemies.

"Then they that gladly received his word were baptized." They would lose caste, they would be misunderstood and persecuted, but they would be right with God; and there were three thousand of them! Glorious result of the first pentecostal sermon! But what kind of lives did they lead? Some are afraid of these were very sudden but "they continued in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers." How dull! some worldly people might say. But "the apostle's doctrine" was a glorious unfolding of the Old Testament, as Jesus had been so recently explaining it to them; fellowship was the stirring of one heart by another to fresh acts of faith and love; the breaking of bread was the token of oneness, one life among them all; and the prayers were answered prayers, each bringing down new blessing, so that they could see God moving among them. No wonder that "fear came upon every soul," they had not been used to have God within sight as now; no wonder that "many signs and wonders were done by ithe apostles," in a believing atmosphere God can always work.

"And all that believed were together;" sects and parties were unknown. Oh that it were so now; they "had in giving themselves away to the Lord, they had included their possessions, all they were and all they had was Christ's, and therefore one another's; the atmosphere was pure, "thine and mine" was not heard among them, it was always "ours." They "sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every man had need." They did not cling to some trinkets because they were "family jewels," they did not hold some property because it would be expected of them, all such considerations had lost their power in the overwhelming consciousness of God dwelling in them; they saw all in the light of God and of eternity. Was this oppressive? Far from it; in His presence is "the fulness of joy."

"They, continuing daily with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house, did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God, and having favor with all the people." Gladness and singleness of heart! this was far from oppressive; no worldly cares troubled them, the Lord was their Shepherd they should not want, there was nothing sensitive or morbid, they were in other hands than their own. And the Lord added to the church daily such as were being saved" (Rev. Ver.) Lord speedily restore primitive Christianity.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Death of Gambetta, the most Prominent figure in the French Republic on January 1st, has been the principal topic of the week in the foreign press. The announcement of his death caused general surprise, the surgeons who attended him having concealed from the public the gravity of his symptoms. It was known that the statesman was suffering from a wound caused by a pistol bullet which, it was stated, he received while carelessly handling the weapon, but which other reports affirm was fired at him by a woman with whom he had improper relations. The wound, however caused, was only the secondary cause of death. The autopsy proved that he was the victim of a disease which must have proved fatal at no distant date, and that the inevitable end had only been precipitated by the wound. M. Gambetta was forty-four years of age. He has occupied a prominent place in French affairs since the downfall of the empire, when for a brief period he was Dictator of France. His magnificent courage, his untiring energy, and his dazzling eloquence raised him to the front rank among statesmen, and while presidents held office and retired, and one administration after another passed away, the real power over the country was centred in his hands. Latterly he lost the confidence of his most radical supporters who were impatient at his moderation. German newspapers congratulate their country on the death of its most relentless foe, but it may be doubted whether there is much real reason for congratulation. It is certain that Gambetta's influence exercised a restraint on the extreme section of the radical party, which is likely now that he is removed to run into excesses.

The Christian Aspect of Gambetta's Death was thus described by Dr. Talmage in his Friday evening talk last week. The speaker said: "We applaud Gambetta's eloquence, his courage, his patriotism, his friendship for America, his sympathy with free principles all over the world. But Gambetta was an atheist. When Premier he appointed as Minister of Worship Paul Bert, another atheist, to look after the affairs of the Church of Christ, one who believed in neither Christ nor Church nor Bible nor anything else sacred. Gambetta's patriotism toward France cannot atone for his atheism toward God. He never uttered more thrilling words than in his last moment. His dying words roll like a wintry sea over all nations—'I am lost!' I tell you atheism is a hard thing to live by and a bad thing to die by. All honor for Gambetta's patriotism and all honor for his eloquence; but alas for his atheism! Poor example both for Frenchmen and Americans!"

The Funeral of M. Gambetta on Saturday last was a scene unequalled in Paris since that when the body of Napoleon I. was brought from St. Helena to the Invalides. The Legislature decreed that Gambetta should have a public funeral, and accordingly his body was borne to its temporary resting-place in the cemetery of Pere la Chaise, with military pomp and attended by the officers of State and foreign ministers. It will be finally interred in compliance with the wishes of the deceased statesman at Nice. A newspaper correspondent cables respecting the ceremony in Paris: "The spectacle was unexampled. From eight o'clock this morning traffic has been stopped on the south side of the river. Detachments of special commissaries of police gave direction to the ever increasing mass of deputations which came up, each anxious to secure a good position. From the Place des Invalides the scene presented was of the strangest imaginable aspect. Above the swaying mass of the crowds which covered it are banners, wreaths, and enormous masses of flowers borne on men's shoulders. In the Rue de l'Université, from the square up to the Esplanade, were deputations who were unable to find a standing place. A whole corps d'armée was drawn up encircling the funeral car. The space between the Champs d'Elysees, the Terrace des Feuillants, the Bridge and the Rue Royale was a mosaic of heads, all uncovered, stretching forward and motionless."

The Death of General Chanzy, the Distinguished French general and Life Senator, occurred on January 4th. The event following so closely on the death of M. Gambetta, who was General Chanzy's most intimate friend, is a remarkable coincidence. General Chanzy was an officer in the army under the empire, and attained the rank of brigadier-general prior to the Franco-Prussian war. After Sedan M. Gambetta relied chiefly on Chanzy's energy, gave him an influential position, and at one time had hopes that he would succeed in raising the siege of Paris. Chanzy scored several successes, and proved his brilliant military capacity, but the Prussian armies were too strong and too well placed for Chanzy to drive them out with his raw levies, and finally the armistice closed his efforts. Since the foundation of the Republic General Chanzy has held important posts in the military and diplomatic service of his country. He died suddenly of apoplexy at his residence in Chalons, aged 58. A prominent French journal, alluding to the coincidence of the death of the two friends, says: "What has France done to Death? Has Bismarck signed a compact with it? General Chanzy's death is a great sorrow. The Germans feared him as they dreaded General Skobeleff."

The Final Settlement of the Egyptian problem is not yet arranged, and there are evidences that the mutual jealousies of the European nations have not been allayed by the action of the English Government. The London Times in a leading article says that the note sent to British representatives abroad by Lord Granville, Foreign Secretary, in regard to Egypt is purely explanatory and in no sense apologetic. It principally deals with past events and prudently refrains from giving pledges, which no Power has the right to exact, and for which there is no probability of any Power asking. In regard to the canal, however, Lord Granville proposes that it be treated virtually as an arm of the sea, freely open to navigation but subject to a rule forbidding belligerent operations both in its channel and within a certain distance of its extremities. Referring to the circular of Lord Granville, British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, inviting the Powers to recognize definitely the free navigation of the Suez Canal by the ships of all nations, the Paris Temps to-day says it shall not at present attempt to disturb the illusion that the circular will be received with satisfaction.

An Irish Member of Parliament has Been committed for trial on a charge of high treason. Mr. J. G. Biggar, M.P., against whom the charge is brought, is a prominent member of the League, and has been notorious throughout the agitation for the violence of his utterances. Other members of Parliament are also qualifying for a place in the dock. At a National League meeting held in Bray on December 31st, Mr. Corbett, member of Parliament, who presided, said nobody need hesitate to join the League, as Mr. Trevelyan, Chief Secretary for Ireland, admitted that it was a legal organization. Mr. Lalor, member of Parliament, and Mr. Harrington, secretary of the Organizing Committee of the National League, addressed the meeting. Mr. Lalor said he was glad to observe that the Assembly was mainly composed of fighting men, by whom he always liked to be surrounded. He was certain they knew the day might come when they should have to use that force by which every other country had obtained freedom. He urged organization, if possible, in open day. Mr. Harrington said he would show the government that it could not intimidate him.

Distressing Accounts of the Damage Caused by the floods in Europe arrive every day by cable. A Berlin despatch, dated January 4th, says that the inundations in Germany are taking the form of a great public catastrophe. The distress is increasing hourly. The military and civil authorities are making the greatest exertions to mitigate the misery of the disaster. There are no signs yet that the crisis of the calamity is reached. The high temperature and rains continue. At Ludwigshafen, opposite Mannheim, where the great Rhine dam gave way last night, the lives of hundreds of people are imperilled. A steamer rescued many hundreds, including the sick. The deepest distress prevails. Thirteen persons were drowned at Friesenheim. In all sixty or seventy lives have been lost by the floods. The water is penetrating the foundations of the fortifications at Mayence. In France the rivers Saône and Doubs have inundated several villages. Thirty-two houses have fallen at Longuepierre, in the Department of the Saône et Loire. The River Seine has again reached the level of the December flood. In Switzerland the Paris and Lyons Railway on the French frontier is washed away. Direct railway service betwen Switzerland, France, and Italy is interrupted. In Austria the Danube has inundated Presburg, thirty-four miles from Vienna. A despatch was sent from Frankfort, Germany, to a business firm in New York appealing for help for the sufferers. It said: "Terrible and lasting floods in the Rhine, Neckar, and Main valleys. Rustall to Mainz is nearly one large sea. Whole villages in Pfalz are devastated. There is untold misery and want, and many lives were lost."

The Nihilists are Again Threatening the Life of the Czar. The order appears to have lost none of its energy, although wholesale executions have been the order of the day, and large numbers of its members have been sent into exile. A Berlin correspondent of the New York Herald says that private letters from St. Petersburg state that the Czar on Sunday found in his bedroom a letter from the Revolutionary Committee demanding the commencement of the promised reforms, and adding that the committee possess power to forcibly obtain concessions. The sale of the St. Petersburg Golos on the streets is prohibited.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey have been Conducting a largely attended Gospel mission at Brighton, England. Bible readings have been held daily at 3 P.M., and Gospel addresses have been delivered every evening at 8. Although the Dome where the meetings are held holds some 3000 people, many hundreds have been unable to gain admission to some of the meetings. A choir of between 400 and 500 have supported Mr. Sankey. The evangelists were welcomed on December 14th, by a large number of clergymen, ministers, and laymen. At the after-meeting, in the evening, more than 100 stood up to be prayed for, and upward of seventy professed conversion. On Wednesday evening, Mr. Moody asked those who were truly desirous of a new life to come up to the front of the platform. About 260 of the audience came up to the platform in answer to the invitation. On Thursday, after Mr. Moody's address, a considerable number of inquirers went up for conversation with him and the other workers.

The Evangelical Societies Engaged in Christian work in Italy have many difficulties to contend against. One of these is described in a letter from a clergyman in Rome to the London Record. He says: "The great difficulty that stands in the way of evangelizing Italy is the want of proper places of worship. The Italians as a nation are most sensitive to beauty of form and color, and alas! are often repelled by bare whitewashed walls or a small gloomy room, which equally jar on their æsthetic tastes. When we consider the beautiful and world-famous cathedrals and churches they have been accustomed to all their lives, enhanced by the ritual and pomp of the Romish Church, we must be lenient, and agree that the change is very great, and a hard test of the earnestness of the converts. Finding that this is one of the great objections to be overcome, the Waldensian being essentially an Italian Church, and wishing to meet the wants of the people, every effort is being made to build suitable churches, and they hope shortly to open one in Naples, and one in Rome. The latter, situated in a most central position in the Via Nazionale, is, strangely enough, close by the spot where the Waldensian Pascal was burned at the stake, a martyr to the truth now freely preached.

The Blue Laws are Desired by a Large Number of the inhabitants of the manufacturing metropolis of England. A petition against the hawking and crying of newspapers in the streets, on Sunday, has been signed by the religious public. On the petition are the names, among others, of fifty-four clergymen, and thirty-four Nonconformist ministers in Birmingham, for presentation to the Town Council.

THE opportunities for Christian usefulness possessed by the chief officer of a well-conducted ship can scarcely be realized by those whose lives are passed on land. That they are only too seldom used as they should be is a sad fact. It is, therefore, all the more gratifying to read of one case in which those opportunities have been used as they have also been in other cases for the glory of the Saviour.

Captain W. Hugh Phipps, whose portrait appears on our front page this week, was born at Chichester, England, on November 10th, 1822, and is now therefore in the sixty-first year of his age. He is the son of the late Rev. Barré Phipps, Rector of Selsey and Canon of Chichester. At an early age he gave himself to Christ, and has continued amid the multiform experiences of his life, and the perils incident to his profession, to seek His glory by engaging in His service, and seeking to lead men to Him as their all-sufficient Saviour.

His uncle, Captain Robert Phipps, commanded a man-of-war at a very early age, and by his gallant behavior secured the favor and patronage of Admiral Lord St. Vincent. The clergyman, though conscientiously devoted to the Church, was possessed with such admiration for the naval profession, and esteem for Admiral Lord St. Vincent, that he resolved to foster in his son the love of the sea which he early manifested, and ultimately secured for him a position as a midshipman when he was about fifteen years of age. Since then, Hugh Phipps' course has been steady, and his urbanity, coupled with a perfect knowledge of all the duties associated with his vocation, has won for him not only the honorable eminence which he now adorns, but has secured for him the esteem of all who know him.

He first went as midshipman on board a man-of-war to Spain, and one of the events on his ship during the cruise was that of a

"MAN OVERBOARD;"

The scene as depicted on our frontispiece represents the incident which occurred while the ship was proceeding to Portendick, on the coast of Africa, to settle a dispute which had arisen there between some English and French merchants, and which threatened serious consequences. As the vessel was running one night before a strong breeze there arose the startling, thrilling cry, "Man overboard!" The hands were called up, sail shortened, and the ship "hove to" as speedily as possible, but no boat could have lived in such a tempestuous sea, had it even been possible to see the man, who was now battling with the waves astern.

A hurried inquiry was made as to who he was, but no one knew. All that could be ascertained was that one of the look-out men on the gangway had heard a sudden cry and a heavy splash, and he at once gave the alarm. The captain therefore ordered all the crew to be mustered, the clerk brought the books, and there on deck, in the deep darkness of the night, with a gale of wind blowing, each man's name was called.

THE CALLING OF THE ROLL.

The anxiety was intense. At last a name was called, there was a pause, and it was now clear that one of their number had in reality been swept overboard, and suddenly ushered into the presence of God. The officers secured his effects, and a deep gloom seemed all at once to have fallen upon every one on board, the sailors gathering in groups, relating in an undertone their recollections of their messmate, over whose head the waves had closed until the time shall come when the sea shall give up its dead.

The appearance of the coast of Africa, when the vessel arrived was discovered to be by no means inviting—a low, sandy shore destitute of trees, with two large hummocks, on which sparsely grew some stunted bushes, which were the land-mark for the guidance of the captain in the navigation of the ship. Here they cruised off and on in a dreary monotony for several weeks, when they were ordered to the River Gambia for supplies and water. The Settlement is at the mouth of the river, and has for its protection a fort on the opposite side, and is itself an island, separated by a creek from the main land, the banks of which are grown over with small trees, to whose pendant branches adhere the spawn of oysters, so that, literally, and Captain Phipps asserts that he has often cut a branch-full of the bivalve, and in this way procured for himself an enjoyable dinner.

OYSTERS DO GROW ON TREES;

The Governor of Gambia was very courteous and hospitable to Mr. Phipps, and invited him to stay in his house, but the guest was greatly disturbed by the loud croaking of the frogs, and much excited by the altogether strange surroundings of the building itself, with its open veranda, black servants, and curious customs, and knowing what a bad name the Settlement had for fevers and deadly tropical diseases of various kinds, the news was gladly hailed by Mr. Phipps and all the men that they were ordered to return at once to Lisbon. The visit, however, resulted in more than one death among the crew, and several poor fellows after a very brief illness died, and were reverently consigned to their graves amid the unfathomed caves of the ocean.

A BURIAL AT SEA

is an interesting and most solemn spectacle. The ship's bell is tolled, and all the officers assemble on the quarter-deck in epaulettes and swords to show the last respect to the dead, the men simultaneously gathering on deck to take part in the service. The deceased, sewn up in his hammock, having a thirty-two pound shot at the feet to make it sink, is brought up on a grating by his messmates, his body covered by the Union Jack as its appropriate pall. The captain opens the Book of Common Prayer, and all heads are uncovered, while the Service for the Burial of the Dead at Sea is read; and when the words are reached, "We therefore commit his body to the ground," at sea the phrase is altered to "We therefore commit his body to the deep, to be turned into corruption, looking for the resurrection of the body when the sea shall give up her dead." At these words the grating is slowly elevated and the corpse slides gently into the bosom of the deep.

CATCHING A SHARK.

It was during this cruise that Captain Phipps saw for the first time a shark—a monster between which and sailors there exists an enmity deadly and ineradicable. It was almost calm, the sea a beautiful transparent blue, when a man at work in the rigging suddenly exclaimed, "A shark! a shark!" The sailors ran over to that side of the ship, and, says Captain Phipps, "Yes, there he was, taking a leisurely swim with his fin above water, quite black, and about twenty feet in length. I shuddered as I looked at him, for in spite of his apparent quietness, I knew he had a keen eye and three serrated rows of deadly teeth, and that if by any misadventure I fell overboard, he would, in a second, enclose me in his capacious jaws."

The men begged that an attempt might be made to catch him, and having obtained permission, the shark-hook was fastened firmly on to a strong rope, and being baited with a tempting piece of pork, weighing about four pounds, it was thrown toward him. With a switch of his enormous tail, the monster instantly turned on his back and seized the bait, going off with such speed that had the rope not been new and strong, it must inevitably have broken. The news that a large shark had been hooked ran quickly through the ship, and every one hurried on deck to witness the exciting and somewhat dangerous operation of "hauling him in."

Considerable dexterity and circumspection have to be exercised by all who take part in the proceedings, as a blow from the tail of the shark would easily break any one's arm or leg, and then also there are the gleaming, glistening teeth! He was, however, drawn amid much enthusiastic cheering close to the stern, and another rope being slipped over his gigantic head, it was not long before he was hauled on board, where he was attacked with heavy tomahawks and hatchets, and speedily slain. This episode is represented in the right hand section of the upper portion of our frontispiece.

AFRICA AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

During the years 1840-42, Mr. Phipps was a midshipman on board the "Madagascar," a frigate under the command of Captain John Foote. The ship was ordered to the coast of Africa for the purpose of preventing the Slave Trade, which was there carried on by the Portuguese for the slave markets of Brazil, and by the Spaniards for those of Cuba. Slaves were brought down to the coast in gangs, and exchanged for gunpowder, arms, and calico-cloth. Depots called baricoons were formed on various parts of the shore, and when a sufficient number of hapless creatures were collected, a Portuguese or Spanish vessel would attempt to embark them. To prevent this was the commission of the British frigate.

The "Madagascar" was a large ship, and the Captain therefore frequently detached his boats for a week at a time, or longer, and sent them to scour the neighborhood of one of these depots, hoping to intercept some vessel while the frigate herself judiciously stood off, out at sea and out of sight. Upon one of the many occasions that Mr. Phipps was ordered on this hazardous service, he had remained away for six weeks, only now and then meeting the frigate and getting supplied with provisions, and a change of such men as had been attacked by sickness, when one day he received orders through one of the ship's boats to proceed to Cabenda, near the Congo River, to prevent the anticipated embarkation of a large number of the slaves collected there.

AN OCEAN VOYAGE IN AN OPEN BOAT.

However fond of the excitement of boating and chasing slavers Mr. Phipps may have been, a six week's life in an open boat, sleeping always in his clothes, exposed to the torrid heat of the sun by day, and the chilling, drenching dew by night, he found to be quite sufficient, and more, especially as he had in prospect to go over a hundred miles, and to cross the mouth of the largest river in Africa, with a current of six to seven miles an hour, and, to add to the unwelcome news, the midshipman in charge of the boat which brought him the new instructions, told Mr. Phipps that in his hurry he had unfortunately forgotten to bring him his provisions. Beside, he was four men short-handed, having sent them invalided to the frigate by a passing merchant ship.

Nothing daunted, however, Mr. Phipps at once started for his destination. Meeting a vessel on their way, they stopped and searched her. The midshipman and his coxswain entertaining considerable suspicions, they passed several hours in the hold, groping about for illicit articles. That same evening the were both stricken down by fever, and three days afterward the coxswain died. Mr. Phipps was supported by some of the men, while with the aid of a lantern, he read a few prayers over the poor fellow's body, and then in the silent darkness of the midnight, committed it to the deep.

CROSSING THE MOUTH OF THE CONGO.

The boat soon arrived off the mouth of the river, and as he could not spare a single man from the oars while struggling across its fierce tide, Mr. Phipps, in order to steer, was obliged to be lashed to the mizenmast, as he had not sufficient strength to sit up, until they had passed the danger. Arriving off Cabenda, they saw several baricoons, and on many houses also the Portuguese flag was hoisted in bravado. Being out of provisions and water, it became a most momentous consideration how they were to keep their ground. Mr. Phipps one night directed that a native canoe should be seized, and in this two of the British bluejackets armed used to stop fishermen and others, taking just enough for their pressing necessities.

During the night Mr. Phipps always kept the

Those whose faith having been tried in the fire, is "found unto praise, and honor, and glory at the revelation of Jesus Christ." Those who are in truth "overcomers," and who can therefore lay claim to the wondrous promise, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with My Father in His throne." These, and these alone, shall be the "princes" of the coming age, the reflectors of Christ's glory, the channels of His righteousness, by whose presence the world will be enlightened and made beautiful as the garden of the Lord.

THE FUTURE CONDITION OF ISRAEL.

3. Again, Restored and converted Israel will present to the world the influential spectacle of a perfectly righteous nation. This is clearly revealed both in the Old and New Testament. Thus Paul says, addressing the Gentile believers at Rome: "I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob; for this is My covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins." (Rom. 11: 25–27.)

And the provisions of this "new covenant" are thus declared by Jeremiah: "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah. . . . And this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord, I will put My law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and will be their God, and they shall be My people. And they shall teach no more every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, know the Lord: for they shall all know Me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord: for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more." (Jer. 31: 31–34.)

So also Isaiah says of Israel, "Thy people shall be all righteous, they shall inherit the land forever, the branch of My planting, the work of My hands, that I may be glorified." And then, as if transported with the glory of the dawning vision, he bursts forth into the glowing, burning words: "For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth. And the nations shall see Thy righteousness, and all kings Thy glory." (Isa. 60: 21; 62: 1, 2.) Yes; and seeing that righteousness, and the exalted position which Israel in consequence thereof occupies, the inhabitants of the world will learn that it is "righteousness alone that exalteth a nation, while sin is a reproach to any people."

THE BANISHMENT OF TEMPTATION FROM THE EARTH.

4. Lastly, All ultra-natural incentives to unrighteousness will be absolutely banished from the earth. Hitherto the story of Eve's temptation in the garden has been the history of all Eve's children. Not only as "the prince of the power of the air," has Satan "worked in the children of disobedience;" and "as a roaring lion" gone about "seeking whom he may devour;" but even of himself and the saints at Ephesus, Paul says: "Our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against the principalities, against the powers, against the world-rulers of this darkness, against the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places," or, rather, "the aerial regions." (Eph. 6: 12, R. V.) But "the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly," though previously he may for "a short time" be permitted to exercise, as he has never yet done, his "great wrath." (Rev. 12: 12.) "And I saw," says John, "an angel, having the key of the abyss and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, the old serpent, which is the Devil and Satan, and bound him for a thousand years, and cast him into the abyss, and shut it, and sealed it over him, that he should deceive the nations no more until the thousand years should be finished." (Rev. 20: 1-2.)

And how great a boon this banishment of Satan and his hosts will be to the world we can in some measure realize, not only from the history of the past, but also from the terrible results which almost immediately ensue, when, at the conclusion of the Millennial age, Satan will for "a little season be loosed out of prison and go forth to deceive the nations which are in the four corners of the earth." Why this brief return of Satan to this earth, to work such dire mischief is divinely permitted; why, according to St. John, it "must" needs be so, is indeed hard to understand further than this: (1) that it will conclusively demonstrate the inherent frailty of the natural man even at his best estate and under the most favorable circumstances; and (2) the incurable malignity and wickedness of Satan which is in nowise eradicated or subdued even by the penal judgment of a thousand years.

THE MILLENNIUM NOT A PERFECT AGE.

These, then, are the four strong pillars on which the righteousness of the coming kingdom will securely rest. It must not be supposed, however, that during the Millennial period the reign of righteousness will be universal—that is, beyond the limits of Israel, "the righteous nation that keepeth the truth," for the contrary is plainly implied in Zech. 14: 16–19, and other passages; but whereas now it may with truth be said that unrighteousness is the rule and righteousness the exception, then it will be equally true that righteousness shall be the rule and unrighteousness the exception.

Meanwhile, as the darkness falls, which is to deepen into a very "noon of night" over the world; as "evil men and seducers wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived;" as lawlessness, the noxious growth of ages, ripens its last deadly fruit; as the perilous times of the last days multiply their signs around us: still, above the shouts of victory that rise from the camp of the enemy, and amid the tumult of a world in arms against the Lord and against His Anointed, the watchful Christian can hear the Divine Voice, calm with the assurance of invincible power and immutable purpose, saying, "Yet have I set My King upon My holy hill of Zion. I will declare the decree: the Lord hath said unto Me, Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee. Ask of Me, and I shall give Thee the heathen for Thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for Thy possession."

Behold, He comes! He comes to bless
The nations as their King!
To rule the world in righteousness,
And peace eternal bring.

"ONLY WAITING."

A Temperance Talk.

"YES, I quite sympathize with you. My heart goes out to the drunkards, even as yours does. My spirit is sorely grieved at the thought of my drink-ridden country. The salvation of the drunkard is a noble object. I quite feel with you that to clear the mind from its drink fumes, is a necessary preparation for our glorious Gospel."

Was it not natural, after such strong words, that I should expect some personal statement as to my friend Tweezers' own abstinence from strong drink, that he had determined not only to talk temperance, but to practice it? But just when I was opening my mind to take in the expected information, this was what I received instead:

"Personally, you know, I am not an abstainer. I take a little wine, light wine only, with my dinner. I have been brought up to it, you see, from my boyhood. But this I am determined, that habits, doctors, taste, and fashion, shall avail nothing when the path of duty is clear. That moment come, and I will launch out on the sea of temperance with a brave heart, fearing nothing."

To tell the truth, I was disappointed. And it is of no use for me to disguise it. Almost with us. On the very line of separation. Standing like a swimmer on the edge of the stream, ready at the call of duty to spring off. All this, and only this, alas!

I asked Tweezers cheerfully, but with a secret pang within, for an explanation of what he would accept as a signal for the plunge.

"Well," he said, "I don't mind committing myself, for I assure you, I am quite honest in the matter. If a man who is ruining himself by drink should be hindered by my example, I will cheerfully take the pledge side by side with him. I will trace my name on the pledge-paper before his eyes, and so lead the way. No drunkard shall ever say I was his stumbling-block. This will be to me the path of duty, which I shall not dare to shrink back from."

I suppose I ought to have been charmed with this frank statement. I was not, however. It damped me rather than delighted me. I felt there was a flaw in it somewhere. That, though honestly said, it was not altogether satisfactory. It came to me like a bad half-crown which did not ring out true, though it seemed to do so to the offerer of it.

I asked Tweezers if he would mind hearing my view of the matter.

"Perfectly delighted," he said.

"Are you sure you have never had the opportunity and neglected it?" I asked. "I am not accusing you of any dishonesty of purpose. I am only putting my finger on what we all must have discovered before now in our own hearts, an unfairness in applying our own conditions. It may be you are waiting for some great opportunity. You will sacrifice yourself only on some public occasion when many eyes are upon you. It may be you have a certain kind of drunkard in your mind's eye, some notorious and desperately wicked one, or a drunkard in a particular rank of life. Of course it is possible to make such reservations in your promise as practically to annihilate it altogether. This is why I ask whether more than one opportunity has not come, and been neglected.

"And then, I should like to ask whether, should the opportunity ever come, you would then make up for the loss of your present influence? You have gained the drunkard, we will say. But in the years you have been waiting, how much good you might have done. You might, by God's help, have saved scores of drunkards, and by your influence have prevented hundreds from drifting into drunkenness. One man saved is but a poor set-off to the many you would have saved, had you acted sooner. Perhaps your ideal drunkard may only stumble across your path at the very end of your life. Perhaps he will never come to you. A present certainty is ever preferable to a future uncertainty.

"And how know you that your present influence is not working against the cause of temperance? You are waiting for some messenger from the drunkards' ranks to tell you your example will be a help to him. But where one is found to ask for it, and gratefully accept it, there are hundreds who silently crave and desire it without asking. Is it not as true in the temperance cause as in that of the Gospel that 'he that is not with us is against us?"

"And then, Tweezers, you must remember how many are imitating your waiting scheme. I know you have many imitators, and the longer you live, the more their numbers will increase. If every one were to act like you, the great temperance army would dwindle down to a very insignificant company. If your principle be a good one, it is worthy of universal practice. Nay, more, it ought to be universally accepted. If, however, as you must, you deprecate that, then see how you are placed. That which you would not wish imitated cannot be good. Perhaps you yourself are imitating some one.

"Life is so short that it is a pity to shift a good example into the unknown future. If in giving money it be true that 'he gives twice who gives quickly,' it is, surely, the same with our example.

"And then remember, too, that there is more hope of a man saved on his way to drunkenness than when drunkenness has become a habit. The cure is more perfect in the one than in the other. Lay yourself out to prevent, and do not wait for some opportunity, which perhaps, when you have gained it, will slip through your fingers."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate Passed the Presidential Succession Bill on January 9th with an amendment providing in the event of the death or inability of both the President and Vice-President for the assembly of Congress in extraordinary session. This bill meets, so far as the Senate is concerned, one of the serious questions which agitated the country during the illness of President Garfield. A second question was also raised. The Constitution, it was found, does not define the inability which would justify the substitution of the Vice-President for the President, nor provide for the resumption of duty by the President in cases when the inability might be only temporary. Senator Ingalls has introduced another bill dealing with that branch of the subject. It provides that whenever two heads of departments shall state in writing to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, he, the Chief Justice, shall convene the court within ten days, if it be not then in session, and it shall hear and determine summarily the question of alleged inability. If the court finds that such inability exists, it shall certify its decision to that effect to the Vice-President, who shall thereupon discharge the powers and duties of the office of President. The second section of the proposed act provides in a similar way for determining the removal of the disability, upon the ascertainment of which the President shall resume the discharge of the duties of his office.

The House of Representatives Passed the Shipping Bill without a division on Friday. There was a protracted debate on the measure, and some important amendments were introduced, at first accepted, but eventually rejected. The measure as passed, satisfies no one but those who desire the perpetuation of our present system. Among the amendments discussed in committee and in the House, the principle one provided that vessels built here for foreign trade, including that between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, were to be entitled to a drawback on all American materials used, equal to the duty which would have been collected if imported materials had been employed. In opposition to this provision the minority of the committee formulated amendments which provided for the admission of all shipping materials free and granted the right to citizens to purchase ships wherever they could be bought—in other words, they provided for "free ships and free materials." These clauses were both rejected.

The Prospects of Temperance Legislation in Ohio are thus described by an eminent journalist who has opportunities of obtaining reliable information: The Ohio Legislature seems disposed to make a sincere effort to arrive at a common-sense solution of the liquor question at its present session. The only thing which will probably prevent its succeeding is the great number of plans submitted. Some of these are complicated and would certainly cause dissatisfaction and embarrass the Republicans in this year's campaign. The general sentiment of the party as voiced by the newspapers evidently favors the simplest plan possible. A constitutional amendment repealing the no-license clause and a general tax law is believed to be the best method of solving the problem. The Legislature is said to have little work before it, and consequently there is ample time to digest the subject thoroughly.

A Medical Opinion on the Temperance Question was pronounced by an eminent authority at a meeting in New York last week. The meeting was convened to consider the beast means of promoting practical temperance reform in this city in connection with the work of the Church Temperance Society. After Mr. Robert Graham, the organizing secretary, had described the progress of the society, he directed attention to the good to be accomplished by securing the enforcement of the existing laws against illicit liquor dealers, against their keeping open on Sunday, and selling to minors or men in a state of intoxication. Dr. W. H. Draper then spoke of the pathological aspect of the temperance question. Physicians had to recognize the existence of alcohol and the almost universal appetite for it. His first suggestion was that the society should diffuse information as to the effects of alcoholic stimulants, which was greatly needed. His experience, based on twenty-five years of practice, convinced him that for all persons with sound constitutions alcohol in any shape was absolutely unnecessary and absolutely hurtful. Recent statistics of the New York Hospital showed that one third of the cases of sickness there came from excessive use of alcohol.

Herr Most, the European Socialist, now on a lecturing tour in this country, finds little sympathy in the West. A prominent journal describes his mission as a failure for the very suggestive reason that most of his former sympathizers now own property, and have consequently lost faith in Communism, and adds, "It is a pity that workingmen could not be made to see that the Church is to-day trying honestly to keep them and atone for its past errors and mistakes. Men like Most are not capable of advancing the condition of poor men one iota. And the reason is that when they are honest they are ignorant, and when they are intelligent they are nearly always dishonest demagogues."

The Appalling Disaster at Milwaukee, Wis. has cast a shadow over the whole land. The fire which destroyed the Newhall House on the morning of January 10th, is one of the most fatal of recent times. It is impossible to compute with reliable accuracy the number of lives lost, but there is reason to fear that not less than eighty-two persons perished in the flames. The fire was discovered about four o'clock in the morning near the elevator shaft. It spread by way of the shaft to the upper floors of the building before help could be obtained, and the guests and hotel servants who slept on those floors found their way to the basement cut off by smoke and flame. Many of them jumped from the windows to the street below. Some of these were dashed to pieces on the pavement; others fell on the maze of telegraph wires surrounding the hotel, rebounded cut by the wires and fell to the ground. Several women were rescued by the heroism of a fireman who, climbing to the roof of an adjacent building, made a bridge to the burning hotel of a ladder placed horizontally between the two. The fire brigades were promptly at work, but the construction of the hotel prevented the success of their efforts to save it. The exterior walls were of brick, but inside the partitions were of lath and plaster which offered no resistance to the fire. The hotel clerk states that there were 110 guests in the hotel and sixty-seven employés. Of these ninety-five are known to be saved; twenty-three dead bodies have been found and recognized, and fragments of corpses charred beyond hope of identification, but which are believed to represent sixteen bodies have been exhumed from the ruins. A searching investigation of the cause of the fire will be made by the coroner's jury. There is a prevalent suspicion that it was the work of an incendiary. Much indignation is expressed by the citizens of Milwaukee against the wealthy proprietors of the hotel on account of the lack of precautions against fire, the hotel constructed as it was being a certain death-trap in the event of a conflagration.

A Hospital in Memory of Garibaldi in New York is projected by the Italian residents of the city. The Italian Benevolent Society has already through its president, Chevalier G. J. Secchi de Casali, given an order for plans for the hospital. The plan of founding such a hospital originated with Mr. Secchi, who says that Garibaldi was opposed to having statues erected to his memory. Bellevue, St. Vincent's, and other hospitals have been visited and inspected for the purpose of obtaining information that may be useful in deciding what plan shall be adopted. It is said that the Italian patients in the hospitals are not treated as successfully as they should be, owing to the inability of the nurses to understand their language. Toward the building fund $2000 has been raised.

Christian Scholarship in America has Suffered a loss in the death of Dr. Charles Porterfield Krauth, D.D., LL.D., Vice-Provost of the University of Pennsylvania. Dr. Krauth died at Philadelphia, on January 2d, aged sixty years. He entered the Lutheran ministry in 1841, and labored with success in the pulpit for more than thirty years in the States of Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania. He was for several consecutive terms President of the General Council of the Lutheran Church in America. As a Biblical and historical writer, and especially as a writer upon the original history and relations of the authorized versions of the Scriptures, Dr. Krauth did valuable service in the religious world. He was a member of several historical and Oriental societies, and served on the American committee on the revision of the Old Testament.

The First Anniversary of the Cremorne Mission on Thirty-second Street, New York, was celebrated on Sunday, January 7th. Large crowds were gathered at the services, many of those attending having been rescued from a life of vice and immorality through the blessing of God on the labors of Jerry McAuley and his colleagues at the mission during the past year. It was stated that the aggregate attendance at the services during the year was 157,686. Interesting testimonies were given by twenty-two men and women present, of the blessings they had derived from the mission. All of them had been converted there, and in the majority of cases they had, prior to their conversion, been leading vicious lives. They were well dressed and appeared to have been temporally as well as spiritually blessed. Dr. Booth, of the University Place Presbyterian Church, made a statement of the finances of the mission. It had cost $8000, he said, to run it during the last year, but it would cost only $4000 for the ensuing twelve months, and a call was made for voluntary contributions. Dr. Booth pledged his congregation for $100. "A friend" at once gave $500, and another $250. Several other one-hundred dollar subscriptions were made, and in less than fifteen minutes more than half of the necessary $4000 had been subscribed. Several of the "converts" subscribed smaller amounts, such as $5 and $10. One man said: "I haven't got the money now, but I'll give $50 before the year is out," and a colored boy rose and said: "I'll give fifty cents a month for a year." An interesting feature of the celebration was the marriage of two converts and the christening of the infant of a couple who had been reclaimed from evil.

The Heaviest Damages on Record in a Suit for breach of promise of marriage were awarded last week in Brooklyn against a millionnaire, who was defendant in a suit of that description. The jury found for the full amount claimed—$75,000. The verdict occasioned some surprise on account of the sum it carried, and there will probably be an appeal granted. As is usual in such cases there was much contradictory evidence given, but the jury appear to have given credence to the story of the plaintiff. By her own admission, however, she acted so imprudently as to prevent any very general feeling of public sympathy in her favor. The verdict is gratifying, chiefly because it may operate as a warning. The defendant acknowledged that he had been guilty of gross immorality, and had the effrontery to say that the majority of the wealthy men of New York were leading similar lives. If this is true, it is time something was done to check it. A community in which such practices as those of this defendant are common, must inevitably fall under the wrath of God (Jer. 29 : 22, 23).

A Fight Between a Blacksnake and a Rattlesnake was witnessed recently in Texas. The Fort Worth Democrat thus describes the struggle : "The rattlesnake was apparently on a journey, and the meeting was quite accidental. At first the rattlesnake sought to avoid a difficulty, but when the blacksnake pressed the matter he halted, and folded his length into a coil. The blacksnake glided around in swift circles ; the rattlesnake never changed its position. But the circle still diminished its size, and as the blacksnake drew close the rattlesnake appeared to grow confused. His rattle ceased to give out the sharp sound, and his head dropped as if vertigo was seizing him. The blacksnake seized, by a lightning movement, the rattler by the throat, and winding him up in folds the two rolled over and over together, and in a few moments the rattlesnake ceased to breathe. An examination of the dead body of the rattlesnake revealed a fracture of the spine as complete as if done by a blow with a club." That was a fight the spectators could view with equanimity, not caring which of the deadly creatures won. The day will come when the saved church will witness a deadly conflict between her enemies, the hosts of the old serpent, in which they will turn against each other the weapons they have used against her (Ezek. 38 : 21, and Zech. 14 : 13).

A Train in a Sand Storm is the Subject of a graphic description in a San Francisco journal. The train which arrived at Oakland on the evening of January 2d was thirty hours late having been delayed by a terrific sand storm while crossing the Mojave Desert. The storm began in the early morning, and when the train reached Sumner had become a regular simoon. The wind swept across the sandy wastes with such violence that the train swayed and rocked under the violence of the blasts, and seemed ready to plunge from the track. The moon had become overcast in the early part of the night, and the journey was continued in a darkness that rapidly increased until the day began in Stygian gloom. The passengers, who had been aroused from their sleep by the fierce assaults of the wind and the dashing of the sand against the windows of the train, looked anxiously for the appearance of the sun, but no gleam of light relieved the forbidding darkness of the east. Night maintained her sway, and the blackness of the heavens grew intense with the morning. The small portion of the desert which was exposed by the engine's lights only served to discourage the travellers. The track was lost under the billows of sand that were being tossed across the rails by the angry storm. The desert moved like a sea, and when the waves of sand struck the shivering sides of the train they scattered like spray and filled the air with a dust which made free breathing impossible. Further progress was at length stopped by a collision with a freight train ahead that had run into the sand drift. No one was hurt, but the passengers had a dreary time of waiting while the storm abated and gangs of laborers cleared the track. An experience of which the passage through the sand storm may serve as a type, the believer is sometimes called to undergo in his journey through life. Such a case was that of the patriarch Job. It is then, while the light of life is obscured and the way obstructed that the Christian is brought to walk by faith and not by sight (1 Pet. 1 : 6, 7).

A Disappointed Gold Miner in California unexpectedly came upon the long-sought metal recently. It is stated that he labored assiduously for many years without any success, and, weary and dispirited he determined to abandon his claim. One day, lately, he was reflecting on his failure as he sat on the bank of the Indian River, watching a Chinaman in his employ at work. Suddenly he saw an immense nugget fall out of the dirt into the cut. As might be expected, for a time it completely unnerved him. It is related that he had the nugget all that day and could hardly decide what to do with it. After a few days the excitement wore away, and the mass of metal is now on its way to the mint to be coined into cash to feed, clothe, and educate his children and bring comforts to his lowly home. The piece of gold ore is flat, and is a little worn by washing and has several pieces of quartz still sticking to one side of it. It is valued at $2500. His patience and perseverance are rewarded at last, and he doubtless considers himself repaid by the discovery of the spot where the gold is. Yet the gold is useful to him only while he lives. The treasure which will last throughout eternity is offered freely to the world and the offer is slighted (Ps. 49 : 6–9).

A Remarkable Case of Suspended Animation is reported from Washington. On Sunday morning, January 7th, a lady living on First Street was on her way to attend church, when she suddenly became too faint to proceed. She turned back, and succeeded in reaching her home where she fell insensible on the floor. Her family thought that she was dead, and being Catholics summoned a priest who, also believing her dead, left the house. But a doctor who was called in thought it might be a case of suspended animation, and sent out for restoratives. They were administered and the lady revived and described her sensations. She said that she was conscious of voices at her bedside and knew that the priest had pronounced her dead. In an agony of apprehension she strove to move or speak, but her muscles would not obey her will. When the restoratives had been forced down her throat she made what seemed to her a gigantic effort, and came slowly back to life. The lady's alarm on hearing herself pronounced dead, and yet being powerless to move, can be imagined, and it was well for her that that opinion was not considered final. The soul of the sinner convinced of his lost state is equally helpless, as he soon discovers. But the Holy Spirit which God gives those who call upon Him imparts a new life that will never end (Rom. 8 : 10).

A Brave Mother's Long Journey through the snow is narrated by an Ohio newspaper. It appears that near the close of last year a laborer died at Troy, N. Y., leaving a widow and three children. The mother disposed of the household effects, and with the cash thus obtained—some $50—started for her parental home, which is at Niles, Mich. On the way she got on the wrong train and landed in Meadville, Pa., where her pocket was picked of all the money she had, except some small change, and, being unable to obtain assistance, she purchased a cheap handsled with a part of the balance that remained, and wrapping the little ones up as best she could, and seating them upon the sled, she took the babe in her arms and proceeded on her weary way through the snow, hauling the fatherless family behind her. In Elyria she received assistance, and was furnished transportation to Cleveland, where she found further assistance, enabling her to complete her journey by rail. The courage and devotion of the poor widow in undertaking such a journey as that from Pennsylvania to Michigan, on foot, and dragging her children on a sled are amazing. But she was cheered by the prospect of her father's house at the end of her weary way, and she hoped to take her children there. How many mothers are similarly encouraged in their painful toil by the hope of eventually reaching their Father's house in Heaven (Isaiah 8 : 18) !

THE BIRD ESCAPED FROM THE SNARE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers : the snare is broken, and we are escaped."—Psalm 124 : 7.

A Spiritual Rescue—A Canticle of Certainty—I. A Little Bird—A Fit Type of the Soul—Because of its Ignorance—Eager and Venturesome—Defenceless — Alarmed — The Objects of Snares—II. The Snare — Concealed — Attractive — Effectual — What are Soul Snares? — Pleasurable Sin—Erroneous Doctrine—Deceitful Action—Apeing Experince—Snares for the Spiritual—III. The Capture—Through Hunger—Appetite — Fear — Love of Company — IV. The Escape—Due to God—Complete—V. The Lesson—The Liberated Sailor's Purchase.

THIS text describes a soul-matter. The Psalmist is not speaking of a temporal deliverance, although even in that sense an escape from death would be a theme worthy of his song. He says, "Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers," thus denoting

A SPIRITUAL RESCUE.

The man's soul is the soul of the man ; and though some give all their attention to the body, their folly is great. It is as though a man should spend all his substance upon his house, and have no bread for himself to eat. Do I speak to any who never think about their souls? Do you really believe that you will die like dogs and horses? I cannot believe that you have such brutal views of yourself. Believe me, you have within you an immortal spirit, which will outlive the sun. If you have hitherto been careless of your nobler part, may God's Spirit teach you wisdom. I pray that you may so think of your soul that our text may become deeply interesting to you, so that you may join in its song of deliverance.

I have called the text a song ; does it not read like one? "Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers : the snare is broken, and we are escaped." It is a canticle of certainty. It does not say, "We hope that we have escaped, and we trust that the snare is broken ;" but "The snare is broken, and we are escaped." "If" and "buts" make no music. Poetry flees when peradventures enter. Certainties are melodies. We hear people speak of "dead certainties," but the Christian rejoices in living certainties, and is wretched till they are his own. Rise then, my beloved ; above the fogs and mists which cover the marshes of carnal questioning ; climb the mountains of full assurance, and stand there with your foreheads bathed in sunlight, breathing that serene atmosphere which is untainted by a cloud of doubt.

The text reads like a song, not only because of its certainty, but also because of its joy. It has the wing and the throat of a lark ; see how it rises from the net to God—"Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers." Anon it sakes another rise—"The snare is broken.' ' And it mounts yet again with still greater joy—"And we are escaped." The words melt away into the music of heaven as the spirit perfectly escapes from the snares of earth.

First, we have here the bird; secondly, the snare; thirdly, the capture; and fourthly, the escape : we may then add a lesson from it all.

I. First, we have here the soul compared to a bird. It is too—a sparrow, or one of the sparrow kind. "Our soul is escaped as a little bird"—not as a great bird that could break the net and free itself by its own force. A little bird fitly represents our soul when we are lowly in heart. In our unregenerate condition we think ourselves eaglets at the very least, but we are not great creatures after all. We talk of great men ; we are all little in God's sight. "Lord, what is man, that Thou art mindful of him?" Sparrows were very cheap in our Lord's day because of their littleness ; in the market you could buy two for a farthing, and five for two farthings, so that they threw an odd bird in when you bought at such a wholesale rate as two farthings' worth. Sparrows were inconsiderable things, "yet not one of them falleth to the ground without your Father." If He cares for sparrows, be sure He cares for souls, and when you think least of yourself, yet believe that the Lord regards you.

Again, our soul is like a little bird because it is so ignorant. Birds know little about snares, yet they know so much that "surely in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird." Even this slender wisdom is more than men display, for they fly into the net when it is spread in their sight; ay, into the selfsame net out of which, in God's providence, they have just been permitted to escape. Man naturally is the essence of folly; and he is desperately set on destroying himself. He must "see life," he says, and therefore he haunts the gates of death. He reckons the fowler to be his friend, and dreams that he spreads his nets for purposes of friendly hospitality. He does not know that the fowler is hunting for his life, and will destroy him if he can. So foolish are we and ignorant, we are as birds ready for the lure, till the Lord teaches us wisdom; and even then we need hourly keeping, or we are entrapped by the destroyer.

Our soul is often like a little bird because it is so

EAGER AND VENTURESOME.

How birds will trust themselves in winter around traps of the simplest kind if but a few crumbs are used as bait! Alas, men are equally foolhardy; they see others perish, yet they follow their ways. Many sip of the intoxicating cup, yet declare they will never be drunkards; they pilfer littles, and yet despise a thief; they indulge in wanton words, but vow to be chaste as snow; they go into questionable places of amusement, and hope to remain pure. Oh, silly birds! I mean silly souls! Thus the fowler fills his bags. Young people associate with ungodly persons, and say, "We are not so weak-minded as to be led away by them;" thus displaying a weak mind by that boastful speech. Youths tell us that to read sceptical books, and impure novels, and to hear lewd songs and spicy language will do them no harm. Believe no such flattering falsehoods, or you will rue the day. "You don't catch old birds with chaff," says the simpleton; and he hops into the net. "Younger birds must not come here," says he; "it is dangerous for them, but I am safe enough." Yet old birds' necks are wrung as well as those of young birds; and experienced men are as foolish as the juveniles. When a man says, "It is no temptation to me," it may be true, for soot will not blacken a sweep. Little birds, beware; the fowler promises pleasure, but the end thereof is death.

The little bird, also, when once taken in the net, is a good comparison with the soul captured by sin, for it is defenceless. What can it do? A mouse might eat the ropes and set free the lion, but no mouse will liberate the sparrow. He will have a short flutter, and we shall hear no more of him. When a man is birdlimed by a vice, the more he flutters the faster he is held by it. What is more defenceless than a soul in the net of sin? What little power men seem to have against their habits! They boast that they can stop anywhere—but, alas, they stop nowhere. "Oh, I have only to come to a determination." Yes, "only to come to a determination;" but to that determination you will not come. When men become entangled in the meshes of sin, their power to escape is gone; Jeremiah asks: "Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? Then may ye also do good that are accustomed to do evil." Such is the entanglement of habit, the slavery of lust.

While they are thus defenceless, we must notice, too, how alarmed they often are. The bird is no sooner in the net than he is frightened. Poor thing, how gladly would he escape if he could! Souls are not always so. They will be taken in Satan's snares, and yet say that they are happy.

CUSTOM IN SIN

kills conscience of sin. "A short life and a merry one," say they, as if there could be any true merriment anywhere except in the great Father's house, where they begin to be merry, as if they had never been merry before. Many souls have enough of conscience, and of enlightenment by the word, to alarm them when they find themselves entangled in sin; and then they beat about, and hurt themselves, but, alas! notwithstanding all their efforts, unless a stronger hand than theirs shall break the net, they will perish by the fowler's hand.

Our souls, once more, are like to birds because they are the objects of snares. If the Pharisees would compass sea and land to make one proselyte, certainly Satan will compass all the universe to ruin a single soul, for he delights in destroying the souls of men. Nor is it Satan only, for all the world seems to have taken to this fowling; and men who would not lift a finger to save their fellows will go far to ruin them. Oh, little birds, there is no place on earth safe for you till Jesus covers you with His protecting wing!

II. Secondly, we will now speak of

THE SNARE.

The text speaks twice of the snare.

It is wonderful what a variety of snares there are for birds. The tombs of Egypt exhibit the art of bird-catching, and show us decoys, traps, nets, and so forth. Such arts are still practised by fowlers. The main point about the snare is that it is concealed. So, when the arch-fowler comes after the souls of men, he will not usually spread his net in their sight. Some silly birds can be taken in that way, but the most of souls need that the temptation should be veiled. Always suspect that in a temptation to sin there is more than you can see. Never say that it is a little thing; for great evil lurks in a little fault. Death and destruction hide under apparently small offences. Oh, if we could see everything as God sees it, then we poor silly souls might be in far less danger! But, alas, Satan covers the hook with a tempting bait, and we are taken.

Snares and traps are usually attractive. The poor bird sees seeds which he is fond of, and he goes for them, little judging that he is to give his life in exchange for brief enjoyment. So is it with Satan. He tempts us with pleasures, with the lust of the eye, the lust of the flesh, and the pride of life: we taste the sweet, and are pierced with the smart. Did we perceive the intent of the great enemy of souls we should fly from sin. You know the old sentence, "Fear the Greeks, even when they bring gifts;" even so fear a temptation to sin, even should it offer you all the kingdoms of this world. May God keep us from the attractions which conceal the snare!

But Satan's snares, like the fowler's are sadly effectual. Look at the quantities of small birds that will be found for sale in the market; fowlers must be exceedingly skilful to catch all these. If we could walk through Satan's market, what a multitude of souls should we see in his hands! Multitudes upon multitudes are the victims of their own passions, victims of that hellish art which makes evil appear to be good. God save us from being taken in these most deadly snares!

WHAT ARE THESE SNARES?

I cannot mention them all, for they are legion. Snares tuck our bed, and snares attend our board. Snares are in the street, and snares are in the field. Snares are on the table, snares are in our daily walk. But the chief among them are temptations to sin. The Evil One endeavors to lead us into a false way, which will be congenial to our taste. We have each a peculiar weakness, and he knows how to adapt himself to it. He has been a student of human nature for so long a time that he knows more about man than man knows about himself, and he, therefore, chooses that bait which is most likely to attract us. Oh, that we may have grace to keep clear of

PLEASURABLE SIN!

The rabbis said to the Nazarite who was not to drink wine or strong drink, "Oh, Nazarite, go about, go about; and do not pass through a vineyard." So, child of God, it will be well for you to go about, and not enter into temptation. Your Master bids you pray, "Lead us not into temptation." Against temptation we are to watch and pray as well as against the sin that is likely to come of it.

Another snare is erroneous doctrine. There is plenty of that abroad at this time. Be warned. You can have doctrine high, and doctrine low; doctrine broad, and doctrine narrow. You can have it how you like, for nowadays every man makes his own Gospel, and sits in judgment upon the Word of God. Dearly beloved, hold fast the truth, and be not decoyed by error. If any come with a new Gospel, turn away your ear from their deceptive teaching; for false doctrine is the poison of asps, and the venom of hell lieth therein.

Even Christian people are in danger from another snare, namely,

DECEITFUL ACTION.

The tempter whispers, "You need not do evil, but there are different ways of judging right and wrong, and it is best to go by the custom of the trade." Satan puts things very prettily when he means to ruin us. You have somebody else's money intrusted to you. Of course, you would not steal it; but you can use it for a little, and then replace it. It is true, if it should be lost, people will call you a thief; but then you are not going to lose it; you are going to double it by your cleverness. That is the snare. At other times the temptation is in this form—"Be sure to buy the thing if you would like it, though you have no money with which to pay for it." You would not steal. No, no; there is another way of doing it. Buy it, and do not pay for it. This is one of the snares with which Satan seduces men, till they are ruined. Ah, me, that men should be so soon moved from their integrity! Oh, child of God, be upright in everything! However well you may gloss a matter over, and however much others may excuse it, yet if a certain act would be wrong in the sight of God, you must not think of it.

I have noticed another snare. Satan tries to get Christian people to ape the experience of others. A certain good man is often melancholy. "Ah," says Satan, "that is how you ought to be; you ought to be bowed down with holy sorrow." I remember right well when I was a youth hearing a preacher say that it was dangerous to be sure of our salvation; and he preached up the duty, and beauty, and sweetness of being everlastingly in doubt as to your condition. A few people would gather around such a preacher, and sit and have a little comfortable misery all to themselves, and think that they were worshipping God. Now, that is a snare to a Christian, because he has a right to be glad, and "the joy of the Lord is our strength." May we be kept out of that snare!

On the other hand, anxious people see Christians who are advanced in grace and full of faith, while they themselves are much cast down; then the Evil One whispers, "You are not like those good men; you are no Christian." Brother, you cannot have another man's experience any more than you can wear another man's face. Certain lovely ferns grow best in the shade, and never flourish in the sun; while many flowers cannot have too much sunlight. Do not wish to be like this man or that man, but pray God to make you like Jesus Christ, and to let your experience glorify His blessed name; otherwise the desire to copy others will be a snare to you.

SNARES FOR THE SPIRITUAL.

Thus I might go on mentioning snares. They are some of them gross and carnal; but for the spiritual there are snares so neat and pretty that they are apt to be taken in them before they are aware. According to Pliny, the nets in which the Egyptians took little birds were frequently so fine that one person could carry a net large enough to encompass a whole wood. Surely, it must have been a small wood, and even then it is a remarkable statement for so reliable a writer to have made. We may here see an illustration of the delicacy of those temptations with which Satan surrounds the nobler order of minds. Strong as iron, yet filmy as gauze, are the snares for spiritual men. Why, Satan can encompass a whole church with one of those nets, and you scarcely know that it is there; and yet the minds within its meshes are quite unable to mount up and sing unto their Lord, as once they did, for they are within an invisible net.

III. We cannot further dwell on the subject of the snare, but we must turn to consider

THE CAPTURE.

Birds are taken in nets, and souls are taken by temptations to sin, and by errors of doctrine, and by a thousand other methods. Dear friends, it is a dreadful thing for the poor little bird when it is taken, especially when it is so anxious to escape that it beats itself, and hurts itself in its efforts to get free. How came it to be taken?

It may have been taken through hunger. Half-starved, it dashed into peril for necessary food. Many true men are in such straits and difficulties that they are sadly liable to be brought into the net thereby. Dear brethren, pray God to deliver you from poverty and from great riches, for there are perilous snares about each of those positions. May you be neither exalted nor depressed, but preserved in the middle path of experience. If you are extremely needy, you may be tempted to do wrong to provide for your wife and family; I pray that you may never yield to the temptation, but trust in God, and He will deliver you without your putting forth your hand unto iniquity.

Other birds are taken merely by their appetite. They are not excessively hungry, but they enjoy and the fowler knows it; and he scatters such around the trap. Ease of body, indulgence of taste, the joy of being admired, the sweets of power and position, all these and many more have been the fowler's baits. Hundreds have all that heart ought to wish for, but they must needs be rich, and therefore fall into a thousand snares which they might have avoided. Men are snared by eating and by drinking, by fine raiment and by vainglorious display. Snares lie thickly around the appetites of the body and the longings of the mind.

Some persons are entrapped by fear. Birds have rushed into the net for fear of danger; many persons have become great offenders against God through lack of moral courage. They are afraid of the laughter of fools. They cannot bear the sarcasm of the so-called wise; and so they suppress truth, and join in sin to escape scorn. God give us a holy bravery wherewith to defy every man's opinion when we know that we are obeying the Lord.

Some little birds are lost by love of company. The fowler has a decoy-bird which sings sweetly or coquettes pleasantly, and the other birds must needs follow it. In the church of God we lose many members by ungodly marriages. The worldling pipes his pretty note, and the tender heart is taken by it. The fair enthusiast says, "I shall convert him;" but it is very, very seldom that this happens; it is usually the other way. This is a snare of Satan in which many are taken.

Thus you see how souls are captured. Perhaps I am speaking to one here who has flown into the net. You do not know what to do, friend; for you are quite helpless to break your bonds. You went in very eagerly, and, oh, how eagerly you would get out again if you could! But you cannot escape. Your own helplessness is now apparent as it never was before. One thing, however, you can do; you can cry to One who is stronger than you. You can pray the Lord to pluck your feet out of the net; and He is able to do it, for all things are possible with Him.

IV. Just a word or two upon

THE ESCAPE.

This is a very blessed text, although the sermon has been gloomy so far; for now we shall see the fowler disappointed, and the captive let loose.

I wish that everybody here could repeat the utterance, and cry, Our soul is escaped. We were in the net, but our soul has escaped. The snare is broken; it has no power over us any longer; we are free from its grasp, we have escaped. Up, up, we soar, away from the fowler and his nets. Glory be to God, we have escaped.

"As when the fowler's snare is broke,
The bird escapes on cheerful wings;
My soul, set free from Satan's yoke,
With joy bursts forth, and mounts, and sings."

This escape is due to God alone. As the bird could not get out of the snare, so the soul cannot escape from temptation; but God can bring it out, and He works the rescue. Hear this, ye that are slaves to drunkenness; God can deliver you. You that have fallen into licentiousness; hear it—God can deliver you. Whatever the sin that has birdlimed you, that gracious hand which once was nailed to the cross can set you free. Up, up, up, ye that pine on the borders of despair! Jesus can deliver you. He that made the world out of nothing can make a joyful Christian even out of you. He can turn your mourning into dancing, and your despair into confidence.

This escape is achieved by power. That word "broken" has force in it. "The snare is broken," the meshes torn with a strong hand, the steel trap dashed in pieces. It matters not what danger you are in, there is power enough in God to fetch you out of it. I thought once that God could never save me. I supposed that He would bless my brother and my sisters, but that He would leave me; yet He did save me, blessed be His name! And you, too, He is able to deliver. "Oh, but I am the odd man," cries one. Then there are two of us; and if God has saved one odd man He can surely save another; and why should He not save you despite all your eccentricity? "But I do not think that He will save me." What are your thoughts worth? He can save even you. Only trust Him, though you be in the net, and out of that net you shall be fetched, for He leaves no soul to perish that puts its trust in Him.

Observe that the escape was complete: "The snare is broken, and we are escaped." As long as a little bird has the tiniest bit of cotton tied to its leg, and that is fastened anywhere, the bird has not escaped. And as long as you have one evil habit—one wrong thing that you really love—you have not clean escaped. You must be altogether separated from your sins. No man can be married to Christ till he is divorced from sin. Our deliverance must be entire, or it is not true. Who can give us this but the Lord Jesus Christ by His blessed Spirit? Trust Him to set you free, and no net shall hold you.

I would again put the question, "How many of us can say, We have escaped?" Let us sing unto the Lord, if we can; and let those who cannot say that they are free, continue to plead earnestly with God that He would deliver them.

V. I would close with the lesson which this subject ought to teach us. A word or two only.

It ought to teach us, first, to sing, for if a bird gets out of the net, does it not sing? How glad it seems to be when once it flies away! Oh,

YOU THAT HAVE BEEN DELIVERED

from sin and Satan, sing unto the Lord! Praise and bless His name. Be as happy as possible. Be something more than full of happiness. How can that be? Why, be so full of it that it overflows and cheers others. Let us communicate our joy as far as ever we can, for we are escaped. We are escaped, and we will praise the blessed God who broke the snare.

Next, let us trust, for if the Lord has saved us from the dreadful snare of sin and Satan, He will save us from everything else. It is sad to me that any should trust the Lord with their souls, and yet they cannot trust Him for their daily bread, or for help in their daily trials. This must not be. If the Lord has given our soul so great an escape, depend upon it He will take care of our bodies. He that gave us Jesus will give us food and raiment, and let us be therewith content.

Lastly, let us watch. If we have fallen into the snare once, let us keep our eyes open not to go there again. May the Holy Spirit prevent any child of God from turning aside even for a moment from the straight way. "Let them not turn again to folly," is one of God's own cautions to His people. He has brought you up out of the horrible pit; do not play near the edge of it. He has set your feet on a rock; what have you to do with the miry clay? Get away from the slippery ground, and on the rock let your goings be established.

THE LIBERATED SAILOR.

I would say again to you netted one—you that are really caught in the trap, and held fast; oh, that the Lord would come at once, and set you free. I think He will, yea, I am sure that He will if you cry to Him to do so. I have heard of a sailor who had been in prison, that after his release, he had money in his pocket, and going over London Bridge, he saw a man selling birds—thrushes, larks, and so on. "What do you want for that lot?" said Jack. I forget how much it was, but Jack found the money; and as soon as the birds were his he opened the door, and let them all fly away. The man called out "Whatever did you buy those birds for, and then let them out?" "Oh," said the sailor, "if you had been in prison as I have been you would be sure to set everything free you could get a hold of." You and I ought to display the same kind of feeling toward all poor bondaged souls. I am sure that the Lord Jesus Christ is more tender-hearted than we are; and therefore He will certainly come and set free all prisoners who beg Him to open their cage doors. He is the great Emancipator; show Him your bonds, and beg for liberty, and He will grant it you.

THE INDIAN CITY OF DELHI.

THE picture on page 45 gives a view of a gateway in the city of Delhi, one of the most ancient and magnificent cities of India. These gateways were in ancient times, and to some extent even in the present day centres of communication and intercourse. Business was transacted there; disputes were settled there, and they were the places in which notifications and publications were made.

The city of Delhi has had a very checkered history. In comparatively recent times its most momentous event was its capture by Babur in 1525, who was the following year proclaimed emperor, and founded the Mogul dynasty, which gradually became possessed of a considerable portion of Hindostan.

The extensive dominions owned by subsequent Mogul emperors yielded them a revenue such as had never been known since the days of Solomon, when "silver and gold at Jerusalem were as plenteous as stones." Some of these Mogul princes were distinguished by a passion for architecture; and the unlimited means at their disposal enabled them to indulge their inclination to the utmost extent. The very tombs which they raised over their deceased relatives, such as Taj-Mahal at Agra, the most splendid mausoleum in the world, and the most touching tribute of affection ever paid by a Mahommedan prince to the memory of a beloved consort, would elsewhere have been deemed palaces for the living, save among the ancient Egyptians, who appear to have entertained similar feelings of regard for their cherished dead.

No single edifice, however stately, can give an adequate idea of the scale on which the architectural operations of the Mogul emperors, by means of their boundless wealth, were carried on. They had but to speak the word, and in a few years a range of rocky hills became the site of a new metropolis, fitted for the reception of half a million of subjects; and history records more than one instance in which a production of this kind was commenced and completed by one prince.

Yet all this splendor has long been a thing of the past; and though upwards of three centuries have elapsed between Babur's conquest of Hindostan and the final extinction of the dynasty after the Sepoy Mutiny of 1857, a certain degree of State was allowed to the King of Delhi. who was the pensioner of the British Government, up to the eve of the rebellion.

What a contrast to the former grandeur of the Mogul emperors was that presented at Delhi in the early part of 1857. On January 27th a military commission assembled in the palace of that city for the trial of Mahommed Bahadoor Shah, of that once mighty race. After three weeks' judicial investigation the wretched monarch was in his own capital found guilty of having ordered the murder of forty-nine Christians at Delhi, of waging war upon the British Government and of exciting the people of India, by proclamations, to destroy the English. Sentence of death was recorded against him, which was eventually commuted into one of transportation, by the clemency of Lord Canning, then Viceroy of India, and they were exiled to Tounghoo, in Burmah.

THE LAST KING

Thus was prostrated in ignominy and disgrace the descendant of a long line of illustrous princes, prominent among whom are the renowned names of Babur, Shah Jebán, and Aurungzebe. The vast appanage which once belonged to the Mogul monarchs, has now passed into the hands of a race whose dominions at the time of the Mahommedan conquest of India, were confined to two comparatively small islands in the Western Ocean, but which now has obtained an empire on which "The sun never sets." The responsibility for that proud position it is scarcely possible to realize. It does not end with wise and good government. England as a Christian country having control of a land sunk in superstition and ignorance cannot free herself of the duty of giving the Gospel to the people she has conquered. This duty the government has never recognized, but private Christians have gone there and have undertaken the neglected task. A noble band of men of whom Carey was the pioneer, have preached the Gospel in the land, and many souls have been gathered into the Kingdom through the blessing of God on their efforts.

A CENSOR CENSURED.

(See Illustration.)

"I AM sure Edward Hartshorne is an honest man, uncle, whatever is said about him. He is industrious, too, and I am sorry for him."

"Honesty and industry, my dear, always result in the payment of one hundred cents on the dollar. If a man owes me a thousand dollars, and when the times comes for payment, he offers me two hundred and fifty and says that is all he can pay I naturally doubt his honesty. Even if he should turn out to have been honest and calls his trouble misfortune, it generally happens that it would be more accurately described as the natural results of idleness and incapacity."

"I cannot set my business experience up against yours, uncle, but in this particular case I know Edward Hartshorne well, and I am certain that he is both honest and industrious. He has not been successful I know, and I suppose his failure was very disastrous; but he struggled hard, and if you would forgive that and give him the chance he asks for to commence business again, I am sure you would not regret it."

"Upon my word, Mamie, Hartshorne has an eloquent advocate. If all his creditors could listen to your pleadings I really believe they would accept his offer and give him his discharge. But you ladies never take an impartial view of facts, you are swayed by your likes and dislikes, and in this case I believe you are wrong. Hartshorne ought to have suspended three years ago when his business first began to show a deficit instead of a surplus. But he would not do that. He borrowed money to meet his obligations, and then the next year his profits would not cover his business expenses, and the interest on his borrowed money, and there was another deficit. He did not suspend even then, but borrowed more money, hoping for better times and so the burden became heavier than he could carry and he failed miserably. That's his case, and I say that a man who acts so, and involves in loss men like myself who were kind to him and assisted him in his difficulties, does not deserve to be released. He ought to be punished as an example."

"I hope, uncle, you will change your mind about him. Mr. Hartshorne seems to have been trying to avoid bankruptcy. I snppose it would have been easier for him to take the soft road of suspending three years ago, as you say; but if he thought he could pay every one in full by waiting and borrowing money, he may have had a good motive after all. I like him all the better for making a brave struggle to maintain his position. Do, uncle, as a favor to me withdraw your opposition to him."

"I cannot understand your interest in him, Mamie; I expect that handsome son of his has had something to do with it. But you must understand that affair is off now. I consented to your engagement when I supposed the father was a prosperous merchant. I would never permit you to marry him now. As you ask me as a favor to you to withdraw my opposition, to the father, I will do so; but there must be no renewal of the engagement."

"Thank you, uncle, for your concession; it will be time enough to discuss the renewal of the engagement when Walter proposes it. You have been a second father to Laura and me ever since we were left two little orphans, when poor papa died; I should be ungrateful, indeed, if I did not submit to your wishes in such a matter."

"Spoken like a good girl and we'll seal that compact with a kiss. Now I will send a telegram withdrawing my opposition to Hartshorne's discharge, and then I shall go to the beach for a swim, and in two hours from this I will meet you both at the Crag's foot. The New York papers will be here by that time, and if you will bring my Times with you, I shall be able to read it right away."

At the appointed time the two sisters strolled leisurely to the trysting place where their uncle met them. He seized his Times with the eagerness a city man on a holiday excursion always shows to get his newspaper, and asked the ladies' permission to glance over its contents at once before starting on the walk. It was, however, more than a glance the gentleman gave to the news. There was intelligence there that sent a cold chill through his veins. One of the columns was headed with the announcement of the death of a bank president, the flight of the cashier, and the sudden closing of the institution.

He closed the newspaper and folded it with mathematical accuracy as when stricken with some sudden blow men often perform some trivial act with scrupulous care. He turned to his nieces and said he was ready for a walk. But he was a different man from the man who opened the newspaper ten minutes ago. That was a self-satisfied, wealthy man, with a large income, respected on all sides as the largest shareholder and influential director of a noted financial institution; this, was a ruined man who knew he was not worth a dollar, that his house and even his furniture would be claimed by the creditors of the bank, and that he would be held up to public execration for his credulous faith in men whom he should have watched. He said no word of this to his nieces. In a dull crushed state of mind he strolled with them, and even made an effort to join in their conversation. The suffering he endured during that hour none ever knew but himself.

He returned to the city that night to meet the storm which concentrated on his head. It was a bitter time. One after another the men who relying on his sagacity and honor had invested in the bank came to upbraid him with his negligence, and to heap on his head the reproaches of the ruined. Only one friendly hand grasped his that day. It was that of Edward Hartshorne, who came to thank him for the merciful act which had turned the tide in his favor, and enabled him to make an effort to retrieve his fortunes.

A few years later and Edward Hartshorne, successful in business, having paid off all the obligations of his failure, called on the man he persisted in calling his benefactor, and finding him and his nieces in abject poverty, offered him a partnership in his business. It was accepted gladly, and when that night at family prayer he read the words of the Great Teacher, "Judge not that ye be not judged. For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again," tears came into his eyes. He did not need to seek a commentary for an exposition of the Divine words.

A Gateway in Delhi, India.

HELEN ANDERSON'S VISIT.

A LARGE dry goods store in New York was being closed one winter evening, and the salesladies were busy putting their respective departments in order for the night. Helen Anderson was one of the most active of these. Deftly and rapidly each box and drawer was examined, and the contents placed in neat and attractive order. She was soon through and stood waiting for the signal to leave.

"You are coming with us to the concert to-night, of course," said a friend, who was engaged in the same establishment, and who passed Helen as she stood.

"No," said Helen, "I am not going. I want to see Katie Romayne. She is so dreadfully ill, and it's lonely for her in that horrid boarding-house all by herself. I'm going there to-night."

"Well, you have a queer taste" said her friend. "I think after being in this place all day at work one is entitled to a little relief and now we have a chance of hearing some good music and seeing a little life, you throw it away and are going to sit in a stuffy sick-room with a girl you don't care for a bit. I can't understand you, Helen. It is not as if Katie were your sister or a very particular friend."

"All the same I am very sorry for her," said Helen. "You are all going to the concert to-night and no one else knows her; so she will certainly be alone if I don't go."

"It's very kind of you, of course, but I don't believe in sacrificing one's self for other folks in that way. You'll get no thanks for it and you'll miss the concert. You can go to Katie's another night."

But Helen shook her head. She saw the merry group depart without a single regret. She would have gone with them readily enough at another time, but the recollection of Katie's pale, wistful face as she had last seen it, effectually overcame any disposition to enjoy a concert that night. Accordingly slipping on her rubbers and a thick wrap she started for a trudge through the snow across town to Katie Romayne's boarding-house. It was among the low-priced houses on the east side, and Helen not caring to endure the protracted infliction of a Belt Line car, and being too poor to pay three fares, she concluded to walk the two miles that lay before her as Katie did every day when she was in health.

If Helen had needed consolation for the pleasure she had missed at the concert, she received it in the look with which Katie Romayne told of the weariness and depression that her coming put to flight.

"This is real kind of you, Helen," said Katie, "I never thought I should be so glad to see any one as I am to see you. The hours seem so long when one is alone and suffering, but I have been encouraging myself with the hope of your coming. But when the snow came I was afraid you would not venture. It is very kind of you to come; I shall never forget it, if I live."

"'If you live,'" said Helen slipping off her rubbers and sitting down by the bed. "That is not in doubt now, Katie. You are looking much better than you were, and we are all hoping to have you back in the store again soon."

"I don't know," Katie answered, "I am still very sick, and sometimes I feel convinced I shall never leave this room alive."

"Don't give way to fancies, Katie, I think you are getting better, and will soon be well enough to go out. But tell me, how do you feel when you think you will die? Are you in great dread?"

"No, I am just dull and stupid about it. I don't know what will come after death. How can I tell? It will be a change, but I cannot even guess what kind of a change. The priest at the little chapel on the corner came here yesterday, and I confessed, and he gave me absolution, so I suppose I should be all right if I died. You are a Protestant and may think different, but I was reared in Ireland and there we trust to the priest."

"I wish you would trust in Jesus instead of in the priest, Katie. Jesus loved you so well that He came to die for you; why not go right to Him?"

"Have you done that, Helen? Did He hear you? I have always thought you were different from the other girls. Perhaps it was that made you different. I thought of that to-day when I was expecting you, and wondered why you came to see me instead of the other girls. I was much more intimate with them than with you."

"You have asked ever so many questions, Katie. Let me answer one at a time. I did ask Jesus to save me and He has done so. He never refuses any one who is really in earnest about it. Then I try to live as He wishes and that is the reason I come to see you. I cannot do much good, but He was very kind to the sick when He was on earth, and if I can come and cheer you and others when they are ill, I feel that I am doing what He likes and that makes me happy."

"Helen, you are very good. Will you pray to Jesus for me?"

"I do pray to Him for you, my dear child, but that is not enough. I want you to pray for yourself. I am not good; I have many wicked thoughts and sometimes I do things I grieve over very much, and I ask Him to forgive me. He does not make us perfect, no one in this world is holy. His dearest children are tempted and have to struggle to do right; but He helps them. Only you must go to Him first, and ask Him to save you and then after that you will be all the time getting better and stronger and more like Him."

"Helen, where did you learn all this? Let me hear you pray. I don't know any prayer except those in the Missal and the Garden of the Soul. I don't know how to pray."

Kneeling down by the bed, Helen prayed that light might come into that poor dark soul, and afterward she taught Katie a few simple petitions appropriate to her case. With those she left her, after giving her the little pocket Testament she carried. Then as she plodded homeward through the snow and mire of the city, she thanked God that He had permitted her in her humble way to work for Him.

The next day she listened with an unmoved heart to the glowing accounts her friends had to give her of the concert and to the sympathy tendered to her on account of the pleasure she had missed. She knew that her joy was far above any the world could give, for she hoped she had been the means of commencing a work that would last through eternity. Nor was that hope a false one. Katie's recovery was followed by a Christian life, and the two girls working together in love for their Saviour and each other, have been the means of winning other souls for Him who died for them.

A Story by Rev. Jackson Wray.

CLEVELAND'S BRIDAL GIFT.

WHILE these sad occurrences were transpiring at Carchester, Eugéne Lefevre and his handsome bride were spending their honeymoon on the borders of a Swiss lake. The honeymoon, however, had already belied its name, for there was but little sweetness in it, and that little threatened to be exhausted before the moon had utterly waned away. Entirely a marriage of convenience, and on the Frenchman's side a marriage with a view to wealth, the misalliance in which the heart had nought to do began fully early to produce its natural fruits of repining and regret.

No sooner did the news of the collapse of Musgrave's Bank reach the ears of the astounded Lefevre, than, with a scowl upon his face and a curse upon his lips, he declared that they must start for England at once. Rage, disappointment, and revenge made his own secret to leap from his lips, and blanch still paler the pale cheek of his luckless wife. He too, like Michael Musgrave, had urged on the marriage from selfish considerations, for he, too, had blown a bright financial bubble which had been pricked at the moment when he was most confident of success; and marriage with Margaret Musgrave was his prescription for filling his purse, and setting him on his legs again.

Never will Margaret Lefevre forget that awful journey to her native land. Her husband was more mad than sane, and roundly declared that he would cast her off, and leave her to die on a pauper's bed. To her, poor soul! the casting off was the one alleviating beam of hope that lightened up the gloom; a pauper's bed had just then less terror for her in the prospect of lying there alone. What might have transpired had the baffled and frenzied Frenchman reached the Musgrave mansion cannot be told. No sooner had the steamer dropped anchor in the port of Dover than it was boarded by two detectives, one of whom laid his hand upon the shoulder of Lefevre, and arrested him for heavy frauds on a Parisian bank. Our scheming financier knew too well what the upshot would be, and in an instant he disengaged himself from the grasp of the officer, and, with one wide bound, leaped into the turgid flood. The ebb-tide was flowing strong, and long before assistance could be rendered, Eugéne Lefevre had gone to his account.

Shocked beyond measure at this new catastrophe, sadly unstrung both in body and mind, the young wife, made so suddenly a widow, continued her journey in all haste to Carchester. Though she wept no tears for the memory of her dead husband, she did weep bitter tears on the neck of her sore stricken mother, and by the side of her poor and helpless father. All that was best in Margaret Lefevre now came to the front; with the most loving attention and unremitting care, she sought to lighten the burden and soothe the sorrow of her afflicted parents.

It was a mystery to her, as she listened to the tones of her mother's voice, and heard her faltering, but emphatic testimony to the truth and preciousness of true religion, as to how this wondrous change had come to pass. To see how her father's eyes brightened, and how he nodded his head in satisfied affirmation in response to her mother's quotations from the words of Jesus and the Psalms of David, was an additional cause of surprise. The mystery was solved, however, when Mr. Cleveland made his appearance, and when she listened to the winsome words of comfort, hope, and cheer which fell so feelingly from the young man's lips, and so stirred his hearers' hearts. All this gave rise to many ponderings and serious thoughts, alike in the quiet of her chamber and by the bedside of her helpless father.

One day, Mr. Cleveland, being resolved upon the leading of the fair young widow to the same gracious Saviour that her parents had found, said to her:

"Mrs. Lefevre, may I hope that you have favored my little wedding present with somewhat of interest and attention during your absence?"

A deep blush pervaded the cheeks of Margaret as she answered in full candor, remembering the small but beautifully-bound copy of the New Testament which he had given her on that momentous day:

"O Mr. Cleveland, I'm ashamed to say that I have never opened its pages. Don't think me unkind; I assure you I valued it, and will promise you to read it."

"Do, please; not so much because it was a wedding gift, but because it is the gift of God. Believe me, as one who knows the sorrows of bereavement, that there is in it all you need to sustain and comfort you in these dark and trying days."

That very afternoon Margaret entered the room where an unpacked trunk, which had accompanied her on her wedding tour, was lying. She opened it, and then, kneeling by its side, she searched its contents for Noel Cleveland's bridal gift. Then, retreating to her chamber, she locked herself in, and turned over the sacred pages with a beating heart and a tearful eye. On the fly-leaf was written by the donor, "Presented to Miss Margaret Musgrave, with a fervent prayer that she may find herein the gracious knowledge of a Father, a Saviour, and a Comforter; that in the day of gladness this book may be her guide and teacher, and that in the day of sorrrow it may be her strength and consolation."

The words seemed prophetic. The day of gladness had been enjoyed and the day of sorrow had come with its crushing burden. In the day of gladness the bridal gift had never been opened. Its teachings, valuable as they are, were unheeded. Margaret's religion was, like the religion of thousands, a mere conventional custom, a social wrap to be worn on Sundays as the notions of society demanded, and then to be laid aside until the following Sunday. That the New Testament contained words which were to be the life of the soul, that were to inspire and dominate the thoughts and actions of every-day life, Margaret never once dreamed, she sat down to read the divine words in her hour of sorrow with no conception of their potency.

For a short time she sat looking meditatively at the inscription in Noel Cleveland's bold handwriting. "In the day of gladness," that had passed away; there was no need to consider what the book might have been to her then. Would such days return? It seemed little likely. She was the daughter of a bankrupt banker, and the widow of a self-murdered swindler; the world would hold her as identified with the wrong-doing of both men, innocent though she was. Mrs. Lefevre knew of no happiness outside the delights of social life, and those were barred against her by the crime of her husband and by the failure of her father. It was a blank and dreary prospect on which she looked out. She could see before her no day of gladness when the little book might be her guide and teacher.

It was with the second period Noel Cleveland had mentioned that her account lay. When he wrote those words there seemed no probability of their being appropriate for her. The petted child of the wealthy and aristocratic banker, the wife of the shrewd, clever financier, it would seem that her life was shielded from trouble by the golden bulwark before which the waves of trouble are supposed to fall back impotent. But the trouble had come, and Noel Cleveland recommended the book for that also. "Strength and consolation" might be derived from it. She sorely needed both. The support of her life had been cut away and she needed strength. The joys of life had been withdrawn, and she needed consolation. As the promise of water to a man dying of thirst, so to the afflicted widow was the promise of strength and consolation.

"Margaret, Margaret." The voice of her mother was calling her, and she laid aside her book for the time and descended to Mrs. Musgrave's room. "Your father is worse," said that lady. "I am afraid he is dying, do come."

Mrs. Lefevre entered the sickroom with her mother and saw in her father's pallid face confirmation of the sad foreboding. She hurried away to send a messenger for the physician, and then returned to administer such restoratives as, in her own inexperience, she thought might sustain the flickering lamp of life. A spasm of agony was rending that wreck of a frame. The aged banker shivered and shook beneath its power, and as he lay on the threshold of the grave he quailed before the awful change.

The physician arrived to find his patient overcome with pain and nerveless with terror. He was not alarmed. With gentle hands and with the quiet self-reliance of the practised healer, he administered relief, and soon the patient was quietly slumbering like a tired child. The two ladies sat and watched the sick man after the physician had left them in glad relief from the terrible strain of anxiety, each busy with her own thoughts.

Only a few minutes passed before a servant entered with the information that Mr. Cleveland had called. "Go and speak to him, Margaret," said Mrs. Musgrave, "I will not leave your father while he sleeps. Tell Mr. Cleveland how he is, and ask him to call again. He is always welcome, but sleep is the one thing needed now after this suffering."

Mrs. Lefevre left the sickroom and entered the parlor where Mr. Cleveland awaited her. She told him of the crisis that had passed since his visit in the morning, and of her father's present condition.

"This is a sad time for you all, Mrs. Lefevre," said Mr. Cleveland; "I fear you must be suffering deeply. For such afflictions as yours the world supplies no medicament, but He in whose hands are all our ways has given us one that never fails. Thousands of people have turned to it in the dark hours of life and not one has come away empty. Let me beg of you to test it for yourself."

"I have been thinking of it this afternoon, Mr. Cleveland, and the words you wrote in the New Testament you gave me impressed me; but I do not understand how I can realize the strength and consolation you speak of. I have heard the Bible read every Sunday since I was a child, and many chapters I now know by heart; but there seems no comfort in them for such woe as this."

"Yet," said Mr. Cleveland, "there is comfort in them if you would take it. If Jesus had not been God as well as man, His merely human experience qualified Him to comfort the afflicted. He had no home; His most intimate friends misunderstood Him; His enemies jeered at Him and scorned Him; Satan tempted Him and His whole ministry was one of pain and sorrow. There could be no better counselior than He, and He especially invites the sorrowing to put their case in His hands. Jesus is a living helper; you must not think of Him as a being who merely left a system of philosophy for study. He lives and can hear us when we seek His help. Will you not ask it?"

"I never sought His help," said Mrs. Lefevre, "when I was happy and gay, I am ashamed to ask it now."

"You might be that naturally, indeed, I suspect there is more or less of that feeling with us all; but it does not excuse further neglect. When we have been negligent in our duty, it does not atone for the negligence, to continue it. With an earthly friend you would not do that, though you might be reproached with the fact by an earthly friend. There is no ground to fear reproach from Him. Read His invitations and see how cordial and how free of conditions they are. There is one to the weary and heavy laden you are surely qualified to accept. Think of it, my dear lady, and ask Him to give you the rest He offers."

"I will," said the stricken widow, through her tears, and shaking hands with Mr. Cleveland, she once more sought her room. There she opened the Testament, and with her head bowed over its pages prayed as she had never prayed before, that her eyes might be opened to see the spiritual truths it contained.

For the space of an hour she read; by-and-by her reading was accompanied by earnest aspirations for the light and life and love of heaven. These came to her as, where there are open hearts and willing, they come to all; and Margaret Lefevre found that the truest wealth is to be found in the riches and grace of God; and that the highest and best position is ocupied by those who lie low at the Cross, and enter the ranks of the children of adoption, crying with love-filled hearts, "Abba, Father!"

It will be no matter of surprise to the reader that sentiments of true affection and esteem became stronger and stronger in her mind for their true friend and benefactor, the humble curate; and it need be no matter of surprise, seeing how fair and beautiful she was—a beauty to which sorrow and the new light from heaven had lent an added lustre—that Noel Cleveland felt marvellously drawn to the young widow, whom he had known in the two extremes of wealth and poverty, and had found her attractive in the former, and lovely in the latter.

Michael Musgrave gradually declined, and at length peacefully expired. The last word he heard spoken by his daughter's lips was "Jesus." That name brought a smile upon his face—a smile that lived, even after the soul had left its clay. Mrs. Musgrave gradually regained her customary health and spirits. The wreck of fortune, chiefly through the kindness of the creditors, left her with a competency. She took up her abode in a small villa on the outskirts of Carchester, and found her chief delight in doing good work for the Master among the afflicted and the poor.

Noel Cleveland, by his godly zeal and fervent spirit, and marked ability as a Christian pastor, won golden opinions from the citizens of Carchester, especially of that portion of them who resided in the parish in which the Abbey Church was situated. He made bold to ask the hand of Margaret Lefevre, and as he had already full possession of her heart it may well be understood that his request was not denied. Some twelve months after, the Rev. Abel Forsyth was gathered to his fathers. The living was in the gift of the Queen; and, in answer to a widely-signed petition to that effect, the Rev. Noel Cleveland was appointed his successor. The marriage took place almost immediately afterward, and the young vicar and his wife entered on a career of usefulness, peace, and prosperity, which brought abundant compensation for "Margaret Musgrave's Misfortunes."

THE HEALING POWER.

S. S. Lesson for January 28, Acts 3 : 11. Golden Text, Ex. 15 : 26, By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Statute and Ordinance—People who Experiment with Faith Healing — The Lame Beggar — An Unexpected Answer — Not an Experiment—Utilizing the Faith of Others—No Result from Second-Hand Faith—Ingenious Explanations of Faith Healing—Cases Referred to Hysteria—The Idea that Sickness Glorifies God—Jehovah Rophi—A Sign of the Lord's Approach.

OUR golden text for to-day proclaims that the Lord is our Healer, and this title applies to Him as much now as in Old Testament times. It teaches us also that healing is His statute and ordinance. "There He made for them and there He proved them, and said, If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, and wilt do that which is right in His sight, and wilt give ear to His commandments, and keep all His statutes, I will put none of these diseases upon thee, which I have brought upon the Egyptians: for I am the Lord that healeth thee," (or I am the Lord thy Healer). The unbelief which causes men to say that healing was only for the time of our Lord and His immediate successors, has no warrant in the Word of God; and in every age, when spiritual life has risen to its true level, holiness of life and healing have been found together as an invariable result. The world scoffs at the faith which believes in a God who answers prayer, and denies the reality of it when it applies to the soul: but when the incurable are healed, the lame walk, the blind see, the deaf hear, then the world is obliged to know that a power beyond that of man is at work. Who shall affirm that scepticism and infidelity exist so little that God has now no need for works of healing to convict these unbelievers? Oh, how men shrink from anything which will bring them into such close quarters with God that they cannot draw back. Oh, how men who need healing will seek it first through every human device and then through the prayers of believing people making them another kind of experiment, rather than themselves appealing to God, and putting their case, in absolute trust into His hands! Oh, how many hide themselves under that device of the enemy, "If it be His will," in spite of His clear declarations (Matt. 8 : 16, 17; James 5 : 14), and so back out of a real step of faith, choosing rather to suffer any tortures, to be ever so useless in life, rather than take the bold step of faith and consecration, which would bring them under the statute and ordinance of the Lord's healing! We are not speaking now of suffering children of God, whom the Spirit of God has not yet enlightened about His will and power to heal, but such as shrink knowingly from the close walk with God which His healing entails, and who therefore remain unblest.

A STATUTE AND AND AN ORDINANCE

Our subject for to-day shows us Peter and John in the freshness of the unction which had come upon them. They "went up together into the temple at the hour of prayer, being the ninth hour;" although themselves temples of the Holy Ghost, they were not exempt from the duty of public worship. A daily occurrence took place; a certain beggar, "lame from his mother's womb was carried, whom they laid daily at the gate of the temple which is called Beautiful, to ask alms of them that entered into the temple." The poor man had no other means of subsistence than the degrading one of begging, he must either beg or die, and so he made capital of his infirmity, and traded upon his impotence to walk, by exciting the compassion of the passers-by. Among others he begged of Peter and John, but he met with

AN UNLOOKED-FOR ANSWER;

"Peter, fastening his eyes upon him, with John, said, Look on us. And he gave heed unto them, expecting to receive something of them." But his expectations were far below the glorious reality. "Then Peter said, Silver and gold have I none; but such as I have give I thee: In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk."

But the man never had walked; how could Peter expect him, an ignorant man, to act faith, when all the experience of the past went to prove that every attempt to stand or walk had been utter failure? when he had never, during his whole life, borne his own weight? Peter looked not at the man, but at the man's Creator, and he knew that the power of God was both present with him, and equal to the case in hand. But he helped the man, "he took him by the right hand, and lifted him up." Was not this rather

A DANGEROUS EXPERIMENT?

Reader, would you attempt it with any lame one in your neighborhood? With Peter this was no experiment; he had received the commission to heal the sick as well as to preach the Gospel; and he had heard the risen Jesus declare that those who believed should in His name lay hands on the sick, and they should recover. In that name of Jesus, in His authority, he had commanded the man to rise, and he knew that he could count upon his Lord. What happened? The moment the man acted faith, by allowing Peter to lift him up, the Lord met him; "immediately his feet and ankle-bones received strength, and he leaping up, stood, and walked, and entered with them into the temple, walking, and leaping, and praising God."

There are many sick ones in soul, or body, or both, who want to utilize the faith of others for their salvation, cleansing or healing, without themselves exercising faith. Oh, that they would see that every real blessing comes from personal contact with God. The man sick of the palsy who was brought by his friends to Jesus, must, nevertheless, himself act faith, and himself arise and walk at the word of Jesus (Matt. 9 : 6, 7). The man at the pool of Bethesda who was waiting for some one to put him into the pool, must stir up his stagnant faith, arise and take up his bed (John 5 : 8, 9). So with the man which had the withered hand (Luke 6 : 6–10), so with the many who touched the hem of Christ's garment (Matt. 14 : 35, 36); others may have brought them near, but the final transaction was between themselves and Jesus. Just as with conversion, just as with cleansing, so is it with healing, nothing can be done second hand. In the Old Testament, the conditions of healing are always the hearkening to, and obeying God (Ex. 15 : 26; 23 : 20–25; Deut. 7 : 12–15). In the New Testament the conditions seem to be the same as for all spiritual blessings, the yielding of ourselves, and the receiving of Christ (Rom. 8 : 11; James 5 : 14–16); the quickening of our mortal bodies depends on the Spirit of Christ dwelling in us, the calling for the elders and confessing our faults one to another implies a yielding of ourselves more entirely up to God.

The man who had been healed could not restrain himself; the first movement of his released feet had been to leap upward, he had not waited first to try how far they would bear his weight; no wonder he praised God. "And all the people saw him walking and praising God; and they knew that it was he which sat for alms at the Beautiful gate of the temple; and they were filled with wonder and amazement at that which had happened unto him;" this was a thing which no one could mistake. It frequently happens that in those healed at Bethshan, through Miss Green, or alone with God in prayer, cases which physicians have pronounced to be tumors, cancers, etc., which must be at once removed with the knife, are suddenly found out to have been only of disease when they are healed by the Lord. We would like to ask those physicians who say so, if they can explain why then were they not healed when under their care? Internal diseases, when healed by the Lord, bring forth precious praise from the former sufferer; but when a man lame from his mother's womb, whose deformity was known by all the usual frequenters of the temple—when the man was healed, none could deny it.

It is marvellous with what ingenuity many explain away healing by the power of God. Blessed be His name it does not rob the healed ones of the blessed nearness to Him which His healing touch involves, it does not rob them of youth renewed like the eagle's; it does not take away the precious consciousness of possessing a body on which the hand of God has so immediately come or the holy awe which such sensible contact with God produces. But it does manifest in those who thus doubt Him a grievous lack of acquaintance with God, it reveals too often a life in which His intervention in answer to prayer is the exception and not the constant, blessed experience. Those who are in the habit of close dealing with God about all things temporal and spiritual, who have learned to walk upon the water, and find solid ground in the promises of God, where other feet would sink—these take healing by faith with a kind of intuition, it is only applying the principle of their whole life to their bodies as well as to their souls and their outward circumstances; and they come to wonder how they could have been so foolish as to make their bodies an exception to the law of faith which rules their whole life.

It is a current idea that sickness glorifies God more than health does. Did the lame man give more honor to God when he sat in his misery and begged, his only thought being how to screw out of the passers-by an unwilling alms? Or when fresh from the healing hand of God, his heart ran over with praise, and he told every one the great things which God had done for him? Surely the latter. "But," you will say, "many are converted on a sick bed." Thank God they are, and no doubt God permitted them to lie there in order that He might gain their attention, and speak, and make Himself known to them, but having done so, He only waits to be inquired of, that He may remove the sickness (see Job 33 : 14–28). If sickness glorifies God more than healing, why is He named Jehovah the Healer? If sickness is so honoring to God, how comes it that in every instance when commanding His disciples, the Lord Jesus directed them to heal the sick? How comes it that the only direction to the sick in the whole Word of God, is that they should call for the elders and seek for healing? How comes it that Jesus "healed all that were sick which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying, "Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses?" (Matt. 8 : 16, 17.) Surely had sickness been a greater blessing than healing, the Lord Jesus would have left us to bear it, and not have borne it Himself as He bore our sins.

It is true, sadly true, that the Church as a whole, has lost sight of Jehovah Rophi (the Lord that healeth thee) but the last days of the dispensation are upon us, men are waking up to see that Holy Ghost power still remains among us, that holiness of life is not only a possibility, but that "without holiness no man can see the Lord, that God is moving among us as in times of old; and amid much which is unreal and grievous, there is a people which is being prepared for the Lord, and the revival of healing is but one of the signs of the Lord's approach. Many are talking about it, criticising, doubting, but the witnesses are multiplying every day, and wherever they are, there comes new spiritual life. Go on O Lord "grant unto Thy servants, that with all boldness they may speak Thy Word, by stretching out Thy hand to heal; and that signs and wonders may be done by the name of Thy holy child Jesus." Amen.

The European Inundations have not Materially subsided during the past week. Cable reports from Pesth dated January 13th, describe the situation in South Hungary as very alarming. The town of Neusatz, on the Danube, is submerged. Somboz, on the Francis Canal, and Semlin and Pauscova, on the Danube, are in imminent danger, as are also a number of villages. A distressing scene was witnessed at Raab, a town situated at the junction of the Raab and the Danube, in Hungary, on January 9th; Raab and the adjacent villages, had been saved from inundation until then by the frost. When the thaw commenced the water suddenly rose all over the district. At three o'clock on Tuesday morning the inhabitants were aroused by alarm bells and commenced a rapid flight. Meanwhile around Raab the dikes, breaking at length admitted the deluge, which soon reached the inner town, containing 6000 fugitives as well as the ordinary inhabitants. A considerable number of lives were lost, but happily the flood did not reach some of the higher parts of the town and ceased to rise at noon. The inhabitants, however, finally abandoned the town. The floods rose so rapidly that many persons, in trying to escape, fell through the ice and were drowned. The roofs of some of the houses in Raab had to be taken down to enable the soldiers to rescue the inmates. The Emperor of Germany has increased his contribution for the relief of his own suffering subjects to $138,000. A subscription in aid of the sufferers has been commenced in New York and $6000 have already been forwarded by cable for distribution among the homeless fugitives.

The Illness of Mr. Gladstone is Reported by cable. The accounts published do not describe his malady as serious, but certain symptoms which would not be alarming in a younger man or one of a different temperament, occasion concern in the case of Mr. Gladstone. It appears that he indulged soon after Parliament was prorogued in his favorite recreation of cutting down a tree. He caught a severe cold which has prostrated him, and has been followed by sleeplessness. This symptom is regarded as serious, the Premier having hitherto relied for recuperation under the strain of his herculean labors on his power of commanding sleep at will. He has been ordered complete rest and a change to a southern climate. Cannes in France is the retreat selected. If Mr. Gladstone can be induced to follow the advice of his physicians, his recovery is probable; but it is stated that he has hitherto proved an intractable patient and is likely to insist on being in his place in Parliament next month if he is able to move. His friends, both personal and political, are represented as suffering anxiety on his account. The dissensions in the Liberal party, which are kept down by his commanding genius, would probably cause its disruption if Mr. Gladstone were removed.

The Intelligence that the City of Brussels, the well-known steamer of the Inman Line, plying between New York and Liverpool had been run down in a fog, caused some excitement on January 8th. Later reports, however, relieved the anxiety experienced by the public. It was speedily made known that the only passengers who lost their lives were two Italians in the steerage, and that of the crew all but eight were saved. Happily at this time of the year the passenger list in all trans-Atlantic steamers is usually at its lowest point, or an appalling loss of life might have ensued. It appears that the City of Brussels, which left New York on December 28th, landed her mails at Queenstown and proceeded to Liverpool. A dense fog lay upon the Channel and the engines were stopped. Captain Land, who commanded the City of Brussels, states that after the steamer had been stopped for forty-one minutes whistles were heard on the starboard and port sides. He concluded that the steamers would pass in parallel lines. Suddenly a white light appeared on the starboard bow, and a minute and a half afterward the vessel ran into the City of Brussels. He immediately ordered the boats to be lowered and a spare sail placed over the hole, but before the latter order could be carried out the carpenter reported that there was fourteen feet of water in the forehold, and the engineers stated that the fires would be out in about a minute. The passengers then took to boats, and, the crew, without orders, filled other boats. When the ship sank as far as the bridge Captain Land called out for every one to save himself, and jumped into the water. He and others floated upon a spar until rescued. The Kirby Hall, the Glasgow steamer that collided with the Inman boat picked up the boats containing the passengers, who were not even wetted in the accident, and conveyed them safely to Liverpool. They lost all their luggage, however, and many of them had not time even to save clothes to wear as the majority of the passengers were asleep in their berths when the collision took place.

The Joint Control of Egyptian Finances by representatives of England and France has been formally abolished. The British Commissioner acting under the advice of Lord Dufferin, who is still engaged in regulating the Khédive's affairs, resigned his office and the Khédive then notified France of the collapse of the control. A scheme for the future government of Egypt has been formulated by Lord Dufferin, and has been submitted to the Sultan of Turkey. After his views have been ascertained it is intended to lay it before a conference of delegates of the great European Powers. The French press contains bitter attacks on England for ignoring her former ally in the negotiations, and French self-esteem appears to have been wounded by the power acquired through the achievements of the British army, in which France is not invited to participate. It is understood that Prince Bismarck will advocate the acceptance of the British scheme.

The Dublin Police Arrested on Saturday last a number of men who are alleged to have been plotting the assasination of prominent English officials. Twenty prisoners were seized, and the police continued their quest for others on Sunday. Two of the arrested men promptly turned informers against their colleagues. One of the prisoners is an alderman of the city of Dublin; the others are chiefly from the artisan class. Among them are the two men who occupy the house behind which the long knives were found that it is supposed were used in the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke. All the prisoners were found with arms in their possession, and the police assert that they are members of a secret society sworn to assassinate the chiefs of the Dublin police force.

A Statue of the Prince Imperial of France, who was killed in the war with the Zulus, was unveiled at Woolwich, England, on Saturday by the Prince of Wales. The cost of the statue, which amounted to $21,000, was defrayed by a subscription among the officers and men of the British Army. In unveiling the statue the Prince of Wales was accompanied by his two sons and by his brother, the Duke of Edinburgh, and his mother's cousin, the Duke of Cambridge. General Lord Wolseley, Prince Lucien Bonaparte, the Duc de Bassano, and a large and distinguished company assisted at the unveiling of the monument. In his remarks the Prince of Wales said: "It is obvious that this short ceremony is not a political one in any sense of the word. We are inaugurating a monument to the memory of a young and gallant prince, who fell fighting for the Queen of England." The prince gave a brief sketch of the career of the Prince Imperial to the time of his death, in which he eulogized his personal qualities.

Mr. Bradlaugh, the Atheist, Elected Member of the British Parliament has again been defeated in endeavoring to secure legal redress of his grievance. He brought a suit for damages against the official of the House of Commons who ejected him from the House. Mr. Justice Field, who tried the case, gave judgment against Mr. Bradlaugh on the ground that the officer simply obeyed a resolution of the House which had the right to control its own proceedings.

The Use of the Bible in the Common Schools has long been urgently advocated by the Christian public of Canada. Concerted action has recently been taken in the form of a petition to the Dominion Government, which has been extensively signed. The prayer of the signatories is: "That the Bible be used not as a reading book, but devotionally, in connection with the prescribed prayer, at the opening of the school each morning, and that both teachers and pupils read together the selection prescribed for each particular school day throughout the year. We do not ask that the Bible be used as a text-book in the public schools. We do not ask that the teachers be required to give expositions or explanations of the meaning of passages of Scripture."

A Cry from Italian Atheists has Arisen from all parts of Italy. Applications are being made for evangelists to Signor Matteo Trochet, President of the Waldensian Committee. Only a few weeks back he received a petition from Capua signed by twenty-five persons, another from Giarre, in Sicily, signed by seventy persons, begging to have a minister. An evangelist, writing from Sicily on the 20th of November, gives the interesting news that at Terranova the principal proprietor, Signor Calandra, himself offered to find a building suitable for public worship, and, in the event of not succeeding, promised the use of his own house. A friend of his, a young lawyer, said, "We are atheists; but we know you and the history of the sad and terrible persecutions you have undergone. Come and show us a God and a religion that will make us better men, and we will be grateful indeed." These are only a few facts gathered out of hundreds, but they will serve to show how the Italians are waking up to a knowledge of the truth, and how the good seed which Christian devotedness has sown with tears, is at length beginning to take root.

A Learned Hindoo Lady Named Pundita Romabai, has recently created much interest in Bombay by the delivery of a course of Lectures on Female Education in India. She is a widow, twenty-five years of age; she is noted for her knowledge of Sanscrit, and for her emancipation from superstition. The attendance at her lectures was large. Hindoo and Parsee ladies crowded to hear her. And these were profoundly impressed. No such sight was ever seen in India before. Pundita Romabai showed in her lecture that the education of men is advancing in India, and that in order to domestic fellowship and happiness there must by a corresponding progress in the education of women. Considerable enthusiasm has been produced by this sudden outburst of feminine conviction and eloquence. This is certainly a sign of the times, and bears not only on the political and educational interests of India, but most powerfully also on the progress of Christianity in that vast country.

Minnie, an Actress in one of the London theatres, quite a child, was led through the agency of a mission-room in Covent Garden, to accept Christ as her Saviour. Soon afterward, an old woman, dresser at the theatre, called at the mission-room and told how Minnie had changed the whole inner life behind the scenes. "How's that?" was asked. "She brought her Bible, and read to us all every day, and instead of filthy talk and profane words we have now quietness and decency." So much for the influence of a little one in the green room. She cannot leave the theatre, her father forbids her doing so, but she says, "I can shine for Jesus there," and she does so.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE present crisis in the missionary campaign in the Island of Madagascar has attracted increased attention to that interesting field of missionary operations. For more than half a century the island has been an object of concern to the Christian world, but it has been on other grounds than those now existing. Heretofore, the anxiety about the country has arisen out of the strange vicissitudes in the relations existing between the missionaries and the monarch of Madagascar. The new trouble is an outside affair.

A claim has been set up by the French Government to certain territory on the north-west coast, and an effort has been made to establish a French protectorate or tutelage over the whole island. The government of the island, which is independent, view this project with alarm. Their civil and religious liberty they believe would be imperilled by its realization. That these fears are not groundless will be admitted by all who have watched the course of affairs in Tunis, Tahiti, the Gambier Islands, and other places. The Malagasy Government sent Commissioners to France to protest against the disguised annexation. They were met by a refusal on the part of M. Grévy to receive them, unless they yielded, as a preliminary, the right of France to the land claimed. The commissioners were not empowered to make the concession. Being unaccustomed to the ways of European diplomacy, they did not know how to proceed. Their present stage of civilization they owe to the labors of missionaries, the majority of whom have been of British nationality. They therefore applied for counsel and aid to the Missionary Society in London. The society has used such influence as it has with the English Government to secure its mediation with the French Government on behalf of the Malagasy envoys. There is, however, a radical difference in the points of view taken respectively by the Missionary Society and the Government. The Missionary Society is anxious for English intervention, because French supremacy would issue in the advancement of the Jesuit missionaries, and the practical exclusion of the Protestant missionaries from the Island. But the English Government is averse to interference in a matter in which national interests are not involved. Thus the question remains pending.

Madagascar is by no means an unimportant island. It is 980 miles long and 360 miles wide, and its area is as large as the aggregate area of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Connecticut and Massachusetts. It is situated off the south-east coast of Africa, and its magnificent forests and luxurious vegetation render it one of the most beautiful countries on earth. The population is about 2,500,000. It is composed of three tribes; the Betsima-Sarakas, the Sakalavas and the Hovas. They all speak the same language, the Malagash, which is very similar to that of the Malays.

ITS ORIGINAL RELIGION.

The original religion of Madagascar was singularly vague and obscure. The people professed to believe in a God, but could not explain what they meant by the term. They sometimes prayed, but seemed not to know to whom their prayers were addressed, whether to the sun or the wind or the spirit of some departed sovereign. They had some ugly wooden idols, but they could give no intelligible account of the beings whom these idols were intended to represent. The idols numbered fifteen, and priests or keepers for them were appointed and maintained by the government. To cure diseases, to drive away pestilence, and to give fertility to the ground—these were but a few of the attributed functions of the idols of Madagascar. The idols were only called upon when need arose, and then the people did not go to the idol, but the idol was brought to them.

THE ROYAL DYNASTY.

At the beginning of the present century, Madagascar was ruled by a number of independent chiefs, but at the same period the present dynasty began to present itself as the claimant of supreme sovereignty over all the island. The representative of the family at that time was one Radama, who assumed the title of Radama I., on obtaining the ascendency, and he was sometimes called "the Prince of Imerina," sometimes "King of the Hovas." The Hovas, being the people of Ankova or Imerina, the chief province of the island. In this province is the present capital, Antananarivo.

Radama I. on his accession to chieftainship, in 1808, showed himself a ruler of energy, penetration, and vast ambition. A few years afterward, a British agent, Captain Le Sage, visited the island from Mauritius, and succeeded in reaching the capital, and gaining an audience of Radama, who was so impressed with Captain Le Sage's abilities that he decided on sending to Mauritius two of his younger brothers, Ratafia and Rahovy, in order that they might receive a European education. In July 1817, Mr. Hastie, who had been appointed by the Governor of Mauritius to take charge of the youths, returned with them to Tamatave, where he and they were received by Radama himself, who had gone down to the coast with about 30,000 of his people.

Mr. Hastie was appointed British Resident at the court of King Radama; and his instructions from the English Government were to use his influence over the king to effect the abolition of the exportation of slaves. About the same time another Englishman from Mauritius, Mr. Brady, a non-commissioned officer, took up his residence at Radama's court, in order, at the king's desire, to instruct his troops in the tactics and discipline of a European army. Making good use of Mr. Brady's instruction, the king formed, in a few years, a disciplined army of 15,000 men, armed in the European manner, and provided with artillery, before which no tribe or chief in the whole island could raise any effective opposition.

On October 11th, 1820, the king was induced to sign a treaty agreeing to put a stop to the export of slaves.

A GREAT KABARY

(or assembly) was convened, the proclamation was made, and the British flag and that of Madagascar, hoisted side by side, gave token that slavery was abolished from the island. At this time also Radama insisted that ten Malagasy youths should be taken to Mauritius, and ten others to England, to be instructed in European arts. One of his own relatives, Rataffe, who had married his sister, had already departed for England, to learn, by personal inspection, something of a country whose influence was becoming so powerful in the island; and this prince succeeded in obtaining an interview with the British king, and in becoming personally known to the directors of the London Missionary Society.

THE FIRST MISSIONARIES TO THE ISLAND.

In August 1817, three years before the period just referred to, Mr. S. Bevan and Mr. David Jones were set apart to commence mission work in Madagascar. They arrived at Mauritius in the following July, but owing to a temporary misunderstanding which had arisen between General Hall, the Governor of Mauritius, and Radama, the moment of their arrival was an unpropitious one. They were dissuaded from proceeding to Madagascar as missionaries, so leaving their families in Mauritius, they paid a visit, as private persons, to Tamatave, the port of Madagascar, for the purpose of making personal inquiries.

These devoted men reached Tamatave on August 18th, 1818, and remained there nearly two months, gaining much insight into the state of affairs, and learning the rudiments of the language. Returning to Mauritius in October, they wished to remove with their families to Madagascar, but Mr. Bevan was obliged to remain in Mauritius, for a time, on account of the illness of his wife. Mr. and Mrs. Jones landed at Tamatave on October 19th, and immediately began the erection of a school-house. But fever soon seized upon both of them, and on December 28th, Mrs. Jones died. Her infant daughter had died about a fortnight before. Mr. Jones himself remained very ill; and when in the second week in January 1819, Mr. and Mrs. Bevan arrived from Mauritius, the first intelligence they heard was that Mrs. Jones and her child were both dead, and that Mr. Jones was dying.

A SINGULAR PREDICTION VERIFIED.

Mr. Bevan was stunned by the news, and at once expressed his conviction that he should take the fever also, and should die. Nevertheless, he began to prepare for his work. In a few days, however, both he and his wife and child were prostrated by fever, and the child soon died. Mr. Jones was now sufficiently recovered to see his colleague, who unhesitatingly told him, "I shall die, but you will recover and go on with your work, and will ultimately succeed in the mission." His presentiments were soon fulfilled. On the morning of January 31st, Mr. Bevan finished his earthly career, and on February 3d his wife followed him into the heavenly rest. Out of the six individuals who had landed at Tamatave a few weeks before, Mr. Jones was now the only survivor, and he was in greatly shattered health, but regarded himself as irrevocably devoted to Madagascar.

INTERVIEW WITH THE KING.

About three days after the great Kabary, referred to as having taken place in October 1820, the king received Mr. Jones with great cordiality, and promised him his royal support. Mr. Jones then inquired if the wives and families of missionaries might also come, and be assured of protection; to which the king replied by the most satisfactory assurances. Preparations accordingly were made, and on December 8th, 1820, the work of the mission may be said to have commenced in the capital of Madagascar. On that day Mr. Jones opened a school with three children, a number which soon increased. A house being required, the king himself performed the ceremony of laying the foundation stone, to the great astonishment of all the people. Other missionaries, the Rev. D. and Mrs. Griffiths, soon arrived, together with two other Europeans, Mr. Barnsley and Mr. Carvaille, artisans, and toward the end of 1821 the mission might be said to have been fully established.

The missionaries were almost overwhelmed with proofs of the royal favor. The king himself attended the inspection of the schools. He received, with much pleasure, specimens of the needlework done by Mrs Griffiths' pupils, and rewarded the children. So earnest were both the king and his subjects about the instruction of their children, that when, at Christmas, the missionaries gave the young people a few days' holiday, an assembly was held, to complain to the king of the cessation of the teaching, and Radama wrote to the missionaries to know why the children were not taught as usual.

PRINCE RATAFFE AT A MISSIONARY MEETING.

It was in May 1821, that Prince Rataffe, brother-in-law of the king, attended the annual meeting of the London Missionary Society, in London. He tendered to the society a letter from King Radama, which said, "Mr. Jones, your missionary, having satisfied me that those sent out by your society have no other object than to enlighten the people by persuasion and conviction, and to discover to them the means of becoming happy, therefore, gentlemen, I request you to send me as many missionaries as you may deem proper, together with their families, if you desire it, provided you also send skilful artisans to make my people workmen as well as good Christians; and I promise all the protection, safety, and respect which the missionaries may require.

"Saith RADAMA MANJAKA."

In hearty response to this request, the directors sent back with Prince Rataffe the Rev. J. Jeffreys and his wife, and Messrs. Brooks, Chick, Canham, and Rowlands, artisans, who reached Madagascar in May 1822, and were received by the king with many demonstrations of gratification and delight.

PREACHING TO THE NATIVES.

It was not until February 1824, that the missionaries began to preach the Gospel to the people in their native tongue. In June, the following year, Mr. Jeffreys died. His progress in the language had been so rapid that even the people themselves were astonished. The following is an extract from his journal, and the scene is illustrated in the frontispiece picture. "Left home after the morning service to visit a village about five miles distant; but I met a number of men who were going into the forest for wood for the king. It struck my mind that an opportunity presented itself, and I asked if they could stay a short time to hear me speak of God. They assented, and I accordingly spoke to them of Christ and His salvation, and of His willingness to save all who come to Him. They listened with attention and apparent interest. Thus nearly one hundred human beings heard the Gospel—may it prove to be good seed cast into good ground!"

DEATH OF KING RADAMA I.

Everywhere there was apparent prosperity; congregations of 2000 and 3000 hearers regularly listened to the story of salvation; and schools were being successfully conducted in every part of the land. There was abundant cause, however, for disquietude. The mission rested apparently on the favor of the king, and, as he had given no tokens of real conversion of heart, there could be no solid trust reposed on his protection. In fact, secular and not religious knowledge was the chief object of his desires. Radama, however, fell a victim to habits of self-indulgence, and his death took place on July 27th, 1828.

The reins of government were instantly seized by a woman named Ranavalona. The rightful heir was at a distance from the capital, and the king's death was kept profoundly secret for two or three days, during which time Ranavalona, one of Radama's queens, was actively engaged in obtaining adherents among the chief generals and officers of state. By August 1st, her plans were matured. The firing of cannon summoned the people to the courtyard of the palace, and it was announced to them that the idols had declared Queen Ranavalona to be successor to the deceased king.

QUEEN RANAVALONA.

Four chief officers, who were not in the conspiracy, at once objected that it was well known that the late king had named Prince Rakotobe his successor. They had scarcely spoken when a dozen spears were plunged into their bodies by the conspirators who stood around, and they instantly perished. Silence followed. No other person dared to whisper an objection, and the accession of Queen Ranavalona was proclaimed as an accomplished fact. (The assassination of the four officers is shown in our frontispiece, at the right-hand side of the portrait.)

A MARTYR PRINCE.

The rightful heir, however, still lived, as well as his father and mother. Prince Rakotobe, who had been one of the first scholars placed under Mr. Jones's care, was residing in one of the villages near the capital. A party of soliders was sent to seize him, and to carry him to another village at a greater distance. He understood his peril, and begged them to allow him a short time to pray. They granted his request, and meantime dug his grave. He was then speared, and at once laid beneath the earth. There was reason to hope that the instruction he had received had been blessed of God in leading him to Christ; and that he was the first Malagese who died a Christian.

The next three or four years was a time of much peril to the existence of the mission, but gleams of hope occasionally flashed forth to relieve the surrounding gloom. In May and June 1831, twenty-eight persons were baptized in the suburban chapel at Ambatonakanga. One of these had been, like Simon, a sorcerer, an idol-priest, a deluder of the people! He had taken his place among the children in the school, had learned to read the New Testament for himself, and had been thus "made wise unto salvation." He chose the name of Paul, and, with his wife, who was baptized at the same time, he continued to walk in the ordinances and commandments of the Lord." But as the year 1832 advanced, the hostility of the government—real though not avowed—became more visible and perceptible.

APPEAL FOR THE NEW TESTAMENT.

The circulation of the Scriptures and of other religious books now began to tell. The native Christians, armed with these, and with copies of the Gospel, went everywhere spreading the knowledge of the truth. The missionaries wrote home: "Many of the people, both in the capital and in the provinces, are beginning to read, and this creates a great demand for books. A few days ago we were much struck by two young persons, who came to us with a slate in their hands, on which one of them, a respectable young female from the country, had written—'I have long lived in darkness, and am now most desirous of being brought into the light, that I may know about God and His Son Jesus Christ. Oh, pity me! have compassion on me! give me a copy of the New Testament. I am greatly in need of it; be merciful to me, and grant, if you possibly can, my request.'" (A picture of this visit is shown in the lower section of the frontispiece.)

A REIGN OF TERROR.

On March 1st, 1835, the long-dreaded blow fell, and by royal edict all missionary operations were arrested, and the Queen Ranavalona began the attempt to stamp out Christianity, a struggle which was destined to end, as such struggles always have, in the confusion of the persecutors and the triumph of the Gospel. Multitudes of the people gave way to the pressure brought to bear upon them, and returned to heathenism, many of them to its vilest practices; but the missionaries remained in the island translating the Word of God, and the most faithful of the natives began to hold secret meetings, often on some solitary mountain, whence they could discern the approach of any stranger from a considerable distance. Here they could freely sing the praises of their God and Saviour without any danger of being overheard.

MARTYRS FOR CHRIST.

Among those who continued to meet for the worship of God, despite the prohibition of the queen, was a young man and his wife. The former suffered martyrdom by decapitation rather than deny Christ; the latter set out at midnight to flee to a place of safety. The following morning officers were in pursuit, with orders to put her at once to death. She and other fugitives were compelled to pursue their wanderings, being literally in the situation described by the apostle: "They wandered in deserts and caves of the earth." Often drenched with rain, and sometimes sinking in the bogs, generally pinched by famine, and always in dread of their pursuers, it was not until many weeks had elapsed that they reached Tamatave, whither Mr. Johns, one of the missionaries, had arrived from Mauritius to aid them in their escape.

Mr. Johns had arranged with a captain, and in the dark hours of evening a canoe took them from the shores of Madagascar, and placed them on the deck of an English ship, which sailed for Mauritius at daybreak in the morning. As the sails spread themselves to the breeze, the captain said to them in Madagese, "Efa Kabary," a common phrase, meaning, "That business—that trouble—is over: all is safe!" They burst into tears, and asked if they might sing a hymn of praise to their Heavenly Preserver: "Our souls are escaped like a bird from the snare of the fowler." (A panel of our frontispiece illustrates this episode.)

DEATH OF THE CRUEL QUEEN.

From this time onward, until 1857, the persecution was untiring; but though the slaughter had been wholesale, the faith of the Christians was stronger, and their love of the Saviour not less than when the first martyrs died for the name of the Lord Jesus. But far more remarkable is the fact that during all these years of oppression and suffering, the number and the influence of the Christians had continued steadily to increase. On July 16th, 1857, the queen died, the persecution of Christians ended, and her son was proclaimed her successor by the title of KING RADAMA II.

One of the first proclamations of Radama II. (whose portrait appears on our front page) gave to every man his liberty to follow such religious worship as he judged best, and every man was declared free to teach or preach his own religion. Exiles and Christians in fetters were recalled and liberated; the claims of the idols were disregarded; the use of the tangena (drinking poisoned water by way of ordeal) and sorcery were abolished; and in May 1862, the Rev. W. Ellis arrived in Madagascar, and memorial churches were built where martyrs had died.

Radama allied himself with the French traders, and showed considerable favor to a certain M. Lambert, who was a French merchant and who held under his government a species of consular appointment. The king made him a grant of land and otherwise showed him marked favor. So high a place did M. Lambert attain at the king's court that the jealousy of the natives was excited, and a conspiracy was organized. It succeeded, and King Radama II. was strangled. This occurred in 1863. The widow of the dead king was proclaimed his successor under the title of Queen Rasohérina.

THE REIGNING MONARCH.

The present monarch is Queen Ranavalona II., who succeeded to the throne, at the death of her sister Rasohérina, on April 1st, 1868, and the opening of her reign was characterized by the most emphatic refusal to acknowledge idolatry in any shape or form.

The great national inaugural ceremony, equivalent to coronation in other countries, but here called the showing or presenting of the sovereign, took place on September 3d, 1868. The queen, with a hundred ladies of rank, ascended a richly-decorated platform, and appeared before her people. She was enthusiastically cheered. Then, surrounded by the high officers of her kingdom, she took her seat beneath the canopy, on the front of which were inscribed in shining letters the Malagasy words signifying, "Glory be to God;" on the other sides, "Goodwill among men," "On earth peace," and "God shall be with us." On one hand of her majesty stood a small table with the crown, on the other a small table bearing a handsome Bible, sent to her predecessor by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

BURNING OF THE IDOLS.

On February 21st, 1869, the queen was publicly baptized together with her Prime Minister, whom she has married. But the great event of this year was the burning of the national idols by order of the queen. The inhabitants of the surrounding districts forthwith committed their own idols and charms to the flames, in which, according to the native expression, they passed away in smoke. So effectual and general was the action of the people that, within a month after the first idol had been burned, a small heap of ashes, lying in the open space situated in the centre of most of the villages, was all that remained of the once-dreaded objects of the people's worship. The conflict was long and sanguinary before Christianity gained the citadel of the nation's idolatry, but the victory was complete. The Word of Truth has triumphed, and Madagascar is free, and using her freedom to convey to others the knowledge of the liberty she has gained.

A Lonely Nursery Governess Received a Remarkable answer to prayer some time ago. Captain Trotter, whose work for Christ is well known, purchased some books lately from Mr. Nisbet, the well-known London publisher, and was about to write his address, when Mr. Nisbet told him he knew it well, adding, "I have prayed for you ever since you were as high as my table. You and your sister had a young nursery governess, who felt sadly alone in this great metropolis. She was a child of God, and came to tell me of her concern for the souls of her little pupils. She was cast down by the charge. I felt for her, comforted her, and she was strengthened; and every Saturday she came to my house, and together we prayed for your salvation and that of your sister, and I have lived to see the fruit which we desired."

SONS OF A GORILLA OR SONS OF GOD.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, January 21, 1883.

"Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things."—ROM. I : 22, 23.

A Full-length Portrait of Evolutionists—The Ancestral Line—A Missing Link Conceded—A Whole Chain Gone—Difficulties the Evolutionists Do not Explain—Development of a Bird's Wing—A Different Creation—Rapidity of Development—Evolution an Hypothesis—Testimony of Inward Consciousness—A Bankrupt Monkey—Evolution the Mother of Mysteries—The Origin of the Horse—A Convention of Animals—The Counsel of the Lion—Prorogation of the Convention—Evolution Brutalizing—Annihilation the Heaven of the Evolutionist——Destiny More Important than Origin—Evolution in the Future, not the Past—An Evolutionist after all.

A FULL-LENGTH portrait of an evolutionist who substitutes the bestial origin for the divine origin. Sons of a gorilla, or sons of God? is the great question of this day, and every intelligent man and woman must be able to give an intelligent answer.

I showed you last Sabbath that evolution was contradicted by the Bible, by science, by observation and by common sense; that the Bible account of the creation of man, and of brute, and of the world, and the evolutionist's account collided with each other as certainly as two express trains going in opposite directions at thirty miles the hour, their locomotives meeting on the same track. I showed you that all the evolution scientists, without any exception, were pronounced infidels; that evolution was a heathenism thousands of years old; that among the best scientists of our time—among them such men as Agassiz, and Hugh Miller, and Farraday, and Dawson, and Dana—these were men who had for that doctrine of evolution unlimited contempt. I showed you that their favorite theory of the "survival of the fittest" was an absurdity and an untruth, and that natural evolution was always downward and never upward, and that there had never been any improvement for man, or beast, or world, except through the direct or indirect influence of our glorious Christianity. And in the closing part of that sermon, I told you I was not a pessimist but an optimist, that instead of being eleven o'clock at night it is half past five in the morning.

THE MISSING LINK.

This morning, I go on to tell you, it seems to me that evolutionists are trying to impress the great masses of the people with the idea that there is an ancestral line leading from the primal germ on up through the serpent, and on up through the quadruped, and on up through the gorilla to man. They admit that there is "a missing link," as they call it, but there is not a missing link—it is a whole chain gone. Between the physical construction of the highest animal and the physical construction of the lowest man, there is a chasm as wide as the Atlantic Ocean.

Evolutionists tell us that somewhere in central Africa, or in Borneo, there is a creature half-way between the brute and the man, and that that creature is the highest step in the animal ascent and the lowest step in the human creation. But what are the facts? The brain of the largest gorilla that was ever found is thirty cubic inches, while the brain of the most ignorant man that was ever found is seventy. Vast difference between thirty and seventy. It needs a bridge of forty arches to span that gulf.

Beside that, there is a difference between the gorilla and the man—a difference of blood globule, a difference of nerve, a difference of muscle, a difference of bone, a difference of sinew. The horse is more like man in intelligence, the bird is more like him in musical capacity, the mastiff more like him in affection. That eulogized beast of which we hear so much, represented on the walls of ancient cities thousands of years ago, is just as complete as it is now, showing that there has not been a particle of change.

Beside that, if a pair of apes had a man for descendant, why would not all the apes have the same kind of descendants? Can it be that that one favored pair only was honored with human progeny? Beside that, evolution says that as one species rises to another species, the old type dies off. Then how is it that there are whole kingdoms of chimpanzee and gorilla and baboon?

EVOLUTION OF A BIRD'S WING.

The evolutionists have come together and have tried to explain a bird's wing. Their theory has always been that a faculty of an animal while being developed must always be useful and always beneficial, but the wing of a bird, in the thousands of years it was being developed, so far from being any help must have been a hindrance until it could be brought into practical use away on down in the ages. Must there not have been an intelligent will somewhere that formed that wonderful flying instrument, so that a bird five hundred times heavier than the air can mount it and put gravitation under claw and beak? That wonderful mechanical instrument, the wing, with between twenty and thirty different apparati curiously constructed, does it not imply a divine intelligence? does it not imply a direct act of some outside being? All the evolutionists in the world cannot explain a bird's wing, or an insect's wing.

So they are confounded by the rattle of the rattlesnake. Ages before that reptile had any enemies, this warning weapon was created. Why was it created? When the reptile far back in the ages had no enemies, why this warning weapon? There must have been a divine intelligence foreseeing and knowing that in the ages to come that reptile would have enemies and then this warning weapon would be brought into use. You see evolution at every step is

A CONTRADICTION OR A MONSTROSITY.

At every stage of animal life as well as at every stage of human life, there is evidence of direct action of divine will.

Beside that, it is very evident from another fact that we are an entirely different creation, and that there is no kinship. The animal in a few hours or months comes to full strength and can take care of itself. The human race for the first one, two, three, five, ten years is in complete helplessness. The chick just come out of its shell begins to pick up its own food. The dog, the wolf, the lion, soon earn their own livelihood and act for their own defence. The human race does not come to development until twenty or thirty years of age, and by that time the animals that were born the same year the man was born—the vast majority of them have died of old age. This shows there is no kinship, there is no similarity. If we had been born of the beast, we would have had the beast's strength at the start, or it would have had our weakness. Not only different but opposite.

EVOLUTION A GUESS.

Darwin admits that the dovecote pigeon has not changed in thousands of years. It is demonstrated over and over again that the lizard on the lowest formation of rocks was just as complete as the lizard now. It is shown that the ganoid, the first fish, was just as complete as the sturgeon, another name for the same fish now. Darwin's entire system is a guess, and Huxley, and John Stuart Mill, and Tyndall, and especially Professor Heckel, come to help him in the guess, and guess about the brute, and guess about man, and guess about worlds, but as to having one solid foot of ground to stand on, they never have had it and never will have it.

THE INWARD TESTIMONY.

I put in opposition to these evolutionist theories the inward consciousness that we have no consanguinity with the dog that fawns at our feet, or the spider that crawls on the wall, or the fish that flops in the frying pan, or the crow that swoops on the field carcass, or the swine that wallows in the mire. Everybody sees the outrage it would be to put beside the Bible record that Abraham begat Isaac, and Isaac begat Jacob, and Jacob begat Judah, the record that the microscopic animalcule begat the tadpole, and the tadpole begat the polywog, and the polywog begat the serpent, and the serpent begat the quadruped, and the quadruped begat the baboon, and the baboon begat man.

The evolutionists tell us that the apes were originally fond of climbing the trees, but after a while they lost their prehensile power, and therefore could not climb with any facility, and hence they surrendered monkeydom and set up in business as men. Failures as apes, successes as men. According to the evolutionists a man is

A BANKRUPT MONKEY!

I pity the person who in every nerve and muscle and bone and mental faculty and spiritual experience does not realize that he is higher in origin and has had a grander ancestry than the beasts which perish. However degraded men and women may be, and though they may have foundered on the rocks of crime and sin, and though we shudder as we pass them, nevertheless, there is something within us that tells us they belong to the same great brotherhood and sisterhood of our race, and our sympathies are aroused in regard to them. But gazing upon the swiftest gazelle, or upon the tropical bird of most flamboyant wing, or upon the curve of grandest courser's neck, we feel there is no consanguinity. The grandest, the highest, the noblest of them ten thousand fathoms below what we are conscious of being.

It is not that we are stronger than they, for the lion with one stroke of his paw could put us into the dust. It is not that we have better eyesight, for the eagle can descry a mole a mile away. It is not that we are fleeter of foot, for a roebuck in a flash is out of sight, just seeming to touch the earth as he goes. Many of the animal creation surpassing us in fleetness of foot and in keenness of nostril and in strength of limb; but notwithstanding all that, there is something within us that tells us we are of celestial pedigree. Not of the mollusk, not of the rizipod, not of the primal germ, but of the living and omnipotent God. Lineage of the skies. Genealogy of Heaven.

I tell you plainly that if your father was a muskrat and your mother an oppossum, and your great aunt a kangaroo, and the toads and the snapping turtles were your illustrious predecessors, my father was God. I know it. I feel it. It thrills through me with an emphasis and an ecstasy which all your arguments drawn from anthropology and biology and zoology and morology and paleontology and all the other ologies can never shake.

Evolution is one great mystery. It hatches out fifty mysteries and the fifty hatch out a thousand, and the thousand hatch out a million. Why, my brother, not admit the one great mystery of God and have that settle all the other mysteries? I can more easily appreciate the fact that God by one stroke of His omnipotence could make man than I could realize how out of five millions of ages He could have evolved one, putting on a little here and a little there. It would have been just as great a miracle for God to have turned an orang-outang into a man as to make a man out and out—the one job just as big as the other.

It seems to me we had better let God have a little place in our world somewhere. It seems to me if we cannot have Him make all creatures we had better have Him make two or three. There ought to be some place where He could stay without interfering with the evolutionists. "No," says Darwin, and so for years he is trying to raise fan-tailed pigeons and to turn these fan-tail pigeons into some other kind of pigeon, or to have them go into something that is not a pigeon—turning them into quail, or barnyard fowl or brownthresher. But pigeon it is. And others have tried with the ox and the dog and the horse, but they stayed in their species. If they attempt to cross over it is a hybrid and a hybrid is always sterile and goes into extinction. There has been only one successful attempt to pass over from speechless animal to the articulation of man, and that was the attempt which Baalam witnessed in the beast that he rode; but an angel of the Lord, with drawn sword, soon stopped that long-eared evolutionist.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE HORSE.

But says some one, "if we cannot have God make a man let us have Him make a horse." "Oh, no!" says Huxley, in his great lectures in New York several years ago. No, he does not want any God around the premises. God did not make the horse. The horse came of the pliohip-pus, and the pliohippus came from the protohippus, and the protohippus came from the mio-hippus, and the mio-hippus came from the meshohippus, and the meshohippus came from the orohippus, and so away back, all the living creatures, we trace it in a line until we get to the moneron, and no evidence of divine intermeddling with the creation until you get to the moneron and that, Huxley says, is of so low a form of life that the probability is it just made itself or was the result of spontaneous generation. What a narrow escape from the necessity of having a God.

As near as I can tell these evolutionists seem to think that God at the start had not made up His mind as to exactly what He would make, and having made up His mind partially, He has been changing it all through the ages. I believe that God made the world as He wanted to have it, and that the happiness of all the species will depend upon their staying in the species where they were created.

Once upon a time, there was in a natural amphitheatre of the forest and a gorilla from western Africa came in with his club and pounded "Order"! Then he sat down in a chair of twisted forest root. The delegation of birds came in and took their position in the galleries of the hills and the tree tops. And a delegation of reptiles came in, and they took their position in the pit of the valley. And the tiers of rocks were occupied by the delegation of intermediate animals, and there was a great aquarium and a canal leading into it through which came the monsters of the deep to join the great convention. And on one table of rock there were four or five primal germs under a glass case, and in a cup on another table of rock there was a quantity of protoplasm.

Then this gorilla of the African forest with his club pounded again: "order, order!" and then he cried out. "Oh, you great throng of beasts and birds and reptiles and insects, I have called you together to propose that we move up into the human race and be beasts no longer; too long already have we been hunted and caged and harnessed; we shall stand it no longer." At that speech the whole convention broke out in roars of enthusiasm like as though there were many menageries being fed by their keepers, and it did seem as if the whole convention would march right up and take possession of the earth and the human race.

But an old lion arose, his mane white with many years, and he uttered his voice, and when that old lion uttered his voice all the other beasts of the forest were still, and he said: "Peace, brothers and sisters of the forest. I think we have been placed in the spheres for which we were intended; I think our Creator knew the place that was good for us."

He could proceed no further, for the whole convention broke out in an uproar like the House of Commons when the Irish question comes up, or the American Congress the night of adjournment, and the reptiles hissed with indignation at the leonine Gambetta, and the frogs croaked their contempt, and the bears growled their contempt, and the panthers snarled their disgust, and the insects buzzed and buzzed with excitement, and though the gorilla of the African forest with his club pounded, "order, order!" there was no order; and there was a thrusting out of adderine sting, and a swinging of elephantine tusk, and a stroke of beak and a swing of claw until it seemed as if the convention would be massacred.

Just at that moment, at the door of this natural amphitheatre of the forest, the curtain of the leaves lifted, and the bolts and bars of the tree branches were shoved back, and there appeared Agassiz and Audubon, and Silliman, and Moses. And Agassiz cried out, "Oh, you beasts of the forests, I have studied your ancestral records and found you always have been beasts, you always will be beasts; be contented to be beasts."

And Audubon aimed his gun at a bald-headed eagle which dropped from the gallery, and as it dropped struck a serpent that was winding around one of the pillars to get up higher. And Silliman threw a rock of the tertiary formation at the mammals, and Moses thundered, "Every beast after its kind, every bird after its kind, every fish after its kind." And lo! the parliament of wild beasts was prorogued and went home to their constituents and the bat flew out into the night, and the lizard slunk under the rocks, and the gorilla went back to the jungle, and a hungry wolf passing out ate up the primal germs, and a clumsy buffalo upset the protoplasm, and the lion went to his lair, and the eagle went to his eyrie, and the whale went to his palace of crystal and coral, and there was peace—peace in the air, peace in the waters, peace in the fields. Man in his place; the beasts of the earth in their places.

EVOLUTION BRUTALIZING.

But, my friends, evolution is not only infidel and atheistic and absurd; it is brutalizing in its tendencies. If there is anything in the world that will make a man bestial in his habits it is the idea that he was descended from the beast. Why, according to the idea of these evolutionists, we are only a superior kind of cattle, a sort of alderney among other herds. To be sure, we browse on better pasture, and we have better stall and better accommodations, but then we are only Southdowns among the great flocks of sheep. Born of a beast, to die like a beast; for the evolutionists have no idea of a future world. They say the mind is only a superior part of the body. They say our thoughts are only molecular formation. They say when the body dies, the whole nature dies. The slab of the sepulchre is not a milestone on a journey upward, but a wall shutting us into eternal nothingness. We all die alike—the cow, the horse, the sheep, the man, the reptile. Annihilation is

THE HEAVEN OF THE EVOLUTIONIST.

From such a stenchful and damnable doctrine turn away. Compare that idea of your origin—an idea filled with the chatter of apes and the hiss of serpents and the croak of frogs—to an idea in one or two stanzas which I shall read to you from an old book of more than Demosthenic, or Homeric, or Dantesque power: "What is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him? Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hand; thou hast put all things under his feet. All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field; the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas. Oh Lord, our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth."

DESTINY ABOVE ORIGIN.

How do you like that origin? The lion the monarch of the field, the eagle the monarch of the air, behemoth the monarch of the deep, but man monarch of all. Ah! my friends, I have to say to you that I am not so anxious to know what was my origin as to know what will be my destiny. I do not care so much where I came from as where I am going to. I am not so interested in who was my ancestry ten million years ago as I am to know where I will be ten million years from now. I am not so much interested in the preface to my cradle as I am interested in the appendix to my grave. I do not care so much about protoplasm as I do about eternasm. The "was" is overwhelmed with the "to be." And here comes in not natural evolution, but gracious and divine and heavenly evolution—evolution out of sin into holiness, out of grief into gladness, out of mortality into immortality, out of earth into heaven! That is the evolution I believe in.

Evolution from evolvere unrolling! Unrolling of attributes, unrolling of rewards, unrolling of experience, unrolling of angelic companionship, unrolling of divine glory, unrolling of providential obscurities, unrolling of doxologies, unrolling of rainbow to canopy the throne, unrolling of a new heaven and a new earth in which to dwell righteousness. Oh, the thought overwhelms me. I have not the physical endurance to consider it.

Monarchs on earth of all lower orders of creation, and then lifted to be hierarchs in Heaven. Masterpiece of God's wisdom and goodness, our humanity; masterpiece of divine grace, our enthronement. I put one foot on Darwin's "Origin of the Species," and I put the other foot on Spencer's "Biology," and then holding in one hand the book of Moses I see our Genesis, and holding in the other hand the book Revelation, I see our celestial arrival. For all wars I prescribe the Bethlehem chant of the angels. For all sepulchres I prescribe the archangel's trumpet. For all the earthly griefs I prescribe the hand that wipes away all tears from all eyes. Not an evolution from beast to man, but an evolution from contestant to conqueror, and from the struggle with wild beasts in the arena of the amphitheatre to a soft, high, blissful seat in the King's galleries.

A Converted Chinaman, named Chang Kum Sing, is about to return to China as a missionary. He was baptized from the Chinese class of the Trinity Baptist Sunday-school, of New York, over a year ago, and entered Dr. Samson's class in the Fifty-third Street Bible College, supporting himself as sexton of the Fifty-third Street church, in connection with Ah Gee, whom he led to Christ, and who has been studying in the same class. Chang Kum Sing gathered a large Chinese class in the Sunday-school, averaging fifteen during the last year. Feeling it his duty to go home as a missionary, he has been very faithful, patient and earnest in his preparation for this work, and won the hearts of all who knew him. The Chinese Bible Classes of the city have raised $150 to pay his expenses home.

Mr. Joseph Cook who has Returned from his tour around the world, lectured in Brooklyn on Saturday, before the Young Men's Christian Association. In reference to the Civil Service Reform question he said: "I rejoice in the passage of the Civil Service Reform bill by Congress; but we must remember that politicians are famous for contempt of court, and we must expect it to be opposed by all honest and dishonest methods. We once had a Civil Service Commission appointed, but, in spite of our high hopes, Congress starved it to death. It is high time for a note of alarm to be sounded. The Representatives at Washington did not care to declare themselves opposed to the will of the people, but I do not believe they were converted. In Washington the most pertinent question considered is: 'Am I likely to be re-elected?' There will yet be huge opposition, and the people must continue to thunder forth their injunction that the good work must proceed, for since the resumption of specie payments no more auspicious event has happened than the passage of this bill."

A Spoiled Dress and a Husband Won are Incidents in the history of a Philadelphia family, recently published. A lady and gentleman, both young, met for the first time at a dinner party in the Quaker city. The lady was attired in excellent taste, wearing a delicately-tinted dress beautifully made. It was not the dress, however, that won the gentleman's admiration, though it was indirectly the cause of their union. At the very commencement of the dinner a waiter upset the contents of a plate of soup into the lady's lap. The waiter was overwhelmed with sorrow, and expected that a scene would have followed which would have cost him his place. The lady, too, was obviously vexed, for the silk could not be matched; but she did not scream, nor cry, nor abuse the waiter, but made a witty remark and quietly resumed her dinner, postponing the tears of regret until she was alone. The gentleman saw the incident and concluded that a lady who could control herself in circumstances so trying to the female mind, must be a remarkable woman. Further acquaintance confirmed the opinion, and they were ultimately married, and were very happy. It was not until many years afterward that the lady learned that it was in losing her dress she won her husband. Then she counted her dress well lost. If Christians who in a grave trouble maintain their equanimity but dishonor their Master by their petulance and hasty words in the smaller trials of life, would but remember the assurance of the apostle, they too might be undisturbed by the smaller as by the graver accidents of life (Rom. 8: 28).

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Heavy Load Taken Off.—At a Meeting in the Queen's Rooms for deepening spiritual life, Mr. Bowker said: "For a long time after my conversion I feared that if I left myself entirely to Christ, He would try me with more than I could bear. I shrank with dread from committing myself to God. I know better now, and will tell you a little incident which happened to me lately. I cannot keep it to myself. A few weeks ago a letter came to me which contained information of a certain thing, which if it came to pass would crush me. I tell you this to show that the more you trust the more you are tried. I laid the letter before the Lord. It was only an overruling Providence that could save me. I then went to my usual avocations. I attended several committee meetings and addressed a meeting of constables, and went through it all with such calmness that no one could judge what a burden really lay upon my heart. That night I was compelled to cry to the Lord that the burden must be removed, for I could not bear it. That night passed in the quietness of faith, and next morning the postman brought a letter which told me that the burden was removed."

A Chalk Mark on His Back.—The same speaker related that "A young Christian was much annoyed by his shopmates because of his zeal for Christ. One day, during the dinner-hour, they threw him on the floor, and with a bit of chalk wrote 'Ranter' on his back. In the evening he told a doleful story of his persecutions to an aged Christian, who said, 'Never mind, brother, what they write on your back; Christ has written His own dear name of love on your heart. Count it an honor to suffer for His sake.'"

A Deliverer's Tombstone.—Mr. Maughan said: "I remember well when I was out some years ago in India, I stood before the tomb of a man who had saved a vast empire for his country. The gorgeous though fleeting sunset covered the cemetery in which I stood with a beauty never seen in this country The tomb was that of Sir Henry Havelock, who saved Lucknow, and by it all India to Great Britain. One would say if any one could rest on his own merits it was this man, but when I read the inscription it said he was 'resting on the merits of a crucified Saviour.'"

Knocked Down Again by the Drink.—Mr. Jack said: "On Saturday night I was in Grennock, where the work commenced by Mr. Scroggie is still successfully going on. I was conversing with a young man there, whose case, I am afraid, is typical of thousands among us. No sooner had he made a profession of trust in a crucified Christ for salvation, and was apparently free, than the drink had him down again, and filled him with a sense of helpless, hopeless misery. I believe that he is now enabled fully and without reserve to cast himself and his sin on Jesus. Let us pray that he may be kept firm in the faith!"

A Popular Vocalist Saved.—"Another most deplorable instance of the fascinating power and damning curse of drink came under my notice. The victim in this case was also a young man whose marked ability as a solo singer made him popular and in great request, and so he was peculiarly liable to great and ofttimes victorious temptations. The look upon his face went straight to my heart. His confession was pitiable in the extreme. He thought nothing could save him; but, thanks be to God, he was led to accept Jesus Christ as his Saviour, and to-day he is full of a holy peace which no speech can define."

How the Debt was Paid.—Mr. J. C. White said: "One night not long ago I was speaking to a man at the Christian Institute about his soul's salvation, and telling him that he was to accept Christ's offer, and he said to me, 'How am I to accept the offer?' I took out my pencil and a bit of paper; I said to him, 'What is your name?' He told me. I said, 'Supposing you were owing somebody a hundred pounds, and you got a message that unless it was paid by to-morrow morning, you would be apprehended, and I wrote down this, "If you will tell me of the money you are owing, I undertake to pay it for you." Now what would you say? Mind, you cannot pay the debt yourself.' I left him to think of the answer he would give, and when I returned he dictated to me this, and I wrote it down, 'Dear Sir: I have received your kind offer, I thankfully accept it, and I shall look to you to pay the debt as you offer.' He said, 'Will that settle the matter?' and by way of reply I took him to Isaiah 45: 22, 'Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God and there is none else.' The Saviour has come down to pay your debt. You look to Him, and then the responsibility is His."

Snowed Up but Happy.—Mr. Jack said: "I spent about a fortnight lately with a minister of Christ in Dumfriesshire. He took me to see an aged believer, whose wife had lately gone to heaven, and he was left on earth a lonely old man. The minister told me that one very stormy day he visited him, and found that the snow had blocked up the window and door. Kicking away the snow from the door, he entered and saw his friend sitting before the fire-place reading the Bible by candle-light. Notwithstanding the intense cold, he had allowed the fire to go out, being so engrossed with reading God's Word—but his face was fairly beaming with the more than seraphic joy which filled his heart, and gave him a foretaste of glory."

A Train in the Tunnel.—Mr. Marsh said: "I shall never forget a simple illustration which a little child once gave me of trusting faith. A train dashed into a tunnel with a warning whistle. The whistle and darkness startled a child in his mother's arms, and caused him to scream with fear; but directly the mother's voice was heard, and he felt the soothing hand upon his face, all fear vanished. Yet the child knew not why the train went through the darkness, but immediately the parent's voice reached him, he trusted. When we go through any dark or laborious way, let us also trust our Father in heaven, and nothing will harm us. 'The darkness and the light, O Lord! are both alike to Thee.'"

"A Thousand a Year!"—"When I was at Eyemouth, last April, an evangelist was speaking to a man who said in reply, 'I don't think I am a great sinner.' 'What! How many sins do you commit daily?' 'I don't know.' 'Say you only commit three sins of thought, word, or deed; that makes at least one thousand a year! How old are you?' 'A little over forty.' 'Then, that is over forty thousand sins you have to account for; yet you are not a very great sinner! Why, man, one single sin is enough to sink you to hell! Christ is our only hope.' It is to be hoped the misguided man's understanding was enlightened by the Holy Spirit, and that by this time he knows, not only that he is a great sinner, but that Christ is a great and Almighty Saviour."

Four Paisley Weavers Saved.—Mr. Dunn said: "We have been hearing to-day that God is able to convert Chinese, Japanese, Indians, and Jews. Now I have to tell you that He is even able to convert Paisley weavers. We have had glorious work in Paisley lately. I was called in to see a girl who was dying. When I entered the room it was evident that the Spirit of the Lord was there. The girl was most happy. I asked, 'Where were you converted?' 'In the big tent on Glasgow Green, four years ago,' she said. I then asked the sister the same question, and got the same reply; and the father and mother said the same thing in answer to my inquiry. This family of weavers have all accepted Christ. They were brought in at the same time and place."

A Consumptive's Dream.—The Same Speaker also said: "A young lady was dying of galloping consumption, who had lived for the world and herself. A servant of God had previously warned her that shortly it might be too late for repentance. Gradually she became oppressively conscious of the fact that she was to die very soon, and that she needed a Saviour. Although the devil had often suggested to her the fatal thought, 'There's plenty of time,' he now said, 'It's too late.' One day the minister called, but for some time no one came to the door. After repeatedly knocking, the young lady herself at last opened the door, and said, 'I must apologize for not opening the door sooner, but I had fallen asleep, and dreamed that I was in heaven, where on every side I saw angels, and I heard them singing, but could not learn the words or the tune. When I was asked, "Why don't you sing?" my answer was always the same, "I don't know the words or the tune."' At last I came to a place where I saw the face of Jesus, and soon He asked me, "Why don't you sing?" "I don't know the words or the tune," I answered. Then I thought that the door of heaven opened, and I found myself in hell!' As she said the last word she dropped down dead at the minister's feet. This happened only twelve months ago in Warwickshire, and the minister himself told me of it."

Sticking to the Wreck.—Mr. Marsh related that "There was a shipwreck on the coast of Cornwall. The lifeboat got all the crew off the wreck but one man, who had a large treasure on board. In reply to the entreaties of the boatmen and his shipmates, he said: 'She'll weather it yet.' Time was passing, and the lifeboat itself was in great danger, but a final appeal was made to him to escape for his life. In a rage he exclaimed, 'I'll stick to the ship, though I go to hell!' The rescuers sorrowfully left him. Shortly afterward the ship went to pieces and the man was lost. There are hundreds who, like this man, say daily, 'I'll not become a Christian; I'll chance it,' and so on, till they are wrecked on the breakers of death, and then drop into a hell of endless torment."

ENGLAND'S MISSION IN EGYPT.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

God's Use of Nations—Means for the Accomplishment of His Purposes—England's Mission—I. Viewed Nationally—Egypt's Geographical Position—The Railway from Alexandria to Suez—English Capital—The Suez Canal Undertaking—Money and Diplomacy—Nominal Support of France—Recent Action of the National Party—II. Prophetically: The Ten-Kingdomed Confederacy in Course of Formation—Egypt's Position in the Near Future—The Attitude of Russia in Reference to the East—England as the Divine Rod—Egypt, Assyria, and Israel.

GOD, in His infinite wisdom, makes use of nations as well as individuals for the accomplishment of His purposes. The motives that influence the "powers that be" in their various movements, though not directly of God, are made subservient to the working out of the great problems of His Divine Government. He who can tell "the number of the stars," who can call them "by their names," and cause them to move in their appointed spheres and orbits, takes a lively interest in the affairs of our favored planet. Though to Him the nations are but as a "drop of a bucket," yet He sets up kings and kingdoms, and destroys them at His pleasure; and makes them a blessing or a scourge to each other. He maketh "the wrath of man to praise Him, and the remainder of wrath He restrains."

In these remarks on England's Mission in Egypt, we shall divide them in the following manner—viz., nationally, religiously, and prophetically. We hope to be able to show under each of the above headings that the hand of God can be traced in what has taken place in Egypt of late years, as well as in what is transpiring at the present time. The child of God can see a Father's hand in war as well as in peace; in adversity as well as in prosperity; and in affliction as well as in health. Under this impression we will proceed to notice briefly England's mission in Egypt—

NATIONALLY.

This may be said to have commenced at the beginning of the present century, when England frustrated the designs of Napoleon Bonaparte in Egypt. He had succeeded in overturning the Mameluke Dynasty, and when he had done this his work was accomplished. The mission of France was to destroy, that of England is to reconstruct. The former work is easy compared with the latter, and England has her share of both to perform before the internal affairs of Egypt can be placed upon a satisfactory footing. Her pecuniary interest in the land of the Pharaohs is, however, so great, that she is bound to undertake the difficult and delicate task.

EGYPT'S GEOGRAPHICAL POSITION.

At this stage it may be as well to glance at the causes which have led England, France, and other powers to take such a lively interest in Egypt and its affairs. The primary cause is the geographical position it occupies as the great highway to the East; and to facilitate traffic a railway was planned many years ago from Alexandria to Suez. The Egyptians were not slow in making the discovery that this mode of transit was vastly superior to the "ship of the desert" which they have been familiar with for so many centuries. Though they might admire the new mode of conveyance, they were aware that it was an expensive luxury, and they were not favored with an overflowing treasury. To enable them to adopt to some extent Western ideas of progress, English capitalists advanced them large sums of money on loan, secured by bonds, for the construction of railways and other public works. These loans were not unmixed boons to the Egyptians, as they necessitated the keeping of public accounts and the payment of interest when due.

During the expenditure of the loans there was of course a season of prosperity, and many of the nobles or notables came in for a share of the spoil, which enabled them to live in ease and luxury; but it was not to gratify their native proclivities the money was advanced. English capitalists, finding that the Egyptians did not or could not keep satisfactory accounts, sought the intervention of their own government; and England being desirous of increasing her prestige and extending her influence in Egypt, sent out commissioners to see how matters really stood, and rectify abuses. Meanwhile, the Sultan looked on with an envious and jealous eye at the increasing influence of England and France in Egypt, and the tendency manifested by the Khédive now and again to set his suzerainty at defiance. As both the countries named were his allies, however, he could not afford, with the Northern Bear at his back, to give unnecessary offence to either of them.

THE SUEZ CANAL UNDERTAKING.

We must next notice the Suez Canal, which though in the first instance designed and carried to a successful issue by an eminent French engineer (M. de Lesseps), was destined to give England a far greater interest in Egypt than she had previously obtained. The canal was the means of opening up greater facilities for England to extend her commercial operations in India, China, and Australia; and she was not slow to avail herself of them. Money and diplomacy conjoined can do great things; and when the late Earl Beaconsfield saw a favorable opportunity, he surprised the nations by securing nearly one half the shares in the new canal. This bold step gave England a preponderating interest in the great highway to the East, and the immense advantage it was to her was seen in a large number of her steamers passing to and fro. Her newly-acquired pecuniary stake in the canal itself, and the necessity that had arisen for protecting it within and without, led her to exercise great watchfulness over the ruling Powers in Egypt; and with the nominal support of France, she became somewhat more than a bondholder and shareholder.

With the express understanding that she was not seeking an acquisition of territory, England set her foot on Egyptian soil for the purpose of upholding the Khédive, who had been virtually set aside by Arabi Bey, the leader of the national party. In the crisis that had arisen she felt that she could not occupy a neutral position or the attitude of a mere onlooker. To countenance the pretensions of Arabi Bey would presumably give offence to the Sultan, and at the same time sanction an open act of rebellion; she therefore decided to uphold the Khédive as the representative of properly-constituted authority. In pursuing this straightforward course she was no match for the unprincipled persons in power with whom she had to deal; still she felt she had a duty to perform, and would do it.

When the crisis came, her consort France deserted her, for obvious reasons. Germany was coquetting with the Sultan, and this was sufficient to lead France to stand aloof, as the latter Power is well aware of the work prepared for her sooner or later with her next-door neighbor. Besides, France is a military and not a regenerating power; and Egypt is to be raised to some extent commercially, socially, and religiously. England is the only Power that is likely to exercise any influence in the last-named direction, and therefore we shall now briefly glance at England's mission in Egypt—

RELIGIOUSLY.

The commission given by the Lord Jesus Christ to His ambassadors is of world-wide extent, as He said, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." During the present century missionary zeal has carried the glad tidings of salvation into the greater part of the habitable world; and the teeming millions of India, China, Japan, and other countries have heard that there is a Saviour who can save them from their sins. Popery and Mahommedanism have been great barriers to the introduction of Christianity; but they are both destined to be removed to the extent of allowing a free Gospel to be preached before they finally embrace the great anti-Christian system that is looming up in the not far-distant future.

A few zealous and devoted missionaries have been laboring in Egypt under peculiar difficulties and disadvantages; and the results hitherto have not been very encouraging. The Crescent has so far maintained its ascendency over the Cross; and with the strong prejudices of the followers of Mahomet very little progress has been made with the adult portion of the population; but by means of schools some of the rising generation have been taught the religion of Jesus. During the recent outbreak in Alexandria and other places in Egypt, it is to be feared that some of those engaged in missionary work were massacred; and though it is sad to think that valuable lives have been thus sacrificed to Moslem fanaticism, there is little doubt the loss will result in ultimate gain to European laborers in the Gospel and to the Egyptians themselves.

Before England withdraws her troops from Egypt, she will doubtless demand such reforms in the country as will afford security to European residents for the future; and with such a guarantee, missionary work will be carried on securely, if not successfully. It is not to be supposed that any great number of Mahommedans will become Christians, as it is not at all suitable soil for the growth of Christianity; but it appears to be God's purpose that all nations, however dark, shall be blessed with the light of the Gospel before the night of almost universal formality and infidelity sets in. When men as a general rule see through the errors of popery, and give it up in disgust, they too frequently abandon themselves to infidelity.

This is notably the case with Italy, the cradle in which the system was nursed, and in which it flourished for several centuries. A Roman Catholic writer asserts that the Italians are now "a nation of infidels;" and, if so, it may well be asked, "Who made them such?" Under whose teaching have they been for such a long period? If their Christianity, such as it was, depended for its maintenance on the temporal power of the pope, it certainly had not much vitality or spirituality inherently; and there can be no doubt that it is far more earthly than heavenly. As it has been with popery, so in all probability it will be with Mahommedanism. When the Moslems discover that their supposed only "true prophet" is really a false one, they will be disgusted with the deception that has been practised upon them, and will readily fall into the great gulf of infidelity.

We shall now venture upon a few suggestions relative to England's mission in Egypt

PROPHETICALLY.

The Antichrist or the "Beast" of Daniel and Revelation is to reign over ten kingdoms, occupying territory at one time under the rule of Rome, the fourth great empire. Seven of these kingdoms—namely, Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Turkey, and Greece—have partially assumed their political position, and are endeavoring to gain possession of the territory that geographically belongs to them. Greece is a remarkable instance of the correctness of this hypothesis; and other examples could be given, if necessary, but here they would be out of place. Within the last few years a movement has been made by England, France, and America along the southern shores of the Mediterranean, which has had the effect of disturbing the stand-still condition of the countries occupying territory in those parts. France has been at work in Algeria, Tunis, and the lower end; England and France in Egypt, and England and America in Syria. Out of the countries at present agitated by Western civilization and progress, the formation of three kingdoms may be expected, which will be ready at the appointed time to place themselves, with seven other kingdoms, under the headship of Satan's king.

EGYPT'S POSITION IN THE NEAR FUTURE.

Egypt may be expected to become one of the three kingdoms at present in embryo; and if so she must governmentally be separated from Turkey. The relationship between the Porte and the Pasha (or the Khédive, as the chief ruler of Egypt is now termed) has never been of a very cordial character, and the national movement that has recently developed itself clearly shows that the suzerainty of the Sultan is little more than nominal. England, with her usual respect for properly-constituted authority, has determined to uphold the Khédive—in fact, she could not do otherwise without risking a war with Turkey. Before the affairs of Egypt are placed on anything like a satisfactory footing, however, the independence of Egypt will have to be recognized by England, if not actually established by her.

As an independent Power, England will be in a better position to exercise her influence in Egypt than when she has to take Turkey into the account; and then Russia or any European Power will not be able to make a catspaw of the Sultan. For two or three cogent reasons, Russia is jealous of the stand taken by England in the affairs of Egypt, as it is calculated to checkmate her long-cherished designs in the East. India is generally supposed to be the coveted prize, but she would rather possess Syria or Palestine than the country indicated. Nothing less than the Holy Sepulchre will satisfy her, and this she is not likely to get or to keep. England's mission in Egypt, and probably in Syria, will be to keep back Russia from gaining possession of the land of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. To England will probably be accorded the honor of assisting God's ancient people to return to their own land.

ENGLAND AS THE DIVINE ROD.

There is a remarkable prophecy with reference to Egypt in Isaiah 19: 22, where it is said, "And the Lord shall smite Egypt; He shall smite and heal it; and they shall return even to the Lord, and He shall be intreated of them, and shall heal them." The Lord is now using England as His rod, as He did the Assyrians of old; and after she has been smitten, the same Power that smote her may be made the instrument to heal her nationally, and give her strength to stand upon her feet. In verse 20 of this chapter it is said that God will send Egypt "a saviour, and a great one, and he shall deliver them."

After their final deliverance, it appears that the Egyptians shall be honored, with the Assyrians, as the immediate neighbors of Israel, with peculiar privileges and blessings. When this happy period arrives Israel will be the most favored nation under heaven; and those two countries—Egypt and Assyria—in which the Israelites were kept so long in bondage and were taken into captivity, shall forget the part they took in the past, and dwell as peaceful neighbors. In verse 24 it is said, "In that day Israel shall be the third with Egypt and with Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the land: whom the Lord of Hosts shall bless, saying, Blessed be Egypt, My people, and Assyria the work of My hands, and Israel Mine inheritance." Blessed indeed is "the nation whose God is the Lord, and the people whom He hath chosen for His own inheritance."

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Effort is Being Made in the House to prevent the possibility of a repetition of the Star Route frauds. The House Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads proposes a change in the methods of paying for expedition on star routes. The bill provides that existing laws, governing the pay for expedition or faster service between terminal points, shall be repealed, and that hereafter, when it becomes necessary to increase the speed on any route, the route shall be re-advertised, so that new bids may be submitted by any person for the changed service. The existing law provides that no extra allowance shall be made for any increase of expedition in carrying the mail, unless thereby the employment of additional stock and carriers is made necessary, and then only in proportion to the extra force employed.

The Tariff Question was Under Consideration on January 19th at a caucus of Republican members of the House. The Washington despatches state that, while there was perfect harmony in the caucus and a generally expressed desire to pass the bill, and so effect a revision of the tariff, several members expressed their intention to amend it, and there was an evident disposition to have it understood that there would be demands for modifications from Republicans when the bill gets under way. The estimates given in explanation of the effect of the bill put the total reduction of revenues from customs receipts at $25,000,000; the reduction on sugar alone at $12,000,000, and the reduction on wool at $2,000,000. The estimated specific reduction is put at an average of 12 per cent. It becomes increasingly clear that on the manner in which this question is dealt with and that of civil service reform hangs the fate of parties.

The Senate Passed the Bill Providing for the reduction of letter postage from three to two cents on Saturday morning. The amendment of the committee changing the date when the reduction should go into effect from January 1st, 1884, as proposed by the House, to July 1st, 1883, was also agreed to. The most conspicuous opponent of the measure was Senator Sherman, who thought the time was not ripe for it. The impression prevailed, however, that considerable progress had been made in that direction since the detection of the Star Route frauds, which were in full swing when Mr. Sherman was in the Cabinet. Senator Edmunds, during the discussion, raised the question of including the telegraphs in the Post Office system as is done in England. He expressed his conviction that "what the United States needed now more than anything else was the construction of the postal telegraph at first between the great cities and intermediate points, and extended gradually until every post-office in the country should have, or be within immediate reach of, a postal telegraph. This ought to be done, and it would be done within a very few years, and he hoped to move in the matter at the next session of Congress, if no one else did sooner."

Mr. Robeson has had to Endure a Fresh humiliation during the past week. The Appropriations Committee of the House decided to reduce the item for monitors to $450,000 with the proviso that the money shall be expended only for machinery for one monitor, and for that one the cost of the machinery for which will not exceed the amount appropriated. All the old monitor contracts made by Secretary Robeson are virtually repudiated, and the Secretary of the Navy is directed to take possession of the unfinished iron-clads and place them in the navy yards. He is also to ascertain and report to Congress what amount is equitably due the contractors, in whose shipyards the vessels have been stored and cared for during the last six years, for which period work upon them has been suspended. The contracts for machinery for the one monitor are to be made by the Secretary of the Navy, upon the recommendation of the Naval Advisory Board. The ex-secretary may wisely ponder on this decision in the retirement to which he is relegated, and from which it may be hoped he will not soon emerge.

The Senatorial Elections, so Far as they have been effected, give general satisfaction through the country. Ex-Governor Colquitt's election, in Georgia, is a tribute to that gentleman's character and abilities which is endorsed by all who know him. Mr. Beck is re-elected in Kentucky, and will commence in March his fifteenth year of service at Washington, including the eight years in which he sat in the House. Mr. Lamar from Mississippi, Mr. Morgan from Alabama, Mr. Garland from Arkansas, and Mr. Butler from South Carolina, are all men whose election for six years is hailed with pleasure by Republicans as well as Democrats. On the other side, Mr. Hoar has been re-elected after a stubborn fight in Massachusetts, Mr. Frye, of Maine, and Mr. Antony, of Rhode Island, have also been re-elected. Mr. Windom's seat in Minnesota, and Mr. Ferry's in Michigan, at the close of last week still hung in the balance. Present indications are that the Senate will be composed of 38 Republicans, 36 Democrats, and the two Virginia Senators, Messrs. Mahone and Riddleberger.

At the Great Temperance Convention held at Topeka, Kansas, on January 9th and 10th, there was abundant evidence that the friends of temperance had not been dispirited by their recent defeat. Ex-Governor St. John, who presided, said in opening the proceedings: "My friends, I am very glad to find so many representatives of the various parts of the State present, as we see here to-night. It seems to me that it furnishes a refutation of the oft-repeated statement that the temperance movement in Kansas is a mere tidal wave that has come and gone never to be seen again. Thank God, the temperance men and women are actuated by principle, and from it they will never be moved. These reverses that we have met with only teach us to be ever vigilant. I have faith in God, and in His own time He will free every household in this Union from the accursed slavery of rum." As Governor St. John purposes devoting some time to a general temperance campaign in other states, he has resigned the Presidency of the Kansas society. The following resolution on the subject was unanimously passed by the convention: "Whereas, Governor John P. St. John has been for six years President of the Kansas State Temperance Union, and now to our regret and at his own earnest request, retires from that position to enter upon a wider field, therefore: Resolved, That our hearts go with him wherever he may go to plead our cause, and while we regret that necessity which takes him from us as our President, we believe that the cause of temperance throughout the United States, needs the services of our gallant leader, and we consent for this reason only to his retirement from the chief office of our organization."

The Prohibitory Amendment in Iowa has been declared invalid by the Supreme Court. The judgment was pronounced in a case heard on appeal from the lower court. The plaintiffs, a firm of brewers, sued for the amount of a bill due them for beer, to which the defendant pleaded that the sale of beer being illegal under the amendment, he was entitled to exemption from the debt. In reply it was contended that the amendment was not in force, the record of the House of the Eighteenth Assembly failing to show that it had passed, and that the House measure differed from the amendment as passed by the Senate; further, that subsequent action in the Nineteenth Assembly did not and could not correct the carelessness of the Eighteenth Assembly. The lower court gave a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, and declared the amendment not in operation. The Supreme Court on January 18th confirmed the decision.

The Final List of Fatalities in the Hotel fire at Milwaukee now gives the total as 75. Of 177 people, said to be in the hotel at the time of the fire, 176 are accounted for, as follows: Identified, 28; non-identified, 46; saved, 102. There is still one person missing, making the total loss of life 75. George Scheller, proprietor of the bar in the hotel, was arrested on Tuesday, January 16th, on a warrant charging him with having set the fire which destroyed the Newhall House. The prisoner was immediately transferred to the county jail. It is reported that Scheller was arrested principally on the statement of two employés, who claim that they saw Scheller in the wood room, where the fire originated, and that he was there after three o'clock in the morning. The district-attorney refused to let any one see Scheller, as he was afraid an attempt would be made to lynch him. Evidence is said to be in existence that he removed a large part of his stock from the burned building shortly before the fire.

A Disastrous Railroad Accident in California is added to the list of horrors, which have marked the early days of the year. On Saturday last about one o'clock in the morning the overland express on the Southern Pacific, which started from San Francisco at 9.20 on Friday, stopped near Tehichipa Station to leave an extra engine, which was taken on at Sumner to assist in pulling the train up the Tehichipa grade. While making the change, the train, by some means yet unknown, got away and started back northward down a grade of 120 feet to the mile. It consisted of two engines, express, mail and baggage cars, two sleeping cars, one coach and a smoking car. It went down the grade at a frightful speed for about four miles, when the last sleeping car jumped the track and went over an embankment fifteen feet high, carrying with it the other sleeping car and the mail, baggage and express cars, which were piled in a shattered heap, took fire and were consumed. It is certain that eighteen passengers and two sleeping-car porters lost their lives, and that ten or twelve persons were badly injured. Seventeen bodies were recovered from the wreck, many of which were burned beyond recognition. One of them is believed to be that of Mrs. Downey, wife of ex-Governor Downey.

The John C. Green Fund Controlled by the American Sunday-School Union is still producing fruit. The managers report that beside supporting four missionaries it has covered the expenses of the following enterprises: 370 new schools organized with 1686 teachers and 14,403 scholars; 430 schools visited and aided, having over 13,500 members; 2624 Bibles and Testaments distributed; 671 sermons delivered; 992 conversions; and 32 churches organized out of these schools.

A Crash on the Rails at East Syracuse on January 19th, in which, providentially, no lives were lost, teaches a lesson to the railroad companies and others. It appears that a freight train stood on the main track of the New York Central, waiting to run into a yard. The switch tender, being asleep, failed to set any signal to indicate that the track was encumbered. Then the Cincinnati express train came along at forty miles an hour, and, of course, plunged into the freight train. The two brakemen were injured, but not fatally. The passengers were unhurt. When it is remembered how many hours the employés of the companies are required to reman on duty, the fact that one has fallen asleep at his post occasions but little surprise. The man in this case narrowly escaped responsibility for a wholesale slaughter, and the company a heavy expenditure for compensation. There are many indications in the religious world, just now, that we are near a metaphorical switch at which thousands of people, especially young people, are likely to be involved in ruin through the negligence of the teachers they have trusted. It becomes Christian ministers—the watchmen of the Lord—to be especially on the alert lest the eternal future of their charge be wrecked for lack of warning (Ezek. 33 : 1–9)

A Parrot's Performances Interfered with the usefulness of the telephone in an Indianapolis household, recently. The Times of that city says that Mr. Kregelo, a business man there, has a telephone which is in pretty frequent use. He has also a parrot which, being an unusually smart bird and good talker, has picked up the telephone language. Whenever there is a call the parrot immediately begins at the top of his voice, "Hello, hello! Yes, this is Kregelo's; what do you want? This is Kregelo's; hello, hello, hello!" The other day some lady friend of Mrs. Kregelo's called her up on a personal matter. As soon as the bell rang the parrot commenced as usual: "Yes, this is Kregelo's; hello, hello, hello," etc. The lady, supposing that she was in conversation with Mrs. Kregelo, stated her request, but the bird's stock of language was exhausted, and it kept screaming, "This is Kregelo's! this is Kregelo's! what do you want? Hello, hello!" The lady could hardly get in a word, and the bird was evidently elated at leading in the conversation, and it had to be removed before business could be done. There is a class of people who are very much like the parrot. They pick up a few stock phrases which they use for the purposes of honor or gain to convey the impression that the are godly people, when, in reality, they have never experienced regeneration. Their exposure and punishment is certain, though it may not come in this world (Ezek. 33 : 31).

A Desperate Encounter with a Bear is Described in the Watertown Times of January 15th. A farmer named Walton, who lives in Hamilton County, was in the wood loading his sled with bark, when his horses became uneasy, and looking around to ascertain the cause, he saw a huge black bear approaching. On seeing the farmer the bear stopped and rose on his haunches. Walton stepped to the rear of his load and grasped his gun. Hastily slipping in a cartridge he took deliberate aim at the breast of the bear and fired. The ball took effect, but not as the marksman intended. Bruin was wounded, but not seriously. The bullet struck him squarely on the nose and plowed a furrow to the back of his head. The animal, enraged with pain, dropped down upon all fours and made for his assailant. Walton dodged around his load and succeeded in firing all the five cartridges he had with him, hitting, but not killing the brute. As a last resort Walton threw down his rifle, and seizing his axe, aimed a vigorous blow at Bruin, who was now at close quarters and had raised upon his hind feet preparatory to embracing him. The bear was too quick for him, however. One cuff from his huge paw and the axe was sent whirling into the bushes, several rods distant. The farmer now thought his days were numbered. After a brief struggle everything seemed to grow dark and he became unconscious. When he opened his eyes again his enemy lay dead by his side. It seemed that the bear had expired from the effect of his wounds just as the farmer became unconscious. This combat recalls the fight of Christian and Appolyon in Bunyan's immortal allegory. It is often with the Christian as with the farmer in his fight, that deliverance comes in the moment when all is given up for lost (Micah 7 : 8).

Wrecked through Imperfect Charts was the fate of two vessels, the crews of which arrived in New York last week. The wrecked crews belonged respectively to the German bark Amelia and the Norwegian bark Dacapo, both of which vessels were wrecked in the West Indies. The Amelia was bound from Rio Janeiro for Cayes Avalo, which is on the southern coast of Cuba, near Cienfuegos. Captain Klindtworth claims that the chart was imperfect, for on September 29th, during fine weather, the bark struck on a reef about nine miles from the coast. There was no reef within twelve miles from this point, according to the chart. Captain A. Olsen, of the Dacapo, says that he was bound from Europe for St. Thomas. On December 10th, during fine weather, the bark struck on a group of rocks near an island, which lies about six miles from the harbor of St. Thomas. Captain Olsen claims that his chart was imperfect, for these rocks were not marked on it. Those who make the word of God their chart of life will have no cause to raise such a complaint. There can be no wreck then (Prov. 3 : 1).

Shooting an Uninvited Visitor is an Extreme method of intimating to him that he is unwelcome, but that course was adopted at a house on the outskirts of Cleveland, O., on January 14th. A despatch from that city to the New York press states that a Polish family was holding a reception to celebrate the christening of a child. Among the persons present an American citizen was noticed, and on inquiry being made, it was found that no one had given him an invitation. The American was, in fact, an intruder. The family holding the reception did not practise temperance, and in the course of the evening's festivity, stimulants had been dispensed freely. The young American's presence, therefore, was resented with a vigor in part originating in the liquor consumed. Possibly a courteous request to withdraw might have been complied with, but the manner in which the young man was ordered away provoked him to resist, upon which one of the party drew his revolver and shot the unbidden guest, wounding him fatally. The incident reminds us of that parable in which our Saviour pictured the doom of those who, trusting in their own righteousness, insult the King and His Son (Matt. 22 : 11–13).

Danger in Popular Ornaments is the Subject of a warning published in a scientific journal. Celluloid is now made up into so many forms at low prices that it is extensively worn. The dangers to which those who wear it are exposed, it appears, are numerous. The journal says: The explosion of a celluloid comb, by which a baby was severely burned in Abington, Mass., is only an example of the dangerous nature of this substance, which, after the usual fashion, we are learning by experience. It is composed of such material as to readily ignite and explode, owing to its imprisoned and explosive gases by contact with fire, and a series of accidents has commenced from ignorance of this fact rather than from carelessness. There should be a warning of the dangerous properties of the substance, without requiring that the knowledge should be obtained by the accidents of the blowing off of bracelets, beads, and such like personal ornaments at the touch of a match or gas jet." After this warning, probably, there will be greater care exercised by those who wear the explosive material, which appears to be harmless enough except when exposed to heat. This characteristic is analogous to certain spiritual states. The Church has often had cause to lament the fall of prominent members, whose character was supposed to be without reproach. The fire of temptation has come suddenly in the shape of intoxicating liquor, a pack of cards, dishonest gain, or in some other way, and virtue that had resisted all other temptations falls before that with which there was an inner ally. Watchfulness is ever necessary until the time when Jesus enables His followers to say, as He did "The prince of this world hath nothing in me" (John 14 : 30).

THE STAR.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon. Preached December 24th, 1882.

"When they had heard the king, they departed; and, lo, the star, which they saw in the East, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was. When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy."—MATTHEW II : 1, 2, 9, 10.

The Plenipotentiary of the Planets — Come to Jesus—I. Gather Light from the Star—What the Star Was—God Can Conduct Souls to Jesus by a Star—Star Preaching—All About Christ—All Lead to Him—Stops at Jesus — II. Gather Wisdom from the Wise Men—They Used the Star — Opera Glasses at the Tabernacle — They Persevered—Rejoiced Over the Re-appearance of the Star—They Entered In—They Worship — III. Act as Wise Men — Trade Questions—The Best Pursuit—Eyes that See —Not Empty Handed Adoration.

SEE, dear friends, the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ even in His state of humiliation! He is born of lowly parents, laid in a manger, and wrapped in swaddling bands; but, lo! the principalities and powers in the heavenly places are in commotion. First, one angel descends to proclaim the advent of the new-born King, and suddenly there is with Him a multitude of the heavenly host singing glory unto God. Nor was the commotion confined to the spirits above; for in the heavens which overhang this earth there is a stir.

A STAR IS DEPUTED

on behalf of all the stars, as if He were the envoy and plenipotentiary of all worlds to represent them before their King. This star is put in commission to wait upon the Lord, to be His herald to men afar off, His usher to conduct them to His presence, and His body-guard to sentinel His cradle.

Earth, too, is stirred. Shepherds have come to pay the homage of simple-minded ones; with all love and joy they bow before the mysterious child; and after them from afar come the choice and flower of their generation, the most studious minds of the age. Making a long and difficult journey, they too at last arrive, the representatives of the Gentiles. Lo! the kings of Seba and Sheba offer gifts—gold, frankincense, and myrrh. Wise men, the leaders of their peoples, bow down before Him, and pay homage to the Son of God.

Beloved friends, if wise men of old came to Jesus and worshipped, should not we come also? My intense desire this morning is that we all may pay homage to Him of whom we sing, "Unto us a child is born; unto us a son is given." Let those of us who have long worshipped worship anew with yet lowlier reverence and intenser love. And God grant—oh, that He would grant it — that some who are afar off from Him spiritually, as the Magi were far off locally, may come to-day and ask, "Where is He that is born King of the Jews? for we have come to worship Him." May feet that have been accustomed to broad roads, but unaccustomed to the narrow path, this day pursue that way till they see Jesus, and bow before Him with all their hearts, finding salvation in Him.

These wise men came naturally, traversing the desert; let us come spiritually, leaving our sins. These were guided by the sight of a star; let us be guided by faith in the divine Spirit, by the teaching of His Word and all those blessed lights which the Lord uses to conduct men to Himself. Only let us come to Jesus. It was well to come unto the babe Jesus, led by the feeble beams of a star; you shall find it still more blessed to come to Him now that He is exalted in the highest heavens, and by His own light reveals His own perfect glory. Delay not, for this day He cries, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

This morning let us try to do three things. First, let us gather light from this star; secondly, let us gather wisdom from these wise men; and thirdly, let us act as wise men helped by our own particular star.

I. First, then, let us gather

LIGHT FROM THIS STAR.

May the Spirit of the Lord enable us so to do.

I suppose you have each one his own imagination as to what this star was. It would seem to have been altogether supernatural, and not a star, or a comet of the ordinary kind. It was not a constellation, nor a singular conjunction of planets; there is nothing in the Scriptures to support such a conjecture. In all probability it was not a star in the sense in which we now speak of stars; for we find that it moved before the wise men, then suddenly disappeared, and again shone forth to move before them. It could not have been a star in the upper spheres like others, for such movements would not have been possible. Some have supposed that the wise men went in the direction in which the star shone forth in the heavens, and followed the changes of its position; but it could not in that case have been said that it stood over the place where the young child was. If the star was at its zenith over Bethlehem, it would have been in its zenith over Jerusalem too; for the distance is so small that it would not have been possible to observe any difference in the position of the star in the two places. It must have been a star occupying quite another sphere from that in which the planets revolve.

We believe it to have been a luminous appearance in mid-air; probably akin to that which led the children of Israel through the wilderness, which was a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night. Whether it was seen in the daylight or not we cannot tell. Chrysostom and the early fathers are wonderfully positive about many things which Scriptures leaves in doubt, but as these eminent divines drew upon their imagination for their facts, we are not under bonds to follow them. They aver that this star was so bright as to be visible all day long. If so, we can imagine the wise men travelling day and night; but if it could be seen only by night, the picture before us grows far more singular and weird-like as we see these easterns quietly pursuing their star-lit way, resting perforce when the sun was up, but noiselessly hurrying at night through slumbering lands. These questions are not of much importance to us, and therefore we will not dwell long upon them.

Only here is a first lesson: if it should ever be that men should fail to preach the Gospel, God can conduct souls to His Son by a star. Ah! say not only by a star, but by a stone, a bird, a blade of grass, a drop of dew.

"Remember that Omnipotence
Has servants everywhere."

Therefore, despond not when you hear that one minister has ceased to preach the Gospel, or that another is fighting against the vital truth of God. Their apostasy shall be to their own loss rather than to the hurt of Jesus and His church; and, sad though it be to see the put out, yet God is not dependent upon human lights, He is the Shekinah light of His own holy place. Mortal tongues, if they refuse to preach His word, shall have their places supplied by books in the running brooks and sermons in stones. The beam shall cry out of the wall, and the timber shall answer it. When chief priests and scribes have all gone out of the way, the Lord puts stars into commission, and once more in very deed the heavens are telling the glory of God, and the firmament is showing His handiwork.

Now, when the Lord does use a star to be His minister, what is the order of His ministry? We may learn by this inquiry what kind of ministry God would have ours to be if we are stars in His right hand. We also shine as lights in the world: let us see how to do it.

We notice, first, that star-preaching is all about Christ. We do not know what the color of the star was, nor the shape of the star, nor to what magnitude it had attained; these items are not recorded, but what is recorded is of much more importance; the wise men said—"We have seen His star." I wish that you and I, whatever our eccentricities or personalities may be, may never make so much of them as to attract men's attention to them. May people never dwell upon our attainments or our deficiencies, but may they always observe this one thing, that we are men of God, that we are ambassadors of Christ, that we are Christ's servants, and do not attempt to shine for ourselves, or to make ourselves conspicuous; but that we labor to shine for Him, that His way may be known upon earth, His saving health among all people.

THE ANONYMOUS STAR.

Brother, it is well for us to forget ourselves in our message, to sink ourselves in our Master. We know the names of several of the stars, yet they may each one envy that star which remains anonymous, but can never be forgotten because men who sought the King of Israel knew it as "His star." God will not lead men to Christ by us unless we are Christ's heartily, wholly, unreservedly. In His temple our Lord uses no borrowed vessels; every bowl before the altar must be His own. It is not consistent with the glory of God for Him to use borrowed vessels. He is not so poor as that comes to. This lesson is worthy of all acceptation. Are you in a hurry to preach, young man? Are you sure you are Christ's? You must be consecrated and concentrated if you hope to be used of the Lord. If you have one ray, or ten thousand rays, all must shine with the one design of guiding men to Jesus.

Note next that true star-preaching leads to Christ. The star was Christ's star itself, but it also led others to Christ. It did this very much because in that direction. It is a sad thing when a preacher is like a sign-post pointing the way but never following it on his own account. Such were those chief priests at Jerusalem; they could tell where Christ was born, but they never went to worship Him; they were indifferent altogether to Him and to His birth. The star in the east led wise men to Christ because it went that way itself; there is a wisdom in example which truly wise men are quick to perceive.

The star did not draw, "as it were with a cart rope," nor by any force, material and physical; yet it drew these wise men from the remote east right to the manger of the new-born child. And so, though we have no arm of the law to help us, nor patronage, nor pomp of eloquence, nor parade of learning, yet we have a spiritual power by which we draw to Jesus thousands who are our joy and crown. It is a small thing to shine, but it is a great thing to draw. Any cast-away may be brilliant; but only the real saint will be attractive for Jesus. I would not pray to be an orator, but I do pray to be a soul-winner. Do not aim, beloved brethren, at anything short of leading men to Jesus.

Once more, the star which God used in this case was a star that stopped at Jesus; it went before the wise men till it brought them to Jesus, and then it stood still over the place where the young child was. I admire the manner of this star. There are remarkable at the present time; they have led men to Jesus, so they say, and now they lead them into regions beyond, of yet undeveloped thought. The Gospel of the Puritans is "old-fashioned"; these men have discovered that it is unsuitable for the enlarged intellects of the times; and so these stars would guide us further still. To this order of wandering stars I do not belong myself, and I trust I never shall. Progress beyond the Gospel I have no desire for. "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ."

When the star had come to the place where the young child was, it stood still; and so should the gracious mind become settled, fixed, immovable. Oh, you that have hitherto been diligent in leading souls to Christ, never indulge for a single moment the notion that you need a broader philosophy or a deeper spirituality than are to be found in Jesus. Abide in Him. Cry, "Oh, God, my heart is fixed. My heart is fixed." All that is beyond truth is a lie; anything beyond revelation is at best a minor matter, and most probably is an old wives' fable, even though he may be of the masculine gender who invented it. Stand you to your colors you who hope to be used of the Lord. Abide so that men shall find you in twenty years' time shining for Jesus and pointing to the place where the Saviour is to be found, even as you are doing now. Let Jesus Christ be your ultimatum. Your work is done when you bring souls to Jesus, and help to keep them there, by being yourself "steadfast, unmovable." Be not carried away from the hope of your calling; but hold fast even the form of sound words, for it may be that in letting go the form you may lose the substance also.

II. Now that we have somewhat rejoiced in the light of the star, let us see if we can gather

WISDOM FROM THE WISE MEN.

Perhaps you have heard the "much speaking" of tradition as to who they were, whence they came, and how they travelled. In the Greek church, I believe, they know their number, their names, the character of their retinue, and what kind of ornaments were on their dromedaries' necks. Details which are not found in the Word of God you may believe or not, at your pleasure, and you will be wise if your pleasure is not to believe too much. We only know that they were Magi, wise men from the East, possibly of the old Parsee religion—watchers if not worshippers of the stars. We will not speculate about them, but learn from them.

They did not content themselves with admiring the star and comparing it with other stars, and taking notes as to the exact date of its appearance, and how many times it twinkled, and when it moved, and all that; but they practically used the teaching of the star. Many are hearers and admirers of God's servants, but they are not wise enough to make fit and proper use of the preaching. They notice the peculiarity of the preacher's language, how much He is like one divine, how much he is unlike another; whether he coughs too often, or speaks too much in his throat; whether he is too loud or too low; whether he has not a provincial tone, whether there may not be about him a commonness of speech approaching to vulgarity; or, on the other hand, whether he may not be too florid in his diction.

Such fooleries as these are the constant observations of men for whose souls we labor. They are perishing, and yet toying with such small matters. With many it is all they go to the house of God for; to criticise in this paltry fashion. I have even seen them come to this place with opera glasses, as if they came hither to inspect an actor who lived and labored to amuse their leisure hours. Such is the sport of fools; but these were wise men, and therefore practical men. They did not become star-gazers, and stop at the point of admiring the remarkable star; but they said, "Where is He that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen His star in the east, and are come to worship Him." They set out at once to find the new-born King, of whose coming the star was the signal. Oh, my dear hearers, how I wish that you were all wise in this same manner!

Being wise men,

in their search after Him. We cannot tell how far they journeyed. Travelling was extremely difficult in those times. There were hostile tribes to avoid, the broad rivers of the Tigris and the Euphrates to cross, and trackless deserts to penetrate; but they made nothing of difficulty or danger. They set out for Jerusalem, and to Jerusalem they came, seeking the King of the Jews. Were the Christ in the bowels of the earth, or in the heights of heaven we ought not to rest till we come at Him. Everything that was necessary for their expedition the wise men soon gathered together, regardless of expense; and off they went following the star that they might discover the Prince of the kings of the earth.

At length they came to Jerusalem, and here new trials awaited them. It must have been a great trouble to them when they asked, "Where is He that is born King of the Jews?" and the people shook their heads as if they thought the question an idle one. Neither rich nor poor in the metropolitan city knew anything of Israel's King. The ribald multitude replied, "Herod is king of the Jews. Mind how you speak of another king, or your head may have to answer for it. The tyrant brooks no rival." The wise men must have been more astonished still when they found that Herod was troubled. Thus there was a ferment in Jerusalem, beginning at the palace; but this did not deter the wise men from their search for the promised Prince. They did not pack up their bales and go back and say, "It is useless to try to discover this questionable personage who is unknown even in the country of which He is King, and who appears to be terribly unwelcome to those who are to be His subjects. We must leave to another day the solution of the question: 'Where is He that is born King of the Jews?'"

These earnest-minded seekers were

and the learned men when they came together. To the chief priests and scribes the question was put, and they answered the inquiry as to where Christ would be born, but not a mother's son among them would go with the wise men to find this new-born King. Strange apathy! Alas, how common! Those who should have been leaders were no leaders; they would not even be followers of that which is good, for they had no heart toward Christ. The wise men rose superior to this serious discouragement. If the clergy would not help them they would go to Jesus by themselves. The first Christians had to leave all the authorized teachers of the day behind, and to come out by themselves; it will be no strange thing if you should have to do the same. Happy will it be if you are determined to go through floods and flames to find Christ; for He will be found of you. Thus these men were wise because, having started on the search, they persevered in.

Notice that they were wise because, when they again saw the star, "they rejoiced with exceeding great joy." While inquiring among the priests at Jerusalem they were perplexed, but when the star shone out again, they were at ease and full of joy; this joy they expressed, so that the evangelist recorded it. In these days very wise people think it necessary to repress all emotion, and appear like men of stone or ice. No matter what happens, they are stoical, and raised far above the enthusiasm of the vulgar. These wise men, with all their mystic learning, were not ashamed to rejoice because a little star lent them its beams to conduct them to Jesus. We unite with them in rejoicing over a clear Gospel ministry. For us all else is darkness, sorrow, and vexation of spirit; but that which leads us to our own glorious Lord is spirit, and light, and life. Better the sun should not shine than that a clear Gospel should not be preached. We reckon that a country flourishes or decays according as Gospel light is revealed or withdrawn.

Now follow these wise men a little further. They have come to the house where the young child is. What will they do? Will they stand looking at the star? No; they enter in. Oh, friends! how wise you will be if, when you have been led to Christ by any man, you do not rest in his leadership, but must see Christ for yourselves. How much I long that you may enter into the fellowship of the mystery, pass through the door, and come and behold the young child, and bow before him. Our woe is that so many are so unwise. We are only their guides, but they are apt to make us their end. We point the way, but they do not follow the road; they stand gazing upon us. The star is gone; it did its work, and passed away: Jesus remains, and the wise men live in Him. Will any of you be so foolish as to think only of the dying preacher, and forget the ever-living Saviour? Come, be wise, and hasten to your Lord at once.

These men were wise, last of all—and I commend their example to you—because when they saw the child

THEY WORSHIPPED.

Theirs was not curiosity gratified, but devotion exercised. We, too, must worship the Saviour, or we shall never be saved by Him. He has not come to put away our sins, and yet to leave us ungodly and self-willed. Oh, you that have never worshipped the Christ of God, may you be led to do so at once!

III. And now I turn to my third and last point, which is this:

LET US ACT AS WISE MEN

under the light of our star. We too have received light to lead us to the Saviour: I might say that for us many stars have shone to that blessed end. I will, however, on this point content myself with asking questions.

Do you not think that there is some light for you in your particular vocation, some call from God in your calling? Listen to me, and then listen to God. These men were watchers of the stars; therefore a star was used to call them. Certain other men soon after were fishermen, and by means of an amazing take of fish the Lord Jesus made them aware of His superior power, and then He called them to become fishers of men. For a star-gazer a star; for a fisherman a fish. The Master-Fisher hath a bait for each one of His elect, and oftentimes He selects a point in their own calling to be the barb of the hook.

Were you busy yesterday at your counter? Did you hear no voice saying, "Buy the truth and sell it not"? When you closed the shop last night did you not bethink yourself that soon you must close it for the last time? Do you make bread? and do you never ask yourself, "Has my soul eaten the bread of heaven?" Are you a farmer? do you till the soil? Has God never spoken to you by those furrowed fields and these changing seasons, and made you wish that your heart might be tilled and sown?

It did seem that a star was an unlikely thing to head a procession of eastern sages, and yet it was the best guide that could be found; and so it may seem that your trade is an unlikely thing to bring you to Jesus, and yet the Lord may so use it. There may be a message from the Lord to thee in many a left-handed providence; a voice for wisdom may come to thee from the mouth of an ass; a call to a holy life may startle thee from a bush, a warning may flash upon thee from a wall, or a vision may impress thee in the silence of night when deep sleep falleth upon men. Only be thou ready to hear and God will find a way of speaking to thee. Answer the question as the wise men would have answered it, and say, "Yes, in our calling there is a call to Christ."

Then, again, what should you and I do better in this life than seek after Christ! The wise men thought all compared with this. "Who is going to attend to that observatory and watch the rest of the stars?" They shake their heads, and say they do not know; these things must wait; they have seen His star, and they are going to worship Him. But who will attend to their wives and families, and all beside, while they make this long journey? They reply that every lesser thing must be subordinate to the highest thing. Matters must be taken in proportion, and the search after the King of the Jews, who is the desire of all nations, is so out of all proportion great that all the rest must go. Are not you, also, wise enough to judge in this sensible fashion? There is not a step between you and everlasting destruction from the presence of God if you are as yet unregenerate; and your only hope is to find the Saviour, trust the Saviour, obey the Saviour. Wherefore, like these wise men, put everything on one side, and set out now upon an earnest, resolute, persevering endeavor to find Jesus. I was about to say—resolve to find Jesus, or to die; but I will change the words, and say—resolve to find Him, and live.

When we do come near to Jesus, let us ask ourselves this question, "Do we see more in Jesus than other people do?" for if we do, we are God's elect, taught of God, illuminated by His Spirit. We read in the Scriptures that when these wise men saw the young child they fell down and worshipped Him. Other people might have come in and seen the child, and said, "Many children are as interesting as this poor woman's babe." Ay, but as these men looked, they saw: all eyes are not so blessed. Have you discovered such glory in Christ? "Oh," says one, "you are always harping upon Christ and His glory. You are a man of one idea!" Precisely so. My one idea is that He is "altogether lovely," and that there is nothing out of heaven nor in heaven that can be compared with Him even in His lowest and weakest estate. Have you ever seen as much as that in Jesus? If so, you are the Lord's; go you, and rejoice in Him. If not, pray God to open your eyes until, like the wise men, you see and worship.

Lastly, learn from these wise men that when they worshipped they did not permit it to be a mere

EMPTY-HANDED ADORATION.

Ask yourself, "What shall I render unto the Lord?" Bowing before the young child, they offered "gold, frankincense and myrrh," the best of metals and the best of spices; an offering to the King of gold; an offering to the priest of frankincense; an offering to the child of myrrh. Wise men are liberal men. Brothers, you will never get into the heart of happiness till you become unselfish and generous; you have but chewed the husks of religion which are often bitter, you have never eaten of the sweet kernel until you have felt the love of God constraining you to make sacrifice. There is nothing in the true believer's power which he would not do for his Lord; nothing in our substance which we would not give to Him, nothing in ourselves which we would not devote to His service.

God give to you all grace to come to Jesus, even though it be by the starlight of this sermon, for His love's sake! Amen.

PRAYING TO THE GOD OF THE KITCHEN.

THE illustration on the next page represents one of the many mummeries which characterize the religion of the Chinese. It is a species of incantation by which the Deity, supposed to control the domestic affairs of the home, is propitiated. A repast is placed before a slip of paper which represents the kitchen god, and while the candles are lighted the ignorant and superstitious devotee mutters prayers and praises.

Paul wept over the condition of those whose god was their belly, whose glory was their shame, and who minded earthly things. What we are thus told of the feelings of the great apostle may well arouse within us solicitude over the debasing idolatry of the teeming millions of China if we are living in the spirit of his Master and ours. We cannot think of such spectacles as that depicted in our illustration without deep thankfulness that various sections of the Church have been led to send out missionaries of the Cross to that benighted land, while the self-denying band of men and women, who are laboring there under the auspices of the China Inland Mission, are enjoying the blessing of God on their work. So long as scenes such as that depicted may be witnessed in any part of the world, the Christian who has inherited the commission given by the Master at the moment of His leaving the world: "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature," must feel that he has a work still to do. It may be that he cannot go forth as a missionary, but he can render aid to those who are so engaged. Such aid, the aid of money, is sorely needed and the missionary societies of all branches of the Christian Church will gladly accept it to enable them to extend their operations into lands yet unvisited, where the people sit in spiritual darkness.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond, the Evangelist, whose labors among children have been so signally blessed of God, has begun a series of services in the Warren Avenue Baptist Church, Boston, Mass., and much good is being done. It is expected that he will commence a series of special services in Dr. Talmage's church in March or April next.

The Late Rev. Titus M. Coan, D.D.

Savage Brutality in Hawaii.

THE LATE REV. TITUS M. COAN, D.D.

IN 1873 Mr. Charles Nordhoff visited the Sandwich Islands, and thus writes of the famous missionary whose portrait appears on this page: "And in Hilo, when you go to visit the volcano, you will find Dr. Coan, the story of whose life in the remote island, whose apostle he was, is as wonderful and as touching as that of any of the earlier apostles, and shows what great works unyielding faith and love can do in redeeming a savage people.

"When Dr. and Mrs. Coan came to the Island of Hawaii, its shores and woods were populous, and through their labors thousands of men and women were instructed in the truths of Christianity, inducted into civilized habits of life, and finally brought into the church.

"As you sail along the green coast of Hawaii from its northern point to Hilo, you will be surprised at the number of quaint little white churches which mark the distances almost with the regularity of mile-stones; if, later, you ride through this district or the one south of Hilo, you will see native children reading and writing as well as our own at home, and you may hear them singing tunes familiar in our own Sunday-schools. And you must remember that when, less than forty years ago, Dr. and Mrs. Coan came to Hilo, the people were naked savages, with no church and but one school-house in the district, without printed books or the knowledge of reading. They flocked to hear the Gospel. Thousands removed from a distance to Hilo, where, in their rapid way, they built up a large town, and kept up surely the strongest protracted meeting ever held; and going back to their homes after many months, they took with them knowledge and zeal to build up Christian churches and schools of their own. Over these Dr. Coan has presided these many years, not only preaching regularly on Sundays and during the week in the large native church at Hilo, and in two or three neighboring churches, but visiting the more distant churches at intervals, to examine and instruct the members, and keep them all on the right track.

"He has seen a region very populous when he first came to it decrease, until it has now many more deserted and ruined house-places than inhabited dwellings; but also he has seen a great population turned from darkness to light, a great part of it following his own blameless and loving life as an example, and very many living to old age steadfast and zealous Christians."

Dr. Coan commenced his life work in the Sandwich Islands in 1835. From that year until his death in December 1882, he consecrated all his time and all his energies to the evangelization of Hawaii. He was thirty-four years of age when he settled down at Hilo, having been born at Killingworth, Conn., in 1801. From the date of his conversion in 1828, he had cherished the hope of becoming a missionary of the Gospel and had been enabled to do some good service in Patagonia. When, however, he visited Hawaii in 1834, he was moved to choose that as his field of labor. He received his commission at the end of that year, and immediately afterward commenced work. From that time until 1870—thirty-five years—he never once revisited his native land.

Dr. Coan's first proceeding on settling in Hawaii was to make a tour of the island, which he accomplished on foot. He thus gained a full and accurate knowledge of his sphere of labor, and selected Hilo as the most suitable place for a centre of Christian influence. A rich blessing followed Dr. Coan's first years of labor. In 1837 there was such an awakening in Hawaii as sent a thrill of astonishment throughout the Christian church. The natives thronged to hear Dr. Coan's preaching, and 1705 made a public profession of faith. During that year Dr. Coan organized a church and received into it 5244 members, all of whom were baptized on declaring their faith in the Saviour. In all, during the long period of his ministry, Dr. Coan personally received into the church over twelve thousand converts.

IN ONE DAY

The church at Hilo soon became a mother church, and the island was dotted over with branches, over which Dr. Coan presided as a kind of bishop, giving to each a general superintendence. Their ministers were in some cases native evangelists who owed their own enlightenment to the blessing of God on Dr. Coan's preaching; and in other cases they were Americans whom he had trained for the work. His indefatigable energy, ready tact and unfaltering faith in the ultimate success of the work God had committed to his hands, sustained him in the face of trial and many discouragements, and enabled him to maintain the fight until octogenarian snows sat on his head.

The discouragements were neither few nor small. The converts of 1837 were comparatively uneducated. At heart they were savages, and the exuberance of their joy, in the early days of their conversion, led them first into excesses and afterward into indifference. The condition of the church in 1840 would have broken the heart of any man whose faith in God was less firm and vigorous than that of Dr. Coan. He saw that education must have an important place in a work that should have permanent success, and he at once commenced that work with pati t spirit. The children and the young men and women were Dr. Coan's hope, and to them he gave his time and his best efforts, and experience has proved the wisdom of his plan and the ability of its execution.

One of the Christian workers at Hilo, writing of this branch of the work says: "There is to-day a group of Hawaiian young men, members of Father Coan's old church, and banded together as a Christian Association, whose exterior morality and interior piety, judged by even an Anglo-Saxon standard, would rightfully give them a place beside any similar group in the United States."

Forty-nine years did Dr. Coan labor in this work, and it was only when smitten with paralysis that he perforce relaxed his efforts. Then followed seventy-six days of patient sufferng, at the close of which he peacefully closed his eyes in death, and went to receive the reward of the Master he had served so long and so faithfully.

God permitted him to live long enough to see of the fruits of his labor. When he landed in Hawaii spectacles of savage brutality, such as that depicted in the illustration on the right of his portrait, were of constant occurrence; but when he died he knew that not only had thousands of the natives become Christians, but a public feeling had extended throughout the island rendering such scenes repugnant and, in fact, impossible in the light Christianity has shed over the land.

The Christian worker, previously quoted, thus summarizes Dr. Coan's life work: "Father Coan did many things and did them well. A Christian missionary—as witness his work in Hawaii taken as a whole: a missionary explorer and pioneer—as witness his wonderful sojourn in Patagonia, his foot-tours around Hawaii, and voyages to the Marquesas; an observer of natural phenomena—as witness his perilous inspections of the eruptions of Maunaloa; a revivalist—as witness the great Hawaiian awakening, wherein his influence and words were so potent under God; an organizer—as witness the admirable system of religious instrumentations for long years in operation throughout the one hundred square miles of his Hawaiian parish or diocese; and lastly, a man and a Christian—as witness the genuine grief with which the secular public, of Hawaii, mourns his loss, and the unalloyed gladness with which the Christian public beholds the singular completeness of his career, and the general Christ-likeness of his character."

TWO SCENES IN ONE NIGHT.

(See Illustration.)

WIDOW ANNISON had finished her day's work. She could not reproach herself with any neglected duty. Her cooking at the great house was over for that day; her own two poor rooms had been put in scrupulous order since her return; everything was in its place and the widow, who was not easily satisfied either with herself or others, decided that she might retire to rest. Before she did so, however, she took down her Bible to read, as she had done every night for thirty years, a chapter from its sacred contents. She had no need for spectacles yet "thank goodness," she was wont to remark, and it was only at night and when she was very tired that reading was difficult. She moved the candle so that its light might fall on the page, and then she could read well enough.

Chapter after chapter she read for more than an hour, for her spirit was strangely perturbed; the words which have comforted the troubled through the centuries soothed her. At length, closing the book she knelt down and prayed very earnestly—not for herself, but for her son—her only boy then far away in the mining camps of the West. Her prayer was not for his success in the object with which he went away. He had left her two years ago full of hope of returning with a large fortune, and she often wondered how he was getting on But that night her prayer was as it had been many a time that Harry might find a richer blessing, that he might be led to seek and find the Pearl of greatprice. She wrestled long and earnestly for that blessing, and at last not knowing why she was impelled to pray so persistently that night, she rose from her knees and retired to rest.

In the Widow's Home.

It was nearly a year afterward before she heard of her son. Could her gaze have penetrated the distance that night as she knelt at prayer and have looked into the hut where her son lay, this is the scene she would have witnessed:

On a rough bed which friendly hands had made as comfortable as the rescources of the camp would permit, her boy lay tossing in a fever. A miner in rough clothes, but whose face sunburnt as it was, showed that a kind heart as well as an intelligent mind were within, sat by his side. He gently replaced the rough blanket that the sufferer had cast off, and spoke to him tenderly and soothingly. Harry's mind was wandering; he thought it was his mother.

"Mother, you won't forget. You won't forget, I say. I told you I would come back, and so I will."

"Where does your mother live, Harry? Shall I tell her you are ill?"

The question got no answer. The parched lips were rapidly moving. Jack Freeman stooped to catch the words: "I must go—must go home."

The young man by the bedside turned away to wipe his eyes, then raised the fever-stricken head that it might rest more easily. It seemed to revive him. He began to sing—his clear boyish tones sounding weird in that wild solitude—"Home, Sweet Home."

He could not get through with it, and thinking to please him, Jack took it up and finished it. Harry lay quite still, his blue eyes fixed upon the open door, then the eyelids dropped, and he fell into a troubled, restless doze, broken now and then by mutterings and moanings about going home, pitiful to hear.

With the cool of early dawn, consciousness returned, and Harry awoke to find himself still tended by his friend. "Jack," he said faintly, "am I dying? I dreamed last night that my mother was here, and that she read to me out of her old Bible and prayed for me. Jack, I wish you would read a bit to me. There's a Bible in my knapsack, my mother put it there, I have not read it much but I have not lost it."

His friend found the book and said, "What shall I read?"

"Prodigal! I am a prodigal," he gasped, and Jack who had been to Sunday-school when a boy found the place and read: "A certain man had two sons."

The familiar words seemed to stir the fading memory and quicken it into life. "And when he came to himself," went on Jack softly. "That's me," muttered his hearer, the tears oozing from beneath the closed lids. "He said, I will arise and go to my father."

The blue eyes opened and looked at Jack earnestly. "I want to see my mother," he said.

"Perhaps you will meet her in heaven."

"She'll go to heaven! She's all right. I'd like to be all right, too." The last few utterances were scarcely audible.

Jack brought his lips near to the ear of the dying youth and said distinctly, "When he was yet a great way off his father saw him and had compassion, and ran and fell on his neck and kissed him."

The pale lips began to move again. Jack could catch a few words: "I—will—arise—and—and—go—" a pause; then: "I have sinned—sinned."

The words had scarcely been spoken when he sprang up suddenly, and looking round as if he could see some one, shouted, "Mother! I will come. I will! I will!"

"Lie down," said Jack, "lie down," but he spoke to a deserted dwelling. Harry was gone.

A LADY'S ASTONISHMENT.

THE Gospel Temperance work in Cooper Union and the Annex Hall, New York, still continues growing in influence and blessing, and Mr. Sawyer is encouraged by many cases of rescue from ruin.

Of the class of people reached by his efforts, it is impossible to give an idea better than by relating an incident which occurred a few months ago, and which shows how the rich and the poor may some times be taught side by side at the feet of Jesus. After the congregation had been dismissed, a poor forlorn man remained weeping upon one of the seats just in front of the orchestra. Mr. Sawyer spoke kindly and earnestly to him, and passed on to another. The poor man remained evidently in deep anguish of mind. Just as Mr. Sawyer was about leaving the place, a lady whose dress and carriage bore unmistakable evidence of wealth and culture, accosted him. She said: "Oh, Mr. Sawyer, do please speak to that poor man; he is sobbing piteously." "I have done so, Madam," was the prompt reply. "I know it; but please speak to him again. I am sure you can comfort him." "I cannot, Madam." "Cannot? how is that? Don't you believe him to be in earnest?" "In dead earnest, Madam." "Then why, Mr. Sawyer—do tell me—why can't you speak to him?"

Mr. Sawyer then solemnly said: "That man is sick and hungry, and naked and friendless. The Thanksgiving week has exhausted my ability to assist him, so many drafts have been made upon me by those who have looked to me for aid; to approach himas Christ would have us do, one must go with food and shelter and raiment." Then casting a keen glance at the lady, he continued, "Madam, you are just the person to speak to him. You go."

An indescribable expression came over her features. "Me!" she exclaimed, and she gathered her garments about her, as if in fear of contamination. "Yes, madam," said Mr. Sawyer softly, "and let me tell you what the good man who stooped to rescue me, once said, addressing a company of ladies: 'It will no more harm the most delicate and cultivated of you, to go down among the fallen and the degraded on errands of mercy, than it soils the beautiful sun-ray which steals in to brighten the dark places of the earth.' My dear Madam, do you go."

DIED IN HARNESS.

A TRUE STORY OF IRISH LIFE.

By Miss M. M. Ross.

The Doctor's Visit.

IT was a delicious evening in July, the sun's fierce rays had gradually softened down, leaving the heavens resplendent with their golden glory. A light breeze springing up swept before it all remains of the sultry heat, and its balmy breath moving gently through the surrounding bushes, rustled a soft accompaniment to the robin's evening song.

On a mud ditch, near a small cabin, in the West of Ireland, stood a young woman apparently about five-and-twenty years of age. Her dress, though of the meanest materials, fitted well to the lithe figure; her feet, without shoes or stockings, were beautifully moulded, and her face, though bronzed by exposure to the weather, bore traces of great beauty.

At what is she gazing so intently? as, shading her eyes with her hand, she anxiously scans the distance. Is it at the glorious sunset, or the train of turf-cutters who are slowly toiling homeward? No; for having acknowledged their "God save ye kindly, ma'am," with a cheerful "Good evenin' te ye, an' God bless the work," she still continues to look in another direction, until at last, wearied, she descends from her post of observation.

Let us follow as she goes toward her home.

Her home—a mud cabin on the edge of a bog; the roof thatched with rushes, a hole at one side intended for the liberation of the smoke, but which generally chose to escape by the door, when left open to admit light to the miserable habitation.

The woman entered, disturbing as she did so the slumbers of a huge pig, which had ensconced himself across the threshold during her absence.

The interior of the cabin presented even a more miserable appearance. Furniture it had none, save an old dresser, ornamented with a few cracked plates and jugs, relics of former glory; two or three stools, some of them having lost more than one leg in rough service.

Seated on the only one which did not require great manœuvring, to prevent one turning a somersault occasionally, was a man in the prime of life, wrapped in the remains of an old blanket, and cowering over the smouldering embers of a turf fire, shivering as if from cold.

Beside him on the hob was placed a mug, from which occasionally he eagerly drank.

"Dan, darlint, what's the matther wid ye at all, at all?" said his wife, throwing her arms affectionately round him. "Yer shiverin' an' shakin', an' it's a July evenin'. I dunno what'll be done av the docthur doesn't cum afore night. I'm standin' beyant this half-hour an' more, watchin' down the crass-roads, an' I taught, mebbe, Mickey might have cum in te be in readiness te run av a message."

"The sorra a hurry the docthur'll be in te cum here," said her mother-in-law gruffly, who occupied the other side of the fireplace, and was engaged in the twofold occupation of smoking and rocking a cradle, in which lay fast asleep a lovely babe, scarcely a year old.

"The sorra a hurry the docthur'll be in te cum here, Biddy, never fear. He's houses enough to go te where he gets his gould guineas fur walkin' in an' out, musha. Mebbe, a blast av the pipe'd do you good, allanna," said she, refilling the one she had just used, and handing it to the patient ready lighted. "Take a blast, honey; sure, they say tebaccy an' spirits is able to dhrive away anything." The sick man turned from it with disgust.

"Oh, dear! oh, dear!" said his mother, swaying herself to and fro, groaning; "but he must be bad intirely whin he refuses the pipe. I niver knew him te do the like afore. Oh! honey jewel, rouse yersilf, an' spake te us."

"Whisht, mother," said her daughter-in-law, looking out on hearing the brisk trot of a horse. "Throw down that ould pipe, an' run yer apron over that stool. Here's the docthur, an' Mickey gallivantin' afther the horse's tail, niver fear."

"Good mornin', yer honor," said both women, dropping a courtesy as Dr. O'Neverdon entered. "We wor afeard ye couldn't cum te-night, so we wor. We're glad you've cum, docthur."

"Why did you not send for me earlier?" replied the doctor. "I passed quite near this two hours ago, and had just gone home to get some dinner when your message arrived."

"What's the matter, my poor man?" said he, advancing to the patient, and laying his hand kindly on his shoulder.

"Nothin'," said the man, stupidly, trying to rise as he spoke.

"Don't stir, like a good fellow. Your name is Daniel Carroll, I believe?"

"Yis, sur."

"Well now, Dan, I want one of your wrists for a minute." Dan gave his right hand.

"Give me the other; you have been leaning on that."

Watch in hand, Dr. O'Neverdon carefully counted each beat of the pulse; and Mrs. Carroll, junior, who scanned his countenance closely, saw it gradually assume a very serious expression, as he put question after question relative to her husband's symptoms.

"Have you any headache?" inquired the doctor of the man.

"No, sur," was his reply, mechanically made.

"None at all? You must have had with that tongue. You ought to know," said Dr. O'Neverdon, turning to the younger Mrs. Carroll.

"He had, very bad, sur; but we sent fur the priest, an' he did him more good than anything."

"What did he give him?"

"Nothin' at all, yer honor; only laid a relic on him," said the young woman, courtesying.

"It is a pity you did not send for him again," said the doctor.

"So we did, sur," was the artless reply; an' his riverence tould us te sind fur you."

"Indeed, that was very kind of him. I wish he had told you that at first. You ought to be in bed, my man; you are not fit to be up. You are very ill indeed."

Carroll gave a sickly smile as he glanced at the bundle of straw in one corner of the cabin, scarcely concealed by the tattered quilt; and then, returning the doctor's pitying gaze, said:

"I do lie down sometimes, sur; but I'm more comfortable like sittin' here."

"It is impossible you can lie there; you must go to hospital, where you will have all the necessaries your case requires, and be well taken care of besides. You will never get well here."

At the word "hospital," both the women clasped their hands in horror.

"Oh, docthur jewel!" exclaimed the younger, tears streaming from her eyes, "sure ye won't sind him te 'ospittle. Wouldn't I go on me bended knees te do anything that was necessary fur him; but, sur, it wud break me heart intirely av he's taken from me."

"Not wun av me family ever died in an 'ospittle," burst in his mother, fiercely, "an' it'ud be a queer thing av we wer to begin now."

"There is no reason why he should die if he goes to hospital," said the doctor, calmly, accustomed as he was to combat the scruples of the poor on this point. "But there is every reason why he should die if he remains in this place."

"Oh! docthur, I would not have him lave me," sobbed his wife. "Oh! sur, ye wouldn't have him die, an' not a friend near to close his eyes; it ud bread his heart, wouldn't it, Dan, darlint?" And she passionately covered his hand with kisses.

"I cannot force you to send him, my good woman, but I can tell you he has got fever of the most malignant type, and what will become of you and your baby shut up in this place, heaven only can foretell."

"Mebbe I'd better go," said the patient, roused by the voices of the women. "I think a great dale about the wife and little child, docthur."

"Dan," said his mother, coming close to him, her arms akimbo, and her eyes flashing with fire, "is the sickness taking the spirit out av ye? Hear what I'm sayin', that as long as I'm here te prevent it, an' it's well fur ye I am, ye'll niver be taken te an 'ospittle. De ye want te lower yersilf te the grade av a pauper?"

"I've neeyther father, mother, sisther, nor brother," sobbed Biddy, "only yerself and that weeshy little craythur, and ye want te go from me!"

"Lave me, Biddy, honey; lave me, allanna," said her husband, "an' take the child wid ye; I'll go where the docthur says; don't cry, Biddy, don't cry!"

"Lave ye, is it?" said his wife, throwing herself on her knees before him; "ay, I'll lave ye whin the sight laves the eyes that always looked te ye in throuble fur comfort. Lave ye whin the hearin' laves the ears that always listened te the words that fell like the murmurin' av the bruk beyant. Lave ye——"

"You are doing your husband, unwittingly, a great deal of harm," interrupted the doctor, catching her arm, "I am very sorry I cannot persuade you to do what is right. As you will persist in keeping your husband, we must do the best we can for him. Come to my house to-morrow; perhaps Mrs. O'Neverdon can make out a bed for you, at least we can give you a fresh bundle of straw. Have you any one that can go of a message?"

"Yes, sur, Mickey. Where is he, the scamp? Come out of that! What's that yer doin'?" as the boy, kneeling beside the sick man, peered silently into his face.

"Oh! murther, murther, what's that yer at?" said Dan's wife, dragging him roughly by the arm.

"Mickey wants te see the faver," said the boy in a whining tone, "an' I can see nothin', only Dan shuts his eyes an' won't spake te me."

"He's a poor innocent, the craythur," said Biddy, apologetically, "an' he's so fond of Dan an' the child that he is most always wid us; we niver miss the bit he ates."

"What will you do with your child? It is impossible you can mind it. You will have more than you can do to take care of your husband; and as you are determined to run the risk of infection yurself, save the child, at all events."

The doctor was mounting his horse as he spoke, and a few of the neighbors, anxious to know the result of his visit, pressed eagerly round, plying him with such questions as, "What's the matthur wid Dan, docthur?" "How long will he be sick?"

Is there no one among all your acquaintance, who seem so anxious about your husband's recovery, that will take charge of your child during his illness, and leave you free to devote yourself to him?" The doctor glanced round as he spoke. "Dan has got fever," continued he.

But those who had been the most eager in their inquiries shrank back, as if from a cannon's mouth, at the dreaded word "fever," all except one woman, distinguished from the rest by her fine bearing and tidy appearance, who coming close to the weeping Biddy, and laying her hand kindly on her shoulder, said:

"Don't cry, allanna, don't cry, I'll take yer child and mind it as carefully as if it was my own."

It was Mickey's mother who spoke. "I know Mickey has been in wid ye; fur ye didn't know it was the faver, or ye would have kep' him out, but there's a great God that watches over the poor innocent as well as them that has their sinsis, an' He'll take care av him, the craythur."

"She's a Prodestan," shouted the women, "are ye goin' te give yer child into the care av a heretic, Biddy?"

"Whisht," said her mother-in-law, "all of yee's sure the infant can't spake, an' what harm can she do? and, Prodestan or not, not wun av yee's offered te de the likes, an' she earnin' her bit as hard as any of us."

"God bless you, Nancy," said Dr. O'Neverdon, kindly, "good-by!"

Day after day brought Dr. O'Neverdon to the bedside of poor Daniel Carroll. A faithful follower of the Great Physician, his heart yearned over his poor fellow-countrymen, sunk in the heathen superstition and gross ignorance of popery; and often when called in to heal the body, did he endeavor also to pour in the "oil and wine," and apply the balm of the precious Gospel of Christ to the more diseased and imperilled soul.

No opportunity had as yet presented itself of speaking to poor Dan, who had remained almost in a state of unconsciousness from the day after his first visit; until one morning between three and four o'clock the doctor and his wife were aroused from their slumbers by a loud double knock. A moment and the doctor was out of bed and had thrown up the window to inquire, "What is the matter?"

"Dan Carroll is out and out bad, yur honor," was the response, "an' he's raving fur a sight av ye. His mother's run for the priest afore I cum."

"Wait; in a few minutes I will be with you," said the doctor, closing the window, and hastily dressing himself, he admitted the messenger, a tall, well-built "boy" of about forty or thereabouts. No one would say "he hadn't a rag to his back," for he was tattered from head to foot; his coat of a dark blue, adorned with a stray brass button or two, displayed in more places than one the color of his shirt beneath, and his corduroys well fringed round the instep, showed a pair of coarsely knit stockings surmounted by "brogues" fastened with apiece of twine. His hat was of straw, part of the broad rim torn from the crown hung dangling on his left shoulder, apparently not at all to the discomfort of the wearer.

"I will walk with you. It is not more than a mile," said the doctor, as he buttoned his overcoat. "My horse was out so late last night, I do not like riding him so soon again."

It was a lovely morning. The sun was just breaking through the gray clouds

"With new-born day to gladden mortal sight,
And gild the courts of Heaven with sacred light."

Their way lay chiefly through fields which sent up the perfume of newly-mown hay, mingled with that of the numerous wild flowers growing in the surrounding hedges, from whose dew-laden boughs the birds, awakened fresh from their night's repose, commenced their morning songs of praise.

A long lane led to Dan's cottage, down the centre of which ran a stream of water, winter and summer.

"Who is Carroll's landlord?" said the doctor to his companion, as he endeavored to pick his way without detriment to his boots; "surely he would do something for him if he was applied to; the place he lives in is enough to kill any one."

"An' sure he did do somethin' fur him, yer honor; he gev him that bit ov land. Dan's faathur had a purty little cottage there once upon a time. Some way or other he lost it. The prisint squire was only a chap at that time, an' mighty fond of fishin' an' shootin', an' the like. Dan, like many a young gossoon, was terrible fond av runnin' afthur him. The squire tuk a fancy to him, an' when he marrid he gev him that bit of land. This ould house was fur 'im, but poor Dan had a fire fur the gable end, an' mesef an' a few more boys helped him te knock up that cabin agin it. I'll be a biddin' ye a good mornin' now, yer honor. I won't go near the house. I have six little craythus av me own at home, God bless them, an' God help poor Mrs. Carroll. It's well for her now she was left but the wan."

THE PRINCE OF LIFE.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 4, Acts 3:12-26. Golden Text, John 1:4. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Peter's Disclaimer—Nothing to be Done Second-Hand — Healing Associated with Spiritual Blessing—The Essence of Healing Power—Its Double Application—The Way of Escape—What Repentance Is—The Coming Restitution—The Thread Through the Ages—The Education of the Bride—A Touching Appeal.

THE healing of the lame man caused a great excitement in Jerusalem. "As the lame man which was healed held Peter and John, all the people ran together unto them, in the porch that is called Solomon's, greatly wondering." Every eye was strained to see the well-known beggar, walking, and leaping, and praising God; curiosity and wonder were mingled with feelings of awe. Peter, who from the time of his calling to the apostleship, had learned from his Master the blessed connection between the work of Christ on the bodies and on the souls of men, when he saw the concourse of people said, "Ye men of Israel, why marvel ye at this? or why look ye so earnestly on us, as though by our own power or holiness we had made this man to walk?" Oh, how truly can such whom the Lord blesses to bring men in contact with Himself, for holiness of life and for bodily healing, echo these words of Peter's! Hundreds of people write to us at Bethshan, as though some power to heal were in us, although again and again we have solemnly disowned such power. What is the secret of this?

Many who are needing blessings from the Lord, find it more convenient to make use of the faith of another, than to exercise faith themselves. Oh, when will men learn that in dealing with God every man must transact his own business with God, must himself surrender himself, believe or he remains unblessed. But there are many who say, "You live nearer to God than I do, and so your prayers are more likely to be answered than mine." What then? are we heard in virtue of our own holiness and not in virtue of the name of Jesus? Oh, how such ideas as these deteriorate the conceptions of our relations with God!

Peter led the thoughts of the people up and away from himself to God, making use of the manifestation of His power to convict them of their sin. Only those who see the constant occurrence of healing by the power of God alone, can testify how blessedly it helps forward the work of conversion and sanctification in families, in meetings, and in localities. It is a proof to careless, indifferent men and women, that the living God is still among us, and it makes them remember that the same hand which is so mighty to save, is mighty also to execute judgment. In numerous instances, where one member of a family has been healed, contrary to all the pronounced opinion of clever, competent, and conscientious physicians, several members of the family have been also converted, sanctified, and healed. In several instances those so healed have themselves become evangelists, and they are spreading the good and glorious tidings of God's salvation around them.

Peter said, "The God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, the God of our fathers hath glorified His Son Jesus, whom ye delivered up, and denied Him in the presence of Pilate, when he was determined to let Him go. But ye denied the Holy One and the Just, and desired a murderer to be granted unto you; and killed the Prince of life, whom God hath raised from the dead; whereof we are witnesses." What was this? Could it be that the life power now working in the feet and ankle bones of the man so long lame, was actually communicated to him by that same Jesus whom they had crucified? Were they never to be rid of Jesus of Nazareth? Peter continued, "And His name, through faith in His name, hath made this man strong, whom ye see and know; yea, the faith which is by Him hath given him this perfect soundness in the presence of you all." Here is the essence of healing power; "His name

THROUGH FAITH IN HIS NAME."

On His part, the authority of His name, on the part of man, faith in that name. Paul tells us that "at (Gr. in) the name of Jesus every knee should bow of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth" (Phil. 2:10). "All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth, go ye, therefore, and teach all nations" (Matt. 28:18, 19), said our blessed Lord. And yet again, In My name . . . they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover (Mark 16:17, 18). In the name of Jesus, who Himself has taken our infirmities and borne our sicknesses, lies all the power to heal. If He should make use of any words of prayer spoken by one of His feeble children, the power lies not in the prayer, but in the name of Jesus which gives it authority; should He allow one or more of His feeble children to lay hands on the sick, and to anoint them with oil, still it is "the name of the Lord" in which it is done, relied on by the sick one chiefly, but also by those praying over him, which has power to rebuke the disease, and make it loose its hold. "Faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone" (James 3:17). If a sick person is relying upon those who pray for him, instead of listening to the Spirit of God who may lead him to act faith, to make efforts which he has never made since his illness came upon him, that very reliance on man will hinder his healing, because the stretching out of the withered hand, the arising and walking which would be a proof of his faith, is lacking.

Peter, having in the power of the Holy Ghost, convicted his hearers of their sin, did what every God-taught winner of souls does, he made plain the way of escape. Instead of heaping reproaches upon them, he said, thus speaking heart to heart with those who were made ashamed, "I wot that through ignorance ye did it as did also your rulers." Thus softening to them as much as possible the condemnation of their consciences. Then having shown them that God's purposes had nevertheless been fulfilled, he said, "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out." There was nothing for it but a complete surrender, no half measures would suffice. "Repent!" turn right round, i.e., be as much for Jesus as you have been against Him. Count that to be sin which was formerly your boast; this is repentance; the Episcopal Church Catechism has it, "Repentance, whereby we forsake sin."

"NOW, BRETHREN,"

There is no repentance so long as a man does not break definitely with sin. Sulking over sin, without a definite and final break, is sheer unreality; tears, sighs, moans, regrets, prayers over sin, are so much chaff, when sinners substitute them for a real parting from it. "Repent," this is God's voice; forsake sin, get right where you are wrong, and be converted, be changed; let God change you "That your sins may be blotted out when that (see Gr.) times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord, and He shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you." God makes His own plans, but instrumentally they are brought about by man, and in order that the full "times of refreshing" prophesied by Joel be fulfilled, there must be a fuller, truer repentance, and turning to God, than we have yet seen, the Lord hasten it! A prepared church will hasten the coming of Christ. The marriage of the Lamb can only take place when "His wife hath made herself ready" (Rev. 19:7), and "the times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord" are waiting for "the manifestation of the sons of God" (Rom. 8:19), i.e., the making ready of the Lamb's wife. Blessed be God in the midst of the confusion and defection which we see around us, there is a people, a "little flock," who are for God and souls, who rejoice to be living sacrifices for Christ, whose whole life speaks a nature contrary to that of other men, whose aspirations, whose tastes, whose tendencies, all take after Jesus.

Peter said that the heavens must receive Jesus "until the times of the restitution of all things." What this implies is as yet hidden from us all. It leads our thoughts and hopes to a final and complete annihilation of all which is evil, but how, or when, whether according to preconceptions of ours, no man has a right to judge; this is among the secret things which belong unto the Lord our God (Deut. 29:29). But of these times of restitution, "God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began." There is a thread running through the ages which our near sight cannot trace, but which gives the clue to God's working in view of His restitution of all things. Satan may seem to have great power, but in the end we shall see that he has involuntarily been fulfilling the purpose of God all the time. The evil which exists in the church and in individuals is always working together as a refining fire for those who know the secret of fellowship with God; it is carrying on of the Lamb, through whom other souls on earth are blessed, and thus God turns the curse into a blessing. And this is also His plan with regard to the dispensations; the evil is made to work together for good, and by-and-by the prepared Bride shall sit with Christ upon His throne and then will come the consummation.

Peter then alluded to the prophecy of the Lord Jesus through Moses, that a prophet should arise like unto him, and he laid strongly and solemnly upon his hearers that Him should they hear, or they should be destroyed from among the people; it was the old prophecy of Isaiah, "Hear and your soul shall live" (Isaiah 55:2). And then Peter made a touching, irresistible appeal to them, "Ye are the children of the prophets and of the covenant which God made with our fathers," as though to say, "Children of the prophets, children of the covenant, claim your rights," for God said to Abraham, "In thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed."

UNTO YOU FIRST,

God, having raised up His Son Jesus, sent Him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities. God's great blessing is to deliver and cleanse from sin, to separate between us and our sins, not only to rid us from the condemnation, but also from the power of sin, and from the presence of sin. Only the risen Jesus could do this. Having died Himself a sacrifice for sin, including us as part of Himself upon the cross, He, through death, destroyed "him that had the power of death, even the devil," and the power of the tempter gone, and we believing it is gone, we find in very deed he flies from us as we resist him.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Collision and Wreck of Another Ocean steamer is reported. A cable despatch received on Saturday last says: "The Hamburg-American line steamer Cimbria, which left Hamburg on the 17th inst. for New York, came into collision with the British steamer Sultan on Friday morning off Borkum and quickly sank. A boat which has arrived at Cuxhaven has landed thirty-nine persons. Six steamers have been sent out to search for the other boats of the Cimbria. The Cimbria was to have left Havre on Saturday for New York." The Cimbria had on board 385 passenger and a crew and officers numbering 110. The loss of life must have been appalling. The Cimbria, after being struck, heeled over on her side so that the boats only on one side the vessel could be lowered. The officers cut away the spars so that there might be as much driftwood as possible, but the plunge into the icy water must have killed many of the passengers before succor could reach them. The 39 persons landed at Cuxhaven and seventeen landed at the Weser lighthouse are, it is feared, all that have been saved of the 495 on board.

France has been Violently Agitated During the past week by a manifesto, issued on January 16th by Prince Napoleon, the cousin of the late Emperor. The manifesto appeared first in the columns of a newspaper, and in the course of the morning 100,000 copies, in the form of a poster, appeared on all the vacant walls of Paris. The document was couched in the usual Napoleonic style. In it Prince Napoleon reviews the situation of the Republic in the changed conditions resulting from the death of Gambetta, criticising the present policy of the government, and claiming the Napoleonic inheritance. The Prince dwells on the impotence and incapacity of the government, the disunion of Parliament, and the decadence of the army and of the finances. He declares that religion is attacked, and that the observance of the concordat can alone establish religious peace. The Prince rejects any compromises with Royalists. He also adverts to the plebiscites, by which the Empire was sanctioned. The Prince had few sympathizers even among Bonapartists, the majority of whom thought the publication of the manifesto ill-timed. The Prince was arrested by the government and sent to prison in the Concigerie, but was permitted to receive visits from his wife and son. A panic prevailed among the officials and members of the Chambers, one of whom immediately introduced a project of law prohibiting from the territory of France and her colonies all the members of the families that had reigned over France, and depriving them of their political rights. Public opinion in France is more disposed to treat Prince Napoleon's manifesto with ridicule than to advocate harsh measures against him, and the law proscribing the representatives of royal houses is regarded as an indication of weakness on the part of the government. The imprisoned Prince is the man in whom students of prophecy have thought they recognized characteristics which we have been taught to look for in the Antichrist of the last days.

Prince Krapotkine, the Russian Anarchist recently arrested in France, was tried at Lyons, and on Friday last was found guilty of inciting to anarchy and sentenced to five years' imprisonment and to pay a fine worth $400. The rest of the anarchists who were convicted—M. Emile Gautier, M. Bernard and M. Bordat, of the Lyons socialistic journal—received the same sentence. In addition the prisoners are subject to ten years' police supervision and to five years' deprivation of civil rights. Four of the accused were acquitted; the others were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment and to pay a proportionate fine.

Unusual Activity is Observed in the Ranks of the Royalists and the Radicals of France. These two sections are the extremes of French society. A general impression prevails that Gambetta was the soul of the Republic, and that his death involves the overthrow of the government. The practical issue of that conviction is to be in readiness for any emergency that may arise, and the adherents of each political party are organizing with that object. On January 19th, an American correspondent in Paris cabled: "Some of the Paris morning papers give details of the alleged organization of civil war in the west of France with the help of the Catholic workmen's clubs, and mention the discovery of a legitimist conspiracy called the "Catholic Alliance," forming a vast association which is directed by Baron de Charette. They declare that thirty-three legions have been formed in the west and centre. Several officers of the army are implicated in the conspiracy and depots of arms exist." It depends on the wisdom and prudence of M. Grèvy's administration whether the conflict between the section, is confined to politics or breaks out in civil war.

Important Revelations have been Made to the British Government by the men whose arrest in Dublin was mentioned last week, and who volunteered to become informers. They appear to have been members of an organized gang of murderers. Six of the twenty-one prisoners offered to confess. One of them named Farrell testified on January 20th. He acknowledged that he was a member of "the assassination committee" and had taken part in an abortive plot to kill Mr. Forster. He also stated that the committee received regular weekly payments from each member of the association for the purchase of revolvers, knives, etc. One of the prisoners is "a Fenian centre." The appearance of three of the men arraigned exactly corresponds with the description of the three murderers of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke. The police intend making five more arrests. Mullet, the alleged leader of the assassination committee, is a hunchback. The offer of the Government to afford special protection to informers has caused the detective department to be thronged with persons willing to give information.

A Speech the Marquis of Hartington Delivered on Friday last on the Irish question, does not afford much encouragement to the Irish agitators. He said the Irish problem could only be met by firm determination. He did not think the matter was hopeless, but he believed the law would have to be strengthened to meet the exceptional condition of the country. The government, he announced, meant to show that murder would meet its just reward. Home rule could never be permitted in Ireland. It had been suggested, he said, that the government should find funds to establish peasant proprietary in Ireland, but he strongly condemned the idea of paying out the hard-earned funds in the English exchequer for such a purpose unless it could be shown that the people were capable and willing to work. Although he could not say that crime had been eradicated, there were clearly good results from the exceptional legislation in regard to Ireland. The marquis said he had every reason to believe that the distress in Ireland could be met from local sources of relief without an appeal for help from the imperial funds. He believed that a little rest was necessary for Ireland.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey have Received a hearty reception in Ireland. At their opening meeting in Dublin the Metropolitan Hall was crowded to its utmost capacity, fully five thousand persons being present. One of those who witnessed it writes: "This was no ordinary meeting; numbers were present who for years had not come under the sound of the Gospel, but they were soon subdued and awed by the divine presence. Short Gospel addresses were given at intervals. It was really an impressive time." Mr. Moody's mission in London is expected to commence in October next and to continue a year. While passing through London, on his way to Dublin, Mr. Moody met the members of the London Evangelistic Committee, for consultation with respect to the projected campaign in London. Mr. Moody said his views as to the proposed campaign had been considerably modified by the experiences of recent months in the provincial towns. The Christians in most of these places had prepared the ground so effectually by united prayer and effort, that there was little left for him to do but go in and reap. He had thus been able to accomplish more in ten days than he could have done in a campaign of many weeks, if this preparatory work had been left undone. He was inclined to think that, instead of spending a year in London, if he and Mr. Sankey returned to England, more might be accomplished by brief visits to other country towns where they had not yet been able to go. He was, however, urged to carry out the project of a year's continuous work and it is expected that he will consent. It is proposed to divide London into districts, and hold two hundred meetings simultaneously each night.

Mr. Von Schluembach is Laboring in Berlin with success. A Berlin daily journal, the Deutsches Tageblatt, thus speaks of his work: "We attended yesterday a religious gathering at which Mr. Von Schluembach, from America, gave an address as riveting as it was solid, and with edifying effect. He sang a solo suitable to the subject he was handling, the audience joining in the chorus. We think it remarkable that no notice of these gatherings has been taken by the ecclesiastical newspapers of our town, although the meetings have been held for two months, five evenings a week, in the Nazareth Church. At first they were attended by about 200, and now by about 800 persons of every age, of good family and rank, but especially by workingmen from every part of the town. We are reminded of the words of Scripture, 'To the poor the Gospel is preached.'"

A Fatal Fire in a Circus Occurred in Russian Poland on January 13th. The scene of the disaster was a town called Berditscheff in the Government of Kieff. It has about 50,000 inhabitants, most of whom are Jews. The circus was held in a wooden structure, and toward the close of the performance, one of the performers, who was letting off fireworks, carelessly brought the light in contact with some scenery, and in a few minutes the whole building was in flames. The members of the orchestra were the first victims. The audience, numbering eight hundred persons, rushed to the front door, but it opened inward and as the crowd pressed forward it was rendered useless. A rush was then made to the two side doors, both of which were nailed up, thus compelling the people to take to the windows, from which many sprang into the street with their clothing a sheet of flame. The Fire Brigade arrived within half an hour, but it was impossible to extinguish the flames as the water in the tanks was frozen. The fire lasted two hours. Eye witnesses state that when the doors were finally opened a mass of burning persons were visible within. The horses and properties of the circus were all destroyed. Another account says that 400 persons were suffocated, crushed, or burned to death. Other accounts give the number of victims as 90 men, 120 women, and 60 children.

A Disastrous Explosion near Amsterdam on Friday last resulted in a serious loss of life. It occurred at a gunpowder manufactory at Muiden, a small village on the Zuyder Zee. A telegram from Amsterdam says: "Nearly all the houses in the village were unroofed by the concussion. The neighboring towns and villages are much damaged. The loss of life is unknown, but it is feared that forty persons perished. The explosion was heard in this city, which is eight miles distant from Muiden. Windows in the eastern suburb of Amsterdam were broken. Twelve bodies of victims of the explosion have been discovered.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

SIR ISAAC NEWTON, THE CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHER—SCENES IN HIS LIFE.

SIR ISAAC NEWTON.

The Christian Philosopher.

THE tone of superiority adopted of late years by dabblers in science when speaking of Christianity and Christians, and the scarcely veiled contempt with which they treat men who rely on faith as superior reason, renders a study of the life and character of Sir Isaac Newton, at this time, particularly opportune. Men who desire to stand well in worldly esteem, and especially young men to whom a reputation for intelligence is of extreme importance, are often ashamed to avow their faith in the Bible. They know that in many circles they would have to endure a storm of ridicule and would be taunted with their easy credulity. It may do them some good and inspire them with some courage to know that as Christians they belong to a company which includes the philosopher "whose name is pronounced beyond the Ganges and the Mississippi with reverence, exceeding that which is paid to the memory of the greatest warriors and rulers." They may answer to the supercillious sneers of those who tell them that if they knew more of science they would believe less of revelation, that the man who was the very pioneer of science in his day, and whose name is one of those the Anglo-Saxon race counts among its most honored members, was a man who, above all his achievements in the scientific world, cherished his childlike faith in his God and Saviour. In the society of scientists the young Christian has no need to hang his head; while he has on his side a giant like Sir Isaac Newton, he can well afford to dispense with the pigmies of later days.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

The great philosopher, whose portrait appears this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was born at Woolsthorpe, Lincolnshire, England, on December 25th, 1642. His father was a small farmer who died three months before Isaac Newton was born. Small, feeble beyond even the usual feebleness of infancy, and very delicate, the babe was not expected to live. But contrary to the prognostications of those who watched the fatherless child, he lived and grew in strength and stature. His mother married a second time, and the child of the first marriage was sent to board with his mother's relatives.

It may be some encouragement to boys whose constitutional dullness depresses them, and who begin to despair as they see the rolls of honor and the other prizes carried off by their more brilliant companions, to know that the great philosopher was in his youth most emphatically a dull boy. It seemed to him that he could not learn. Many a boy who in after years has achieved eminence has passed through a similar experience, suggesting the thought that a brain so mighty, required a longer period to reach maturity than ordinary brains, just as the oak is outstripped in the race by weaker trees. Newton's place in the school was the bottom of the lowest form but one, and he had the mortification of seeing younger boys far ahead of him in attainment.

Newton seemed to need some impetus to stir him out of his sluggish state. That impetus came at last, and it came in a rather singular manner. He was AROUSED BY A KICK.

A boy above him in the school, one of those big hulking bullies of which, unhappily, almost every school contains one or more specimens, treated "dunce Newton" with offensive contempt. Newton bore it meekly for some time, until the lad mistook his victim's meekness for cowardice, and with the obtuseness boys and men of his class often display, concluded that Newton had no spirit. It was safe to kick him, the bully thought, and he made the experiment. Then at last Newton was aroused, and though inferior in size and strength to his tormentor, he turned upon him. Brute force failed then. Newton was braced with a nervous strength of which the other knew nothing, and the bully was soundly thrashed. Newton's victory in the playground encouraged him to try results in the intellectual arena, and his teachers were astounded by seeing the "hopeless dunce" suddenly set to work with industry and mental acumen of which before he had given no indication. It was not many months before Newton was at the head of his class.

YOUTHFUL INGENUITY.

Newton about this time began to withdraw from the ordinary games of the boys, and to give up his leisure time to the study of practical mechanics. A windmill, a water clock, and a carriage, to be moved by the person who sat in it, were among his chief achievements. The windmill (a picture of which appears on the front page) was a working model of one he saw in course of erection in the neighborhood. It "was frequently placed upon the top of the house in which he lived, and was put in motion by the action of the wind upon its sails. In calm weather, however, another mechanical agent was required, and for this purpose a mouse was put in requisition, which went by the name of the miller. It does not distinctly appear how the mouse was compelled to perform a function so foreign to its ordinary habits; but it was supposed to act upon something like a treadwheel when attempting to reach some corn placed above it." A water clock of his own making stood in his bed-room, and was often resorted to by the inmates of the house to ascertain the hour of the day. Somewhat later the motions of the heavenly bodies became the subject of his studies.

AT THE UNIVERSITY.

The experiment was made of putting Newton in training for the occupation of a farmer. It would not have been a congenial pursuit for him at any time, but after his aspirations after learning had been aroused, it was a vain attempt from the outset. The effort was quickly abandoned, and Newton persuaded his mother, who was by this time again a widow, to give him a university education.

The records of Cambridge University show that in June 1661, Newton was admitted a subsizar at Trinity College, Cambridge. He studied earnestly, and to so much purpose that after taking in succession the degrees of B.A. and M.A., he was elected a minor and major Fellow, and in 1680 was appointed to a professorship of mathematics. From that time to the end of his glorious life he was identified with that seat of learning, and the impetus he gave to the study of mathematics in the university is not yet spent after the lapse of two hundred years, for Cambridge occupies the first place in mathematical attainment, as Oxford does in classical proficiency.

A LOVE EPISODE.

Ambitious and industrious as Newton was in those days, he yet found time to fall in love. He became enamored of a Miss Storey, and appears to have entertained a very sincere and enduring affection for her. But he was a poor professor with a stipend far too small for the support of a wife, and he accordingly refrained from asking her to share his poverty. The lady married a wealthier suitor, and Newton continued his labors in bachelor loneliness. Years afterward when Miss Storey had twice changed her name, and was the second time a widow, she, having fallen into poverty, was indebted to her former lover for the means of subsistence.

THE FIRST REFLECTING TELESCOPE.

Newton became first known to fame in connection with optics. Having constructed a reflecting telescope, the fact became known to the Royal Society, and a request came from that body to have the instrument sent to it. This was done, and it was presented toward the close of 1671. It now lies—a most valued possession—in the library of the society, with the inscription, "The first Reflecting Telescope, invented by Sir Isaac Newton, and made with his own hands." In January of the following year he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society.

He was first attracted to the study by the, to him unexplicable, results of an experiment understood now by schoolboys. Having placed a prism before an aperture in his shutters, Newton observed that the spectrum on the opposite wall, instead of being circular, as it should be, according to the laws of refraction then received, was five times longer than it was broad. Marvelling at this, he sought to ascertain whether it might not be produced by some imperfection in the glass. Then other conjectures followed; every cause which occurred to him was subjected to experiment in the most careful, painstaking manner; nothing was omitted, nothing taken for granted, or hastily passed over; all were taken up and thoroughly tested, till at length his important discovery was attained.

THE FALLING APPLE.

The crowning achievement of Newton's genius, and that which will carry his fame down to all ages, is his demonstration of the law of gravitation. In his studies of physics he had observed facts which could not be explained by any laws then known, and was for a long time on the verge of discovery. The circumstance which at last gave him the clue to the force has often been described. The well-known story of the falling apple (as shown in the frontispiece), dates as early as the autumn of 1665.

The College was then dismissed because of the plague at Cambridge. Newton was at Woolsthorpe, when, sitting alone in the garden, immersed in thought, the apple fell to the ground. He at once saw that no known law explained the fall of the apple, and he reflected that as the force that attracted it was not sensibly diminished at the greatest distance from the centre of the earth to which we can reach, neither at the summits of the loftiest spires, nor on the tops of the highest mountains, it might extend to the moon and retain her in her orbit, in the same manner as it bends into a curve a stone or a cannon-ball when projected in a straight line from the surface of the earth. If the moon was thus kept in her orbit by gravitation to the earth, or, in other words, its attraction, it was equally probable, he thought, that the planets were kept in their orbits by another application of the same law. An inaccurate measure of the distance between the earth and the moon produced such a discrepancy between Newton's theory and what seemed then to him the fact, that for a time he abandoned the subject.

The exact time at which he recommenced his investigations is not certain. By means of more accurate standards, he was enabled to correct his calculations and carry them to a successful issue. At length the great truth was demonstrated, "that the moon is kept in her orbit by the same power by which bodies fall on the earth's surface," and the demonstration is due to Newton alone.

THE SUPREME CONTROL.

The great fact discovered by Newton being fully established, the universe seemed to fall under the dominion of one subtle and invisible but ever-acting and all-pervading power. Phenomenon after phenomenon was expounded by its means. The quantity of matter in the sun was determined. The size and density of the planets was computed, and the great principle which explained the harmony in the universe was established. It was demonstrated that the Creator had left nothing to chance or intervention, but had established one grand force that held throughout creation.

SIR ISAAC'S PRIVATE LIFE.

The fame of the Cambridge professor's discoveries spread to the centres of learning in Germany and France. Travellers were questioned about him. One of them was gravely asked by the Marquis de l'Hopital if Professor Newton ate and drank and slept as other men, and the inquirer added in explanation of the strange question, "I represent him to myself as a celestial genius entirely disengaged from matter." Newton's abstraction did not amount to that severance, but the wants of the body were treated with scant attention. Dr. Humphrey Newton was the philosopher's amanuensis for five years, including the period in which the "Principia" was written. Two letters from him to Mr. Conduit are extant, and these, with a few anecdotes related by other friends, enable us to form a vivid picture of Newton's daily life.

Frequently, his bed-maker in the college found both dinner and supper almost untasted, and saw that he had not disturbed his bed, but had studied all night. Dr. Humphrey relates that he never saw Newton sit down to any meal when alone. He took a hasty snatch standing, and was quickly away to his work. Often he forgot to eat at all, till, long after the viands had been placed on the table, he was reminded that they were untouched. And on the other hand, a humorous friend could easily persuade him that he had dined, though no dinner had passed his lips. Dr. Stukely once ate up Newton's chicken, and replaced the cover over the picked bones, which the philosopher finding, concluded, to the amusement of his friend, that he must have dined, and forgotten it.

HIS ABSENCE OF MIND.

The oblivion of Newton as to outward circumstances placed him sometimes in very ludicrous positions. Going to Colsterworth on one occasion, he alighted to lead his horse part of the way: the animal slipped the bridle and set off; but his meditative master, all unconscious of the fact, quietly walked to his journey's end with the horseless bridle in his hand. Now and then the Lucasian professor found himself in the streets of Cambridge in attire anything but suitable for the public view, and was obliged to hasten back to his house quite ashamed. When he went to dine in the Hall, which was seldom, the chances were that he would appear "with shoes down at the heels, stockings untied, surplice on, and his hair scarcely combed."

Sometimes, though not often, he gave entertainments—and handsome ones—his guests being usually the heads of colleges. But, alas! for the hospitality of our sage. If he went to his study to fetch anything for his company, there was no certainty that he would not forget to return. Some intrusive idea might so occupy his mind that everything else vanished for the time from his memory. His toilette of a morning was often arrested in the same way. Absorbed in thought, he would sit down half dressed on his bedside, and there remain for hours. On one occasion he undertook to assist in preparing his own breakfast, so far as to boil an egg. Standing before the fire, watch in hand, waiting until the water boiled, he became absorbed in thought, and when the moment came for which he had waited, he was conscious that some action was required of him, but could not realize what action, and finally he dropped the watch into the boiling water, and for a few minutes continued to gaze upon the egg, until the subject in his mind being settled, he became conscious of his mistake. (See picture on our front page.)

NEWTON AS A NURSE.

But Newton could lay aside his studies when duty called. In 1689 his half-brother was seized with malignant fever. His mother went to nurse him, and was speedily taken ill of the same disease. Newton at once forsook his studies, and hastened to her beside. There he watched day and night, with the tenderness of a woman and the skill of a trained nurse. The medicines were given by his hand, the blisters prepared and dressed by him. All that the most devoted and self-denying affection could dictate was done, till death rendered further service impossible.

THE BURNING OF VALUABLE PAPERS.

As to the well-known story of the burning of the papers, Mr. Conduit furnishes the following account: "When Newton was in the warmest pursuit of his discoveries, he going out, left a candle upon his table among his papers; he went down into the bowling green, and meeting somebody who diverted him from returning as he intended, the candle set fire to his papers, and he could never recover them."

This burning has been commonly connected with a supposed dog of the sage's, named Diamond. "Sir Isaac," so the story runs, "being called out of his study to a contiguous room, a little dog called Diamond, the constant but incurious attendant on his master's researches, happened to be left among the papers, and by a fatality not to be retrieved, threw down a lighted candle, which consumed the almost finished labors of some years. Sir Isaac, returning too late, but to behold the dreadful wreck, rebuked the author of it with an exclamation, 'Oh Diamond! Diamond! thou little knowest the mischief thou hast done!' without adding a single stripe." It is a pretty anecdote, and we are sorry to part with it; but the stern light of Sir David Brewster's investigations leaves no loophole by which Diamond may be saved. (Our frontispiece picture illustrates this apocryphal version of the story.) fell thickly upon him. It was a troublous time, James II., the worst king of a bad line, sought to force the university to depart from its laws and the provisions of its charter, and it was necessary that a deputation should wait on the king to explain to him, that while the university was compelled to disobey the royal mandate, the disobedience did not spring from disloyalty. It was a difficult and delicate task, and among those sent to represent the university was Isaac Newton.

MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT.

Again, when James II. had fled from his kingdom, and the nation, agitated by traitors, and uncertain what course to take, was called upon to commit its destinies under God to the great Deliverer, William of Orange, or to call back the Stuart oppressor—in that supreme national crisis Newton was selected by the university as its representative in the House of Commons, and there he proved the unflinching friend of civil and religious liberty.

The greatest public service he rendered to the government, however, was in reference to

THE COINAGE.

It had become debased, and even the new coins issued were unsatisfactory. The silver was cut from the plate with shears, was pared by the hand, and then stamped with the hammer. The result was that however careful the workmen were, some coins were smaller than others and in this uncertainty, rogues all through the country did a little more clipping on their own account, and there being no government standard escaped detection. Disputes between seller and buyer were frequent, and every market in the country was the scene of disturbances. In this emergency Newton was consulted, and he gave his advice with so much wisdom that the the task of reorganizing the coinage was committed to his care. Soon new coins appeared cut and stamped by machinery with a milling and a legend round the edge, which rendered the clipper's practices easy of detection. Newton's work in his new post of governor of the mint was at that crisis of inestimable value to the people. In 1701 he was re-elected member of Parliament by the university.

KNIGHTED BY QUEEN ANNE.

The season of neglect for Newton had passed, and honor after honor was now showered upon him. In 1703, on the retirement of Lord Somers, he was elected President of the Royal Society, and re-elected each succeeding year of his life. Two years after he was knighted by Queen Anne when her Majesty visited Cambridge, the scene of his great triumphs.

NEWTON'S RELIGIOUS PRINCIPLES.

It is pleasing to find this great intellect acknowledge the primary importance of religion, and especially the claims of revealed religion and the paramount authority of God's Word. He was a diligent student of Scripture and occupied himself much with theological subjects during the whole of his life. An attempt has been made to date his religious writings after what his French biographer chooses to designate the "fatal epoch" of 1693, and to suggest a connection between the weakened intellect, which he ascribes to the later years of Newton, and the interest whch the philosopher took in matters connected with religion.

As if in anticipation of some such assertion, John Craig, an eminent mathematician thus writes in the year in which his friend Newton died: "To show how earnest he was in religion, he had written a long explication of remarkable parts of the Old and New Testaments, while his understanding was in its greatest perfection, lest the infidels might pretend that his applying himself to the study of religion was the effect of dotage." A Commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul to the Corinthians, observations on the Prophecies of Daniel, and the Apocalypse of St. John, with many other theological papers, remain to show the zeal with which he prosecuted such studies.

The great philosopher in his eager search into the works of nature, humbly worshipped with unfaltering faith the God of nature, and turned from the book of nature to that of Revelation, as the clearer light and the one key which could unlock the moral mysteries of this state. The great name of Newton stands out in stalwart opposition to the ranks of proud infidel philosophers.

HIS DEATH IN 1727.

On the 20th March, 1727, Sir Isaac Newton died. On the 2d of that month he had presided at a meeting of the Royal Society. For a considerable time previously, however, his health had been declining, and he had abstained in a great measure from intellectual labor. During this season of rest he read much; but "the book which was commonly lying before him, and which he read oftenest at last, was a

DUODECIMO BIBLE."

With distinguished honor the body of the philosopher was conveyed to its last resting-place, in Westminister Abbey. The Lord High Chancellor and several of England's greatest nobles acted as pall-bearers. The relatives who inherited the personal estate of Sir Isaac gave $2500 for the erection of a monument, which occupies a conspicuous place in the Abbey. A full-length statue in white marble was erected at Cambridge, and various other memorials of the great man remain to his country.

In personal appearance Sir Isaac was not above the middle size, and he was inclined to corpulency in his later years. At thirty years of age his hair had turned gray. Mr. Conduit describes his eyes as "very lively and piercing," his aspect as "comely and gracious."

We cannot close our sketch more appropriately than by quoting his own estimate of his labors as he looked back on them when his course was near a close. "I do not know," he says, "what I may appear to the world, but to myself I seem to have been only like a boy playing on the seashore, and diverting myself in now and then finding a smoother pebble or a prettier shell than ordinary, while the great ocean of truth lay all undiscovered before me."

An Excited Visitor Called upon Mr. Henry Varley recently. Mr. Varley relates that as he was leaving his house a hack drew up at the curb, and out sprang a gentleman, who, in an excited tone of voice, exclaimed, "Sir, God has sent me to you." "Indeed," I quietly replied. "Well, what is it you need?" "Why," he continued, "I heard you preach at Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, and you said, 'That all power was given to Jesus Christ in heaven and on earth.'" "Yes," I answered, "I did say so, and that is the testimony of God's Word." "Well, then," said my excited visitor, "why doesn't He alter me?" "What do you mean?" I replied. "Why, just this; there is the fact. I have taken a house of business in Chelsea; the stock is all ready, everything is prepared for opening to-morrow morning, and this is the state I'm in." By this time I perceived the speaker was inflamed with drink, so I quietly and firmly replied, "Well, a very disgraceful state to be in. You had better come into the house." Leading the way, I entered and passed into the study, the door of which I locked. "I see what is the matter with you; it is your love of strong drink which is just cursing your whole life. Now, I propose that you shall not leave this house for one whole week. I'll see about this appetite for intoxicants." The man said, "Indeed, I'll have a tussle for it." "Friend," I replied, "don't alarm yourself; I am only showing you the absurdity of your own thought. You come and ask why God doesn't alter you, which, if it means anything, suggests prevention by power, and directly I suggest the remedy for one week only in relation to one sin, you rise up and are ready to fight. If you would only tussle with and fight your sin, seeking help from God, you would soon know freedom from the power of drink, and from every other sin also."

MENDING THE BIBLE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, January 28, 1883.

"If any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city."—REV. 22 : 19.

A Risky Business—A Pulpit Proposal to Expurgate the Bible—A Critique from the Pulpit—A Heinous Act—Mutiny in a Storm—Treachery in a Besieged Fortress—Reasons against Expurgation—I. The Bible as it is, Miraculously Preserved—Tischendorf at the Convent of Sinai—The World's Literary Losses—No Additions Made—II. Expurgation Means Annihilation—III. Good People Content with the Book—IV. The Expurgations Proposed have been Harmless—Expurgation of the Heart the Need—Illustrations Better than Doré's.

INSPIRATION foresaw that the time would come when there would be burglarious attempts to purloin portions of the Bible, and one man would break in here, and another man would break in there, and my text comes out with astounding emphasis and declares that the gates of heaven will clang shut against the entrance of all those who so maltreat the Bible. "God shall take away His part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city." You see it is a very risky business, this changing of the Holy Scriptures.

A pulpit in New York has recently set forth the idea that the Scriptures ought to be expurgated, that portions of them are unfit to be read, and the inspiration of much of the Bible has been denied. Among other striking statements are these :

A PULPIT CRITIQUE.

The Book of Genesis is a tradition of creation, a successive layer of traditions thought out centuries before. Moses' mistakes about creation were the mistakes of his age. That there are many systems of theology in the New Testament. That Paul had all the notions of the rabbinical schools of his time. That Job winds up his epilogue in genuine fairy-tale style. That Revelation is a long array of misshapen progeny in the apocalyptic writings, tracing themselves back to Daniel. That Revelation comes to a madman, or leaves him mad. That what he calls the abominable lewdness of some things in the Old Testament is not fit to be read. That it is an abominable misuse of the Bible to suppose the prophecies really foretell future events. That the Book of Daniel is not in the right place. That Solomon's Songs are not in the right place, and he seems to applaud the idea of some one who said that the Book of Solomon's Song ought not to be in any one's hands under thirty years of age. He intimates he does not believe that Samson slew a thousand men with the jawbone of an ass. That the whole Bible has been improperly chopped up into chapters and verses.

DISGUISED INFIDELITY.

He does not believe the beginning of the Bible, and he does not believe the close of it, nor anything between as fully inspired of God, and he thinks the Book ought to be expurgated, and there are those who re echo the same sentiment. In other words, it is Thomas Paine and Robert Ingersoll in gown and bands. But they have more excuse because they openly and above board declare their infidelity, while that man stands in a Christian pulpit assaulting the Bible—the pulpit of an honored denomination in which Bishop McIlvaine and Archbishop Leighton and the venerable Dr. Stephen H. Tyng were chief apostles.

Now, I believe in the largest liberty of discussion, and there are halls and opera houses and academies of music where the Bible and Christianity may be assaulted without any interruption ; but when a minister of the Gospel surrenders the faith of any denomination, his first plain, honest duty is to get out of it. What would you think of the clerk in a dry goods store, or a factory, or a banking house, who should go to criticising the books of the firm and denouncing the behavior of the firm, still taking the salary of that firm and the support of that firm, and doing all his denunciation of the books of the firm under its cover? Certainly, a minister of the Gospel ought to be as honest with his denomination as a drygoods clerk is honest with his employers.

The heinousness of finding fault with the Bible at this time by a Christian minister is most evident. In our day the Bible is assailed by scurrility, by misrepresentation, by infidel scientists, by all the vice of earth and all the venom of perdition, and at this particular time ministers of religion fall into line of criticism of the Word of God. Why, it makes me think of a ship in a September equinox, the waves dashing to the top of the smoke-stack, and the hatches fastened down, and many prophesying the foundering of the steamer, and at that time some of the crew with axes and saws go down into the hold of the ship, and they try to saw off some of the planks and pry out some of the timbers because the timber did not come from the right forest ! It does not seem to me a commendable business for the crew to be helping the winds and storms outside with their axes and saws inside.

Now, this old Gospel ship what, with the roaring of earth and hell around the stem and stern, and mutiny on deck, is having a very rough voyage, but I have noticed that not one of the timbers has started, and the Captain says He will see it through. And I have noticed that keelson and counter-timber knee are built out of Lebanon cedar, and she is going to weather the gale, but no credit to those who make mutiny on deck.

When I see ministers of religion in this particular day finding fault with the Scriptures, it makes me think of a fortress terrifically bombarded, and the men on the ramparts, instead of swabbing out and loading the guns and helping fetch up the ammunition from the magazine, are trying with crowbars to pry out from the wall certain blocks of stone, because they did not come from the right quarry. Oh, men on the ramparts, better fight back and fight down the common enemy, instead of trying to make breeches in the wall.

WHY EXPURGATION IS WRONG.

While I oppose this expurgation of the Scriptures, I shall give you my reasons for such opposition. "What !" say some of the theological evolutionists, whose brains have been addled by too long brooding over them by Darwin and Spencer, "you don't now really believe all the story of the Garden of Eden, do you ?" Yes, as much as I believe all the roses that were in my garden last summer. "But," say they, "you don't really believe that the sun and moon stood still ?" Yes, and if I had strength enough to create a sun and moon I could make them stand still, or cause the refraction of the sun's rays so it would appear to stand still. "But," they say, "you don't really believe that the whale swallowed Jonah ?" Yes, and if I were strong enough to make a whale I could have made very easy ingress for the refractory prophet, leaving to Evolution to eject him, if he were an unworthy tenant ! "But," say they, "you don't really believe that the water was turned into wine ?" Yes, just as easily as water now is often turned into wine with an admixture of strychnine and logwood ! "But," say they, "you don't really believe that Samson slew a thousand with the jawbone of an ass?" Yes, as I think that the man who in this day assaults the Bible is wielding the same weapon !

There is nothing in the Bible that staggers me. There are many things I do not understand. I do not pretend to understand, never shall in this world understand. But that would be a very poor God who could be fully understood by the human. That would be a very small Infinite that can be measured by the finite. You must not expect to weigh the thunderbolts of Omnipotence in an apothecary's balances. Starting with the idea that God can do anything, and that He was present at the beginning, and that He is present now, there is nothing in the Holy Scriptures to arouse scepticism in my heart. Here I stand, a fossil of the ages, dug up from the tertiary formation, fallen off the shelf of an antiquarian, a man in the latter part of the glorious nineteenth century believing in

A WHOLE BIBLE FROM LID TO LID !

I. I am opposed to the expurgation of the Scriptures in the first place, because the Bible in its present shape has been so miraculously preserved. Fifteen hundred years after Herodotus wrote his history, there was only one manuscript copy of it. Twelve hundred years after Plato wrote his book, there was only one manuscript copy of it. God was so careful to have us have the Bible in just the right shape that we have fifty manuscript copies of the New Testament a thousand years old, and many of them fifteen hundred years old. This Book handed down from the time of Christ, or just after the time of Christ, by the hand of such men as Origen in the second century and Tertullian in the third century—men of different ages who died for their principles. The three best copies of the New Testament in manuscript in the possession of three great churches—the Protestant Church of England, the Greek Church of St. Petersburg, and the Romish Church of Italy.

It is a plain matter of history that Tischendorf went to a convent in the peninsula of Sinai and was by ropes lifted over the wall into the convent, that being the only mode of admission, and that he saw there in the waste basket for kindling for the fires, a manuscript of the Holy Scriptures. That night he copied many of the passages of that Bible, but it was not until fifteen years had passed of earnest entreaty and prayer and coaxing and purchase on his part that that copy of the Holy Scriptures was put into the hands of the Emperor of Russia—that one copy so marvellously protected.

Do you not know that the catalogue of the books of the Old and New Testaments as we have it, is the same catalogue that has been coming on down through the ages? Thirty-nine books of the Old Testament thousands of years ago. Thirty-nine now. Twenty-seven books of the New Testament sixteen hundred years ago. Twenty-seven books of the New Testament now. Marcion, for wickedness, was turned out of the Church in the second century, and in his assault on the Bible and Christianity, he incidentally gives a catalogue of the books of the Bible—that catalogue corresponding exactly with ours—testimony given by the enemy of the Bible and the enemy of Christianity. The catalogue now just like the catalogue then. Assaulted and spit on and torn to pieces and burned, yet adhering. The book to-day, in three hundred languages, confronting four fifths of the human race in their own tongue. Three hundred million copies of it in existence. Does not that look as if this Book had been divinely protected, as if God had guarded it all through the centuries?

Is it not an argument plain enough to every honest man and every honest woman, that a book divinely protected and in this shape is in the very shape that God wants it? It pleases God and it ought to please us. The epidemics which have swept thousands of other books into the sepulchre of forgetfulness, have only brightened the fame of this. There is not one book out of a thousand that lives five years. Any publisher will tell you that. There will not be more than one book out of fifty thousand that will live a century. Yet, here is a Book, much of it sixteen hundred years old, and much of it four thousand years old, and with more rebound and resilience and strength in it than when the Book was first put upon parchment or papyrus. This Book was the cradle of all other books, and it will see their graves. Would you not think that an old book like this, some of it forty centuries old, would come along hobbling with age and on crutches? Instead of that, more potent than any other book of the time. More copies of it printed in the last ten years than of any other book—Walter Scott's Waverley Novels, Macaulay's "History of England," Disraeli's "Endymion," and all the popular books of the day having no such sale in the last ten years as this old worn-out Book. Do you know what a struggle a book has in order to get through one century or two centuries?

LOST LITERARY TREASURES.

Some old books, during a fire in a seraglio of Constantinople, were thrown into the street. A man without any education picked up one of those books, read it, and did not see the value of it. A scholar looked over his shoulder and saw it was the first and second decades of Livy, and he offered the man a large reward if he would bring the books to his study; but in the excitement of the fire, the two parted, and the first and second decades of Livy were forever lost. Pliny wrote twenty books of history; all lost. The most of Meander's writings lost. Of one hundred and thirty comedies of Plautus, all gone but twenty. Euripides wrote a hundred dramas, all gone but nineteen. Eschylus wrote a hundred dramas, all gone but seven. Varro wrote the laborious biographies of seven hundred Romans, not a fragment left. Quintilian wrote his favorite book on the corruption of eloquence, all lost. Thirty books of Tacitus lost. Dion Cassius wrote eighty books, only twenty remain. Bevosius's history all lost.

Nearly all the old books are mummified and are lying in the tombs of old libraries, and perhaps once in twenty years some man comes along and picks up one of them and blows the dust off, and opens it and finds it the book he does not want. But this old Book, much of it forty centuries old, stands to-day more discussed than any other book, and it challenges the admiration of all the good and the spite and the venom and the animosity and the hypercriticism of earth and hell. I appeal to your common sense, if a book so divinely guarded and protected in its present shape, must not be in just the way that God wants it to come to us, and if it pleases God ought it not to please us?

NO ADDITIONS MADE.

Not only have all the attempts to detract from the Book failed, but all the attempts to add to it. Many attempts were made to add the apochryphal books to the Old Testament. The Council of Trent, the Synod of Jerusalem, the Bishops of Hippo, all decided that the apochryphal books must be added to the Old Testament. "They must stay in," said those learned men; but they stayed out. There is not an intelligent Christian man that to-day will put the Book of Maccabeus or the Book of Judith beside the Book of Isaiah or Romans. Then a great many said, "we must have books added to the New Testament," and there were epistles and Gospels and apocalypses written and added to the New Testament, but they have all fallen out. You cannot add anything. You cannot subtract anything. Divinely protected Book in the present shape. Let no man dare to lay his hands on it with the intention of detracting from the Book, or casting out any of these holy pages.

EXPURGATION MEANS ANNIHILATION.

II. Beside that, I am opposed to this expurgation of the Scriptures because if the attempt were successful, it would be the annihilation of the Bible. Infidel geologists would say, "out with the Book of Genesis;" infidel astronomers would say, "out with the Book of Joshua;" people who do not believe in the atoning sacrifice would say, "out with the Book of Leviticus;" people who do not believe in the miracles would say, "out with all those wonderful stories in the Old and New Testament;" and some would say, "out with the Book of Revelation;" and others would say, "out with the entire Pentateuch," and the work would go on until there would not be enough of the Bible left to be worth as much as last year's almanac. The expurgation of the Scriptures means their annihilation.

GOOD PEOPLE SATISFIED.

III. I am also opposed to this proposed expurgation of the Scriptures for the fact that in proportion as people became self-sacrificing and good and holy and consecrated, they like the Book as it is. I have yet to find a man or a woman distinguished for self-sacrifice, for consecration to God, for holiness of life, who wants the Bible changed. Many of us have inherited family Bibles. Those Bibles were in use twenty, forty, fifty, perhaps a hundred years in the generations. This afternoon, when you go home, take down those family Bibles, and find out if there are any chapters which have been erased by lead pencil or pen, and if in any margins you can find the words: "this chapter not fit to read." There has been plenty of opportunity during the last half century privately to expurgate the Bible. Do you know any case of such expurgation? Did not your grandfather give it to your father, and did not your father give it to you?

IV. Beside that, I am opposed to the expurgation of the Scriptures, because the so-called indelicacies and cruelties of the Bible have demonstrated no evil result. A cruel book will produce cruelty—an unclean book will produce uncleanness. Fetch me a victim. Out of all Christendom and out of all the ages, fetch me a victim whose heart has been hardened to cruelty, or whose life has been made impure by this Book. Show me one. One of the best-families I ever knew of, for thirty or forty years, morning and evening, had all the members gathered together, and the servants of the household, and the strangers that happened to be within the gates—twice a day, without leaving out a chapter or a verse, they read this holy Book, morning by morning, night by night. Not only the older children, but the little child who could just spell her way through the verse while her mother helped her. The father beginning and reading one verse, and then all the members of the family in turn reading a verse. The father maintained his integrity, the mother maintained her integrity, the sons grew up and entered professions and commercial life, adorning every sphere in the life in which they lived, and the daughters went into families where Christ was honored, and all that was good and pure and righteous reigned perpetually. For thirty years that family endured the Scriptures. Not one of them ruined by it.

Now, if you will tell me of a family where the Bible has been read twice a day for thirty years, and the children have been brought up in that habit, and the father went to ruin, and the mother went to ruin, and the sons and daughters were destroyed by it—if you will tell me of one such incident, I will throw away my Bible, or I will doubt your veracity. I tell you, if a man is shocked with what he calls the indelicacies of the Word of God, he is prurient in his taste and imagination. If a man cannot read the book Solomon's Song, without impure suggestion, he is either in his heart, or in his life, a libertine.

The Old Testament description of wickedness, uncleanness of all sorts, is purposely and righteously a disgusting account, instead of the Byronic and the Parisian vernacular which makes sin attractive instead of appalling. When those old prophets point you to a lazaretto, you understand it is a lazaretto. When a man having begun to do right falls back into wickedness, and gives up his integrity, the Bible does not say he was overcome by the fascinations of the festal board, or that he surrendered to convivialities, or that he became a little fast in his habits. I will tell you what the Bible says: "The dog is turned to his own vomit again, and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire." No gilding of iniquity. No garlands on a death's head. No pounding away with a silver mallet at iniquity when it needs an iron sledge hammer.

I can easily understand how people, brooding over the description of uncleanness in the Bible, may get morbid in mind until they are as full of it as the wings and the beak and the nostril and the claw of a buzzard is full of the odors of a carcass; but what is wanted is not that the Bible be disinfected, but that you, the critic have your heart and mind washed with carbolic acid!

EXPURGATION OF THE HEART.

I tell you at this point in my discourse that a man who does not like this Book, and who is critical as to its contents, and who is shocked and outraged with its descriptions, has never been soundly converted. The laying on of the hands of Presbytery, or Episcopacy, does not always change a man's heart, and men sometimes get into the pulpit as well as into the pew, never having been changed radically by the sovereign grace of God. Get your heart right and the Bible will be right. The trouble is men's natures are not brought into harmony with the Word of God. Ah! my friends, expurgation of the heart is what is wanted.

You cannot make me believe that the Scriptures, which this moment lie on the table of the purest and the best men and women of the age, and which were the dying solace of your kindred passed into the skies, have in them a taint which the strongest microscope of honest criticism could make visible. If men are uncontrollable in their indignation when the integrity of wife or child is assailed, and judges and jurors as far as possible excuse violence under such provocation, what ought to be the overwhelming and long resounding thunders of condemnation for any man who will stand in a Christian pulpit and assail the more than virgin purity of inspiration, the well beloved daughter of God?

Expurgate the Bible! You might as well go to the old picture galleries in Dresden and in Venice and in Rome and expurgate the old paintings. Perhaps you could find a foot of Michael Angelo's "Last Judgment" that might be improved. Perhaps you could throw more expression into Raphael's "Madonna." Perhaps you could put more pathos into Rubens' "Descent from the Cross." Perhaps you could change the crests of the waves in Turner's "Slave Ship." Perhaps you might go into the old galleries of sculpture and change the forms and the posture of the statues of Phidias and Praxiteles. Such an iconoclast would very soon find himself in the penitentiary. But it is worse vandalism when a man proposes to re-fashion these masterpieces of inspiration and to remodel the moral giants of this gallery of God.

NO COMPROMISE.

Now, let us divide off. Let those people who do not believe the Bible and who are critical of this and that part of it, go clear over to the other side. Let them stand behind the devil's guns. There can be no compromise between infidelity and Christianity. Give us the out and out opposition of infidelity rather than the work of these hybrid theologians, these mongrel ecclesiastics, these half and half evoluted pulpiteers who believe the Bible and do not believe it, who accept the miracles and do not accept them, who believe in the inspiration of the Scriptures and do not believe in the inspiration of the Scriptures—trimming their belief on one side to suit the scepticism of the world, trimming their belief on the other side to suit the pride of their own heart, and feeling that in order to demonstrate their courage they must make the Bible a target and shoot at God.

There is one thing that encourages me very much, and that is, that the Lord made out to manage the universe before they were born, and will probably be able to make out to manage the universe a little while after they are dead. While I demand that the antagonists of the Bible, and the critics of the Bible go clear over where they belong, on the devil's side, I ask that all the friends of this good Book come out openly and above board in behalf of it. That Book, which was the best inheritance you ever received from your ancestry, and which will be the best legacy you will leave to your children when you bid them good-by as you cross the ferry to the golden city.

Young man do not be ashamed of your Bible. There is not a virtue but it commends, there is not a sorrow but it comforts, there is not a good law on the statute book of any country but it is founded on these Ten Commandments. There are no braver, grander people in all the earth than the heroes and the heroines which it biographizes.

BETTER ILLUSTRATION THAN DORÉ'S.

Last Tuesday noon, I was startled as I saw on the bulletin the announcement of Gustave Doré's departure. I said: "Is it possible that that hand has forgotten its cunning?" Of all the works of that great artist, there is nothing so impressive as Doré's illustrated Bible. What scene of Abrahamic faith, or Edenic beauty, of dominion Davidic or Solomonic, of miracle, or parable, of nativity, or of crucifixion, or of last judgment but the thought leaped from the great brain to the skilful pencil, and from the skilful pencil to the canvas immortal. The Louvre, the Luxembourg, the National Gallery of London compressed within two volumes of Doré's illustrated Bible. But the Bible will come to better illustration than that, my friends, when all the deserts have become gardens, and all the armories have become academies, and all the lakes have become Genesarets with Christ walking them, and all the cities have become Jerusalems with hovering Shekinah; and the two hemispheres shall be clapping cymbals of divine praise, and the round earth a footlight to Emanuel's throne—that, to all lands, and all ages, and all centuries, and all cycles will be the best specimen of Bible illustrated.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

An Influential Example.—At a Recent Meeting Mr. Morrison, an engine-driver, of Carlisle, said: "We can testify for Christ in our life as well as with our lips. A young lady I know was converted. She was acquainted with a young man, in whose company she often was, but she never spoke to him about his soul. He was, however, struck with the change in her walk and conduct, and watched her narrowly. What he saw led him to Christ and a knowledge of the truth."

God in the Business.—"Last Night a Worker said to me, 'Dr. White made a remark during his address to the effect that many Christians made fine plans for themselves without asking God about them until their minds were made up, then they asked God to guide them, and then wondered that their schemes went astray.' That worker is looking at me now. He had planned to extend his business and intended going to Dundee for that purpose, and although he asked God's blessing upon his plans he did not ask God to make the plans. This remark of Dr. White has changed his ideas entirely."

The Influence of a Rough-looking Youth.—At a recent meeting Major Colquhoun narrated the following incident: "Last night, just at the back there under the gallery, I asked a woman, 'Are you a Christian, sister?' She answered, 'I used to think I was till he' (pointing to a rough-looking youth standing beside her) 'three weeks ago came home, and told us that he was saved, and the change upon him is so great that I see he has something I have not got.' That woman has now taken the first step in the Christian life by giving herself to Christ, and next week her husband is coming to the meeting to seek the same Saviour."

Christ Among Sailors.—At one of the Prayer-meetings Mr. Jack said: "One night lately, I went to see the work among the sailors, and I was very much struck with it. I heard some wonderful testimonies illustrating the value of personal dealing with souls. Scarcely two had been converted in the same way. One young man told us that he was converted by hearing a word in the street. He was a careless, drunken young man, and a word he heard in the street brought him to the feet of Christ. Others, again, told how they had been brought to the Saviour in common lodging-houses. Daily there are cases occurring which illustrate the saying of the woman, 'The dogs eat of the crumbs that fall from the Master's table.'"

One of the Squad.—Mr. Balfour Spoke of his visit to Inverkiething during the great awakening there. The minister was preaching, and he had for his text, 'What shall I do then with Jesus, who is called Christ?' A very rough-swearing man was present, and afterward he could not get the text out of his head. The next morning, while going to his work, the text still ringing in his ears, he fell down on his knees in the highway, and said, 'I will no longer crucify you—I will no longer crucify this man that is called Christ, but I will follow Him, and I will love Him.' When he returned home in the evening, he went to a small company of praying men, and said, 'Lads, I want to join your squad, I am going to become one of you.'"

An Instance of Mental Distress.—At a Re-cent noonday meeting Mr. Jack said: "It is interesting to see how much trouble those men who have been converted this year take to bring their fellow-workmen to Christ. There is a man in Bessley whose wife has been a Christian for thirty years, and their son was lately convinced of sin, and of his need of Christ, but he was unable to see the way of salvation. On our way from the prayer-meeting last week we called upon him, and found four men praying with and for him. His anxiety of mind has made him very ill. He is now fevered and distressed in mind and body. I ask the prayers of God's people on his behalf, that he may speedily recover, and find the joy of his life in the service of Christ."

"The Song of the Drunkard."—At the Same meeting Mr. Dewar said: "The late Sir. Andrew Agnew advocated very earnestly the observance of the Sabbath among all classes. In his place in Parliament and in private he so vigorously protested against its desecration that in singing-saloons and bar-rooms his name became a by-word. One day he was sitting in his room much cast down, when a party of drunken men passed his house singing one of the songs in which his name was mentioned with contempt. Sick at heart, he knelt and asked God to send him comfort. He opened his Bible, and at once his eye fell upon the words in Psalm 69: 11, 12, 'I became a proverb to them,' 'I was the song of the drunkard.' This was God's message to him, and he was lightened of the gloom which was gathering over him."

Memory only for Jesus.—Mr. R. Hill Said: "An old woman of about eighty years of age came to die, and her memory so failed her that she could not even remember her own children. She had a large family, and one by one they passed before her, anxious to bid her a last farewell in this world. The eldest went by the dying woman's side, and said, 'Don't you know me?' She shook her head and said, 'No,' and it was so with the rest of the children; each asked the same question and got the same reply till it came to the youngest. She was a happy Christian, and instead of asking, 'Don't you know me?' she put this question, 'Don't you know Jesus?' The old woman joyfully responded, 'Yes; and I am so glad Jesus knows me.' Oh, knowledge of Christ makes up for everything in this dark world."

A Miraculous Change.—Rev. Dr. Elder Cum-ming said, speaking on the subject of the reclamation of drunken women, "Not long ago I saw a woman who had been a drunkard, and she told me that she was saved—that the Lord had delivered her; and then she went on to say, 'I have something more to tell you. My mother has been saved too. You don't know about her, but since I saw you last she has accepted Christ. She went home to the place where she lived, and where she had been known as a drunkard for forty years, she was the wife of a Free Church elder, and she broke his heart and brought him down to the grave by her conduct. When she told her husband's minister that she had become a teetotaller and a Christian, he remarked: 'I always said that nothing but a miracle could save that woman.' For months the woman in question has been able by God's grace to overcome her appetite."

A Young Convert.—Mr. J. R. Miller Said: "An afternoon meeting for children was started some time ago in one of the rooms attached to Mr. Scott's church, and one night I was asked to assist. Ten or twelve of the little folks told me that they had found Jesus. Some people say you cannot place much confidence in what a little boy or girl says upon this subject; but the other day I met in the street a boy about twelve years of age who regarded me very earnestly as if he knew me. I thought he was one of those to whom I had spoken in the meeting, and I asked him the question. He said, 'No, you did not speak to me.' Then I asked him, 'Are you a Christian?' and he replied, 'Yes.' I inquired, 'When were you brought to Christ?' He replied, 'At the first of the children's meetings;' and from the conversation I had with him I found that he had taken firm hold of Christ, and was a sincere Christian."

A Sceptic on his Knees.—Mr. McFarlane Re-lated the following anecdote: "I knew a man who was chairman of a debating society which met regularly to tear the Bible to pieces. His children who were in my Sabbath-school, were absent one day, so I called to see what detained them, and in this way I became acquainted with their father. He was a thorough sceptic, and well posted up in all matters relating to his ideas of religion. I was unable to cope with him in argument, and brought a friend who knew more about the arguments than I did, but he also was unable to convince the man. At last I asked him, 'Do you want to believe?' 'Most certainly I do; but it's against reason to do so,' he rejoined. 'If you are truly in earnest,' I said, 'promise me that you will kneel and ask God for Christ's sake to make you believe. Will you do so?' 'Yes,' he replied. When I went back to see him I saw that his face had a tender, softened look, which made me ask myself, 'Has this man kept his promise?' There were some people with me, so I was not able to ask him; but soon they left, and I put the question to him. He burst into tears, saying, 'I knelt down as I promised, and began to pray, and almost immediately remembered that it is twenty-five years since I did so the last time, and that was when I knelt at my mother's knees. When in my prayer I named the name of Jesus, the story of His life came to my mind so that I could no longer contain myself, but wept before the Lord.' Those tears washed away all the scepticism which had grown during the past twenty-five years."

THE CHARACTERISTICS AND CONTRASTS OF THE COMING KINGDOM.

By Rev. William Maude.

III—The Kingdom of Power.

Man's Original Charter—God's Vicegerent Upon Earth—The Divine Ideal of Man's Sovereignty—Man a Pensioner of Nature—Nature's Inexorable Aspects—Satan's Usurpation of Empire—His Malignant Agency—Physical Phenomena and Bodily Disease—Man a Discrowned Monarch—He is Yet to Reign over a Subjugated World—The Second Adam Crowned—The Climax of Coming Dignity—The Period of Its Attainment—Its Character and Extent—The Late Archbishop Trench's Exposition—The Meaning of Christ's Miracles—Four Groups of Miracles—Power over Nature, Bodily Disease and Death—The Reign of the Second Adam.

WE are told, in the primeval record of creation, that when God had created generic man, male and female, He blessed them, and said unto them, "Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth." (Gen. 1: 28.) Here, then, we have the original charter of unfallen man's investiture with the sovereignty of this world. Whether that sovereignty was the first this earth had ever known; or whether, as some ancient rabbis taught and some modern writers on prophecy—notably the late Rev. G. S. Faber—have been disposed to believe, Satan had, previous to the chaotic condition of our planet described in Genesis 1: 2, been its mighty but unfaithful ruler, we cannot positively say.* But at all events when Adam was created and placed in the Gardens of Eden, he was constituted

GOD'S VICEGERENT UPON EARTH.

It was a noble inheritance; given to him and his seed for an everlasting possession—"The heaven, even the heavens are the Lord's; but the earth hath He given to the children of men," (Ps. 115: 16); and hence it was said to him, "Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth." His control over its resources and forces was to be absolute.

He stood, as it were, in the laboratory of nature, and all the combinations of its elements were at his command; he was placed in the seat of power, and the mightiest physical forces of the universe were made subservient to his will; for his commission was, not only to replenish the earth, but to "subdue it." All animate nature, also, was in perfect and willing subjection to his rule; the beasts of the field, and the birds of the air, and the monsters of the deep, all paid him homage; for had not God said: "Have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth?"

IDEAL OF MAN'S SOVEREIGNTY.

It is this original and ideal sovereignty which David celebrates in the ardent adoration of the eighth Psalm: "When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars which Thou hast ordained; what is man, that

* Masudi tells us, that God having finished the earth, peopled it with genii or demons, one of which was Eblis (Satan) before He created Adam. They began to fight among themselves, and were driven to distant islands; while Eblis was made regent of the sky (the heaven of the world), but harbored pride in his breast, and refused to worship Adam when he was created, saying to God "I am thy vicar on earth, created of fire, with wings and a glory around my head—but this one is of clay." Then God cursed Eblis, and hurled him down from heaven, but gave him respite, until a fixed time—the day of Resurrection.—Quoted by Dr. S. C. Malan, "The Book of Adam and Eve."

Thou art mindful of him? and the Son of Man that Thou visitest him? For Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and has crowned him with glory and honor. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of Thy hands; Thou hast put all things under his feet: all sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field; the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the sea. O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth!"

But while this was the divine ideal of man's relation to this lower world, that ideal has never hitherto been realized. Man, though created in honor, did not abide therein. When sin had entered into the world, and man had fallen "like a star from heaven," the sentence went forth, "Remove the mitre, and take off the crown," and henceforth man ceased to be the prince, and became

THE PENSIONER OF NATURE.

The lower animals no longer unreservedly acknowledged his supremacy, but either rose in rebellion against him or fled in terror at his approach. The prolific earth was cursed with unnatural barrenness, and brought forth thorns and thistles, so that only in the sweat of his face could man eat bread. The air became sown, as it were, with the germs of a thousand fell diseases, while death lay in wait on every side. The whirlwind and the waterflood swept him away to destruction like the autumn leaves; the lightning—in which his guilty conscience saw the wrath of heaven—struck him lifeless to the ground. Yea, the very earth itself, reeling beneath the earthquake shock, opened her mouth and swallowed him up, so that he went down alive into the pit. Oh, how hard and pitiless does nature often seem to poor humanity! Who can wonder if those who refuse the key to the mystery which Scripture supplies, should be left to doubt if there be indeed a God who created and governs the world; or if nature be not, rather, but a liveless power of which still pursues its resistless course, crushing relentlessly into death the groaning, tortured masses of man's miserable race, while their blood stains continually its high and dreadful wheels. Surely if man were not fallen and the earth was not under the curse, the conditions under which both at present exist would be a manifest and pitiless libel on God's righteousness and love.

But, alas! this is not all. Not only did the sceptre of universal empire fall from man's sinpalsied hands, but it has, in some measure, passed into those of

A HOSTILE AND MALIGNANT POWER.

Satan became "the prince of the power of the air"—"the world-ruler of this present darkness." (Eph. 2 : 2 ; 6 : 12.) Hence we find our Lord, in speaking to His seventy disciples, when they "returned with joy, saying, Lord, even the demons are subject unto us through Thy name," saying unto them, "I beheld (in anticipative vision) Satan fallen as lightning from heaven. (See Rev. 12 : 7-10.) Behold, I have given you authority to tread upon serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy; and nothing shall in any wise hurt you" (Luke 10 : 17-19); where the venomous nature of the reptiles named is clearly referred to as manifestations of "the power of the enemy."

Again; it was, we are told, through Satan's instigation and more active agency, that not only did the Sabeans kill Job's servants and the Chaldeans "lift" his oxen and camels, but that the fire fell from heaven and destroyed his remaining sheep and servants; and, more terrible still, the storm overthrew the house in which his ten children were assembled and buried them beneath its ruins. From which tragical narrative we may certainly learn that the popular superstitions which in all ages and many countries have associated destructive atmospheric phenomena with the agency of evil spirits, finds some foundation in the teaching of Scripture.

SATANIC AGENCY IN BODILY DISEASES.

It is, however, more especially in connection with the infliction of bodily disease that Satanic power seems to be recognized in Holy Writ. How deeply significant is the reference, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, to "him that had the power of death, (or, 'who holds the empire of death,') that is the devil." (Heb. 2 : 14.) To refer again to the case of Job: was it not Satan who "smote Job with boils from the sole of his foot unto his crown?" (Job 2 : 7.) Was it not by spiritual agency that when David numbered the people the pestilence destroyed seventy thousand Israelites? (1 Chron. 21: 14-15.) Throughout the Gospel narratives, again, do we not find in various instances bodily disease attributed by our Lord Himself to Satanic power? It was Satan who, for eighteen years, had bound the deformed woman whom Jesus healed on the Sabbath Day. (Luke 13 : 10-16.) It was an evil spirit who possessed the poor, shuddering epilpeptic of whom we read in Mark's Gospel more particularly. (Mark 9 : 17-29.) And when we are told that Jesus "rebuked a fever," as when we read that He "arose and rebuked the winds and waves" of the tempestuous sea (Luke 4 : 39 ; Matt. 8 : 26), it is surely most reasonable to suppose that the rebuke was addressed, not to the natural phenomena, but to the spiritual agency which He discerned behind them. It is, indeed, an interesting inquiry, whether all diseases may not be traceable to Satanic power, but into this we cannot now appropriately enter.

MAN IS A DISCROWNED MONARCH.

Such, then, is the present condition of man. He is a discrowned monarch, whose dominion has passed into an enemy's hand; and hence "the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." (Rom. 8 : 22, 23.) But, blessed be God, the end is not yet. Though the glowing picture of Psalm 8 has never yet been fully realized in the past, it awaits a glorious accomplishment in the future; for the prophetic character of this Psalm is placed beyond all question by the application of it made by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (2 : 5-9); when, in the course of his demonstration of the superiority of the Son of God to men and angels, he writes: "For unto the angels hath He not but in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak. But one in a certain place testified, saying, What is man, that Thou art mindful of him or the son of man that Thou visitest him? Thou madest him a little lower than (marg. a little while lower than) the angels. Thou crownedst him with glory and honor, and didst set him over the works of Thy hands; Thou hast set all things in subjection under his feet." And he adds, "For in that He put all in subjection under Him, He left nothing that is not put under Him. But now we see not yet all things put under him, but we see Jesus, who was made a little (while) lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor."

FUTURE SUBJECTION OF THE WORLD.

In the light of this inspired comment we see that the language of the Psalm is prophetic rather than historical, and describes the future subjection of the world as it shall be to the Second Adam, with little more than a retrospective glance at the original subjection of the primeval world to the first Adam. Fully accepting this interpretation of the Psalm, Dr. De Burgh thus expounds the latter part of it: "'Thou madest him a little while lower than the angels.' This, with the aid of the Apostle's comment already quoted, we know relates to the humiliation and death of Him who is named emphatically 'the Son of Man'—'We see Jesus,' he says, 'who was made a little while lower than the angels, for the suffering of death. . . . that He by the grace of God should taste death for every man.' (Heb. 2 : 9.) That is as 'the Son of God,' and even as the incarnate Son of God, He was superior to angels (as shown in the preceding part of this chapter, and chapter 1); but by a double act of condescension He submitted to be made lower than them; that He might suffer for sinful man; as this Apostle elsewhere states first 'being made in fashion as a man,' and then further 'humbling Himself and becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross,' (Phil. 2 : 8)—that out of this extremest weakness He might perfect strength—'that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil.' (ver. 14.)

THE SECOND ADAM CROWNED.

"'And hast crowned Him with glory and honor.' This, by the same infallible interpreter, we are told relates to the Saviour's ascension: 'We see Jesus, who was made a little while lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor.' (Heb. 2 : 9.) 'We see' this—already is this part of the prophecy fulfilled, as well as the preceding clause—in that when He had by Himself purged our sins, He sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high. (Chap. 1 : 3.) To which even it has been suggested, reference had been before made in verse 1 (of the Psalm), in the words, 'Who hast set Thy glory above the heavens:' considering the Psalm as addressed to Christ. But Christ is throughout spoken of in the third person, as here 'Thou madest Him lower than the angels,'—'Thou crownest Him with glory and honor;' whence the address is rather to Jehovah respecting His purposes revealed in the Son.

THE CLIMAX OF DIGNITY.

"This, however, is not all. There is yet another step ascending before we reach the climax here chiefly celebrated—the stilling of the Enemy and Avenger, and the triumph of Redemption; for proceeds the Palmist: 'Thou madest Him have dominion over the works of Thy hands: Thou hast put all things under His feet.' This we might at first view suppose to be only an amplification of the foregoing clause, as further descriptive of the Redeemer's present glory, and also accomplished at the Ascension; and so it is often understood. But those who so explain it overlook the Apostle's comment, who thus expressly makes a distinction: 'For,' he says, after quoting these words, 'in that He put all in subjection under Him, He left nothing that is not put under Him. But now we see not yet all things put under Him; but we see Jesus (who was made a little while lower than the angels, for the suffering of death) crowned with glory and honor.'

"Most evident, indeed, is this when we look at the dominion here specified—not only the same originally bestowed on the first Adam, but far greater—and to the things to be subjected—not only 'the enemy,' yea, many enemies, whose power in the earth is still too obvious, but also all those subordinate ranks of creation that broke from man's rule at his fall and became involved in the general disorder that thence ensued. All these—yea, all—are already in purpose, and shall yet be in fact, put under the Redeemer's feet, in His character of 'The Second Adam' and 'Son of Man.'"

THE PERIOD OF ITS ATTAINMENT.

"This 'we see not yet.' If we ask when it shall be, we have the answer in another Psalm (110) where He is also prophesied of in His present Ascension glory, which says, 'The Lord (Jehovah) said unto my Lord, Sit Thou at My right hand, until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool.' That is, He now sits at the right hand of God 'from henceforth expecting till His enemies shall be made his footstool' (as the words are explained in a comment on them in another part of this same epistle, chap 10 : 13)—when the heavens shall no longer contain Him, but 'the day of His power'—His mediatorial power—having come, 'The Lord shall send the rod of His strength out of Zion, and He shall rule in the midst of His people.' Or, in the yet more strictly parallel New Testament prophecy, (Acts 3 : 21) 'Whom the heaven must receive until the times of the restitution of all things—the original word denotes the righting or reinstating of things that have been disturbed and disordered—'which God hath spoken of by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began,' and among them here by David. In a word, at His Second Advent, which is thus, together with His incarnation, death, resurrection, and ascension, foretold in this most remarkable prophecy, comprising in a few verses the whole mystery of redemption."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate Devoted the Greater Part of last week to a discussion of the iron and steel items of the new Tariff Bill. The general result was a reduction in the rate but, to what extent it will operate, there was no definite information given. Senator Miller, from New York, was prominent in his endeavors to raise rates rather than to reduce them. In one case he tried to induce the Senate to double the existing duty. It is evident that at the present rate of progress the Senate cannot get through its work on the bill at this session. At the end of last week the committee of the whole had not discussed quite a quarter of the clauses, and after that ground has been covered there will yet remain the submission of the results to the vote in the Senate. An idea of the difficulties which hinder progress on this question, may be gained from the report of a scene which occurred at a caucus of Republican Senators on January 25th. At the caucus Senator Conger declared that he should not vote for the bill, if lumber remained on the free list. Senator Allison expressed regret to hear it. He said that the example was one which might provoke imitation, or perhaps retaliation, and that other Senators, the interests of whose constituents had been put in jeopardy to an equal or greater extent, might on that account with an equal right turn against the bill, the passage of which in some form all recognized as a necessity. To that remark Senator Logan replied in a sarcastic vein. The only result of the caucus was the expression of an opinion that under the circumstances Republican Senators, at least, should restrain their desire to debate, and that the Senate should remain in much later session than it has been in the habit of doing.

The House Commenced the Consideration of its own Tariff Bill on January 26th. Judge Kelley, in introducing it, claimed that it was "the best Tariff Bill ever presented to the American Congress." He said all the reductions did not receive the approval of his individual judgment, for he feared they would result in harm to American interests; nevertheless he was prepared to stand by the bill in all its parts, and would submit no amendments except such as might be authorized by his committee. He realized that all such legislation must necessarily be enacted in a spirit of compromise. When asked what would be the result on the tariff if the bill should pass in its present form, Chairman Kelley said he did not believe anybody could even make a guess as to that, but the Treasury experts estimated the total net reduction at $20,855,799; his own estimate would be much larger, and neither included the reduction on account of the abolition of packages, inland transportation commissions, etc., which amount to about 10 per cent of the duties. A prediction, which is said to be endorsed by shrewd politicians in Washington, was made last week by a Republican Senator who said that the Senate would probably adopt its own bill, which was lower than that framed by the Tariff Commission, and the House would undoubtedly adopt its own bill, which was higher than that of the Commission. The differences would probably be compared in a Conference Committee, and it was not improbable that the Tariff Commission Bill would be recommended as a compromise between the two Houses. A more general impression, however, is that no Tariff Bill will be passed by this Congress.

The Question of the Coinage of the Silver dollar, which the public returns to the Treasury almost as soon as they are issued, was again brought under the attention of Congress last week. The Secretary of the Treasury addressed a letter to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, inviting attention to the amount of silver coin in hand, and the limited facilities for its safe keeping in the Sub-Treasury offices. The Secretary finally says: "It is apparent that this Congress should either discontinue the coinage of the standard silver dollars, or make suitable appropriations for building additional vaults in the East, and for the transportation of silver coin from San Francisco, no further space being available for building another vault at that point." The recent fall in the price of silver makes the actual value of the standard dollar eighty-one cents.

The Most Remarkable Evidence yet Produced in the Star Route trials was given last week. A witness named Andrew W. Moore testified to the effect that he was engaged by Miner to render services on the Dorsey routes in the West, and that he was "directed to report at Senator Dorsey's house for instructions and funds." He did so report, as he testifies, to "the head of the concern," from whom he received some very significant "instructions," and subsequently "funds" for services rendered. This was while Mr. Dorsey was still in the Senate. Moore admitted on the stand that he knew he was joining "a conspiracy to rob the government," and stated that he was to get "one fourth of the stealings" as his share of the plunder.

The Decision Overthrowing the Prohibition amendment in Iowa will be considered at a State Convention of the friends of temperance, summoned for the 7th of February. The meeting will be for consultation as to the best course to be pursued in the present situation of the prohibition cause in the State. An Iowa journalist says: "If the temperance people bide their time patiently and attempt nothing rash, they will doubtless succeed in getting the amendment resubmitted to the people, and in carrying it again by as large a majority as it received last June. But any ill-considered movement, such as an attempt to force the Governor to call an extra session of the Legislature, may prove fatal to the cause."

The Christian Work Among the Female clerks in the stores of Chicago, recently commenced by "the Women's Bible Work," has received such encouragement as to suggest the organization of a similar effort in other cities. The plan adopted in Chicago is, at noon-time once or twice a week, and with the consent of their proprietors, to visit shops where any considerable number of girls are employed, to read the Bible to them, to sing with them, and, as far as is possible, to have prayer and personal religious conversation. At least four fifths of the proprietors of the establishments, thus far visited, have cordially welcomed the "Workers" and afforded them facilities for the prosecution of their work. The girls also are interested, and many who go home to their dinners remain in their shops the days appointed for these visits. Two girls have already given good evidence that they had become Christians as the results of the work.

Mormon Missionaries have Received an Unequivocal intimation that their presence is not desired in South Carolina. Two middle-aged men arrived in the town of Rockville, York County, on January 25th. They gave their names as Elders John M. Eaton and Angus McKay, of Salt Lake City, missionaries of the Church of Latter Day Saints, and announced their intention of entering at once upon the work of proselytism. A committee of the young men of the town waited on them the same evening, and warned them to leave the county within twenty-four hours on pain of being tarred and feathered and ridden on a rail. They went away the next morning.

The Thirtieth Anniversary of the New York Young Men's Christian Association was held on January 23d. Over a thousand friends of the association assembled on the occasion. President Noah Porter, of Yale College, delivered an earnest address, in the course of which he said: "The Young Men's Christian Association, has been in existence not quite a generation, and has come up to vigorous growth from a slender beginning. It grew out of a movement for benefitting young men in a general way, for providing them libraries and lectures and reading rooms. This recognition of young men as a class was a new thing in modern times, and seems to have grown out of a similar social movement some fifty or sixty years ago." President Porter dwelt on the benefits of such associations in forming the character and conduct of young men. He said: "Without character and conduct civilization cannot stand. The world has gone a long way in reaching this conclusion, but we welcome all who hold it. To-day character and conduct must be secured or society will sink under its acquisitions and fall to pieces under its enlightenment. If we have not them, whatever we gain, we are lost as a community by the very insight and reach of our intellectual advancement."

The Home of Industry in New York for the reclamation of criminals, established by Michael Dunn, himself a reformed criminal, celebrated its fourth anniversary last week at the mission room, 40 East Houston Street. Mr. Dunn in opening the proceedings said: "I thank God for what he has done for me; I was in prison five times before I was twelve years old, and have spent thirty-five years in eleven different prisons. When God converted me, I determined to help other criminals, and finally started this home. It has lasted four years now, and one thousand and one men have been received here and helped to an honest and Christian life." About twenty other persons spoke, all formerly criminals, but reformed through this institution. They spoke with the deepest gratitude of Michael Dunn's kindness. One said: "I am fifty-five years old, and have spent thirty-two of those years in prison. Have been in fifteen different prisons, in Paris and London and elsewhere. About six weeks ago, I chanced to come here and have been saved." A report was read, showing that nearly 600 men had been helped to get work. At the home there have been manufactured and sold brooms worth $12,000 last year, with a profit of $1100. The inmates were now making mats also. It is hoped ultimately to pay half the expenses of the Home in this way.

A Wife's Prayers Answered on her Deathbed.—The following incident was related last week at the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting: "I have just come from the dying-bed of a Christian woman," a speaker said. "She is a victim of her husband's dissipation. He has long been a slave of drink, and her anxiety and watching and earnest efforts to save him have brought on consumption. But the desire of her heart has at last been granted. For years she has prayed God for the salvation of her husband. Many times she has invited this meeting to unite in prayer with her. These prayers have been answered, and the husband is saved! God has broken the hard heart, and the dying wife feels that she can welcome death, now that her husband is saved."

A Lonely Little Traveller Passed through this State last week on her way West. Among the passengers on a train on the Erie Railway there was a little nine-year-old girl, entirely unattended, on her way to join relatives at Pontiac, Ill. The little girl informed an inquirer that she had come all alone via. Anchor Line steamer from Lexton, England; that her father and mother were both dead; that she had expected her uncle to meet her in New York; but that for some reason he had been unable to do so, and she was going on across the continent alone. She said her father used to be an officer in the British Army, and she had been to India with him before he died. She is described as a very bright and precocious child, and she won the friendship of the conductor and all the passengers who heard her story. We may hope that the little orphan completed her four thousand mile journey without mishap, and received a warm welcome. It was a trying experience for so youthful a traveller, and one which few children would have had the courage to undergo. Her faith in her relatives must have been far stronger than that men are disposed to place in God, when they quail before the trials a Christian must suffer in the journey of life, before he receives compensation in heaven (Heb. 11 : 25, 26).

A Mouse that Wore a Diamond Ring was captured in Boston recently. The Boston Journal states that a lady in Beacon Street, some months ago, missed a valuable diamond ring from her dressing table, where she had laid it on retiring to rest. As no one else had been in the room, the loss of the ring was incomprehensible, but though a thorough search was made, it could not be found. Latterly the same lady had some valuable lace mutilated by mice, and she procured a trap and set it in her bed-room. Three mice were caught, and to the lady's amazement she saw, sparkling on the body of one of them, her lost diamond ring. It is supposed that the mouse, in scampering across her dressing-table, had thrust its head through the ring, and in its efforts to get it off had only caused it to be more firmly fixed. It had evidently suffered great pain from its costly girdle. Precious as the gem was to its owner, the little thief must have regarded it as a burden. In time to come it is not unlikely that the value set upon such expensive articles of adornment, even by those who now delight in them, will approximate that of the mouse more nearly than that of the lady (II. Pet. 3 : 3 and 4).

An Undermined City in Pennsylvania is in peril. On Wednesday, January 24th, the inhabitants of Wilkesbarre, Pa., were alarmed early in the morning by subterranean rumblings resembling those of an earthquake, and by the rocking and trembling of the houses. Great alarm prevailed, and in a few moments the streets were crowded with men, women and children, all wild with fright. Shock speedily followed shock, and the crash of falling ceilings and the noise of rending wood were heard above the screams of the women and children. In a few minutes, however, some degree of quiet was restored, and the men, lighting lamps and lanterns, proceeded to investigate the cause of all the alarm. It was soon discovered that the surface had caved in, and that the ground was covered with cracks and fissures. A space of over forty acres, under which is an old mine, had sunk. In many places the earth sank more than a foot below the level. The front foundation walls of some houses are bulged out fully thirty inches. Great cracks are observed in the stone work, while the heavy timbers that support the balconies have been thrown out of place and hang nearly suspended from their original support. The houses look as though they would tumble forward at any minute. The foundations have been moved in some cases several feet out of place, and a great many other damages sustained. The walks are torn up as if by an explosion. The trouble is accounted for upon the theory that the props put in some time ago in the old mine to sustain the roof, have rotted or been burned away by a fire raging underneath. "Volunteer explorers, having neither mothers, wives, nor sweethearts," are called for to descend into the mine. All the inhabitants who can leave the threatened neighborhood have done so. There is a general fear that the worst is yet to come, and the people are naturally anxious to be out of the reach of the disaster. Would that men displayed a similar anxiety to escape the destruction assuredly coming on the earth (2 Pet. 3 ; 10).

A Child's Prayer was Overheard by her mother recently in a town in New York State. It was very suggestive, and though not expressed in the language usually used in devotion, might in its spirit be offered with advantage by older people. The little one, who had been taught the efficacy of prayer, was accustomed to add, of her own accord, to the prayers she had been taught, a petition on her own account. She was aware that she had not been particularly good on a certain day, and her evening prayers were thus supplemented: "I pray the Lord to make Lily a good little girl, and if at first you don't succeed, try, try again." The work of sanctification which the Holy Spirit carries on in the soul, is often obstructed by our own wilfulness; it is then in sad consciousness of our sin that we have need to offer the child's prayer (Psa. 51 : 9-12).

A Lady's Life was Saved in a Remarkable way on the Elevated Railroad last week. She apparently failed to notice the station at which she wished to alight, when the train reached it, for she sat still in the car while a large number of passengers went out. The conductor gave the signal to start, and was closing the gates when she made a rush for the gate. It was not closed, and she stepped on the platform just as the train started. The platform of the station is smooth, and in getting off her foot slipped. She lost her presence of mind, and to save herself from falling, took hold of the iron stanchions of the car platform gate with one hand—her right—and as she fell on her knees and swung round she caught the stanchion with the other hand, and was so dragged along the station platform to what appeared to be certain destruction. Jumping on the station platform, the conductor seized the woman by the waist and wrenched her hands from the stanchion. They were within four feet of the guard rail at the end of the platform, when her hold was broken, and in a fraction more of time would have been maimed or killed. The lady was distracted by her fright, or she would have seen that her only hope was in releasing her hold of the moving train, and it was well for her that some one was at hand to force her to do so. May not it be that some of our sharp trials in life have a similar design. God, by His providence, forces us to give up our hold on the world and its pleasures that our souls may be drawn toward Him (Psa. 119 : 67).

A Lighthouse Keeper Proved his Devotion to duty under trying circumstances during the recent bitter weather. A despatch from Long Branch, N. J., states that Job Smith, the keeper of the twin lights in the lighthouse on the Highlands of Navesink, nearly lost his life during the late cold wave. One severe night last month the lard-oil which is used in the great lanterns, froze; it was necessary to apply heat to the pipes through which the oil passes from the tank below to the towers where the lights are situated. For this purpose Keeper Smith used an ordinary alcohol flambeau. Standing directly underneath the large lantern in the tower on the south end, the keeper held the flambeau above his head. From some cause not known the fluid, ignited and poured in a burning stream of fire down upon his head. Maddened with pain and blinded by the burning oil, Smith rushed from the building, enveloped in flames. By plunging himself into the deep snow, he succeeded in extinguishing the fire. Notwithstanding the unfortunate man's face and hands were shockingly burned, the brave fellow again entered the lighthouse building, warmed the oil, and lighted the great lanterns that warn the mariner from the treacherous beach. Despite his terrible wounds he watched the lights until daybreak, when he managed to signal assistance from the village below. The head keeper then took Smith's place, and the suffering man was carried to his home in the lowlands, and medical aid summoned. The Christian who sees around him many a spiritual craft drifting to wreck, and yet utters no warning, may well learn a lesson from this devotion (Phil. 2 ; 15).

THE USE OF THE BOW.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And David lamented with this lamentation over Saul and over Jonathan his son: (Also he bade them teach the children of Judah the use of the bow: behold, it is written in the book of Jasher.)"—2 Samuel 1 : 17, 18.

A Military Order—I. Activity a Solace for Sorrow—Of Bereavement—Of Disappointment—Alexander Cruden's Love-Trouble—New Work Especially Efficacious—A Rich Venetian's Rescue from Suicide—II. An Admirable Use of Disaster—Learn its Lessons—Find out the Weak Places—Something to be Learned from Satan—A Call to Action—III. A Noble Monument to a Friend—Go Where They Have Gone—The Best Memorial to Christ—IV. Use the Spiritual Bow—The Bow of Prayer—The Men that Save a Nation—Alarmed by an Answer to Prayer.

THE translators have acted very properly in inserting the words, "the use of," for that is what the passage means; but if you read it without those words the sense is still the same—"he bade them teach the children of Judah, the bow," that is to say, how to use the bow.

I accept the passage as our learned translators understood it: David bade them teach the children of Judah the bow. If any inquire, "What then is the connection? Why should David teach the people the use of the bow because Saul and Jonathan were slain? Why is the military order concerning the use of a certain instrument of war inserted here, when the passage is full of lamentation?" I answer—most fitly, as I shall have to show you. It was the best memorial of that skilful archer Jonathan, and of the other princes who had fallen by the arrows of the Philistines, that from the disastrous day of their slaughter David caused his own tribe over which he had chief power to be trained in the use of that special weapon of war.

ACTIVITY AS A SOLACE.

I. But now to our work. From my text I want to gather a few useful lessons. And the first is this: activity is a valuable solace for sorrow. The people were very grieved; for Saul and Jonathan, the king and the crown prince, were slain. David indulges their grief; he writes them a plaintive song which the daughters of Israel may sing. But to take off their minds from their distress he at the same time issues the order to teach the children of Judah the use of the bow, for activity is an effectual remedy in the time of sorrow. Certainly the opposite of it would tend toward blank despair. Are any of you in great grief? Have you suffered a supreme loss? Do not be tempted to brood over your affliction, and to think that you ought to be excused from further service. Do not shut yourself up alone to ruminate upon the great ill that has befallen you, so as to nurse your wrath against God: this can do you no good whatever. Rather imitate David, who, when his child was sick, fasted and prayed; but when it was dead, went into the house and ate bread, for he said, "Can I bring him back again? I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me." I beseech you do not fall under the temptation of Satan to cease from your daily activity, and especially from any holy service in which you are engaged for Christ.

It may be that your sorrow is not a bereavement, but disappointment in your work. You have not won those souls that you looked to win, and some that you thought were converted have gone back; and now Satan tempts you to do no more—never to cast the net again, for you have toiled all night and taken nothing—never to sow again, for you have wasted your seed by the highway, and birds have devoured it. This is

A SUGGESTION OF THE EVIL ONE.

It will lead you into deeper anguish. I would say to thee, O mourner, get thee up from the couch of ease! Shake thyself from the dust, O virgin daughter of Zion! Sit not down upon the dunghill in thy grief, but bestir thyself, lest thou sink into blacker woe, and thy bitterness become as wormwood and gall.

While inaction will lead into blank despair, I am certain that work distracts the mind from the sad point upon which it is apt to thrust itself. Noth ing is more healthy than to have work to do. I have seen persons of leisure give way most terribly in the case of the loss of children; while I have known laboring people, who, I believe, have been as sensitive in heart, who have kept up bravely. Under God, I have attributed the difference to the fact that the poor woman must go to earn her daily bread, or must get about her domestic duties whatever happens, and the poor man must do his daily task, or else the family will be in need; thus toil has proved to be a blessed necessity by withdrawing the mind from the sorrow which would have engrossed it.

You have heard of Alexander Cruden. Perhaps you do not know that he was and had certain other trials which drove him nearly mad; and yet Alexander Cruden did not become insane, for he engaged upon the immense work of forming a concordance of sacred Scripture, which concordance has become the great instrument by which we search the Word of God. This work kept him from becoming altogether insane. If I had to prescribe to "a mind diseased," I would say, "Enter upon good work, and keep at it." Dear friends, if you are in trouble, and Satan tempts you to get alone, and to cease from the work of the Lord, resist the injurious suggestion.

God the Holy Spirit is most likely to comfort you, and to apply the precious promises of His word to your soul, if you pursue your Master's work with all your heart. Attend to His business, and He will attend to your business. Tell poor sinners about His wounds, and He will bind up yours. Forget your cross in His. Forget your griefs in the griefs of the sons of men who are perishing for lack of knowledge; and you shall find the readiest way to consolation.

A valuable solace for sorrow is activity, especially, I think, in reference to new work. It will help you much if a new trouble suggests to you new service. Old work does not always take off the mind from its vexations, for we are apt to do it mechanically, and as a matter of routine; but something altogether fresh will aid us to forget our trial. Oh, to strike out some new path! To invent new honors for Jesus, new enterprises for His kingdom, new attractions for His Gospel—this will help to charm away our griefs.

With many, the doing of any kind of service for Christ will be quite a novelty. I grieve to say it. These people are desponding. I am not so grieved at that, because if any man will not work, neither shall he eat; and if a Christian will not serve his Master, he shall not feast with the King's worthies. Oh, how much of joy many of you miss by not doing more for the poor, more for the ignorant, more for Christ! The poet Rogers tells us—and he throws the story into poetry which I forget—of who was the subject of despair, and became such a hypochondriac that he went down to the canal to drown himself; but on the way he was met by a poor little boy who tugged at his skirts, and begged for bread. When the rich man called him an impostor, the boy besought him to come home with him, and see his father and mother who were dying of starvation. He went up into the room, and found the family literally perishing for lack of food. He laid out the money which he had in his pocket in making them all glad with a hearty meal, and then said to himself that there was something worth living for after all. He had found a novel enjoyment, which gave a fresh motive for living.

I would like to ask you who have suffered a great trouble whether the Lord may not be pressing you by this means into a new path of delight, directing you to a fresh method of glorifying God and doing good to your fellow-men. I will sing you a song if you will, as sorrowful as David's lament; but I would rather teach you the use of the bow. I believe that I shall minister better to your comfort if I enlist you as soldiers in Christ's army, and teach you to use His weapons, than if I should console you with the most plaintive minstrelsy of sadness.

Do I speak to any here present who endure great earthly afflictions, but know nothing of spiritual things? Is it not the case that God often brings His wandering children to Himself by distresses? The way in which you are to be comforted, dear friends, is not by going into the world again, and seeking further pleasures there. If God means to bless you, He may allow you to become so hungry that you may wish to fill your belly with the husks. You have spent your living riotously, and now you are ready to despair. Round by that dark corner of despair may be the way to your Father's house. To expel your present temporal grief you need a spiritual grief concerning sin. If you learn of Jesus at this hour to repent of sin, and to put your trust in Him, your soul will be roused to say, "I will arise, and go unto my Father," and then you will lose your hunger, and forget the swine-trough. Where? Why, amid the music and dancing of your Father's house, and in the joy of hearing Him say, 'Let us eat, and be merry; for this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found."

Yes, David was right. The way to raise the people out of their despondency was to teach them the use of the bow; their own arrows would slay their griefs; and the way to get you mourning ones out of your sorrow is to teach you those holy activities which lead a soul to trust in Christ, and to find salvation at His feet.

That is the first lesson which, I think, the text teaches.

II. A second lesson is that

is to learn its lessons. What was the disaster? Saul and Jonathan had been shot by archers. The Philistines were evidently strong in the use of the bow; but Saul's army was short of archers, and so they were not able to smite the Philistines at a distance. Before they came to close quarters, where Israel might have been a match for Philistia, the arrows of the Philistines had reached their king. Had they known how to use the bow, they might have been conquerors; and therefore David hastens to teach the men of Judah the use of the bow.

Beloved friends, I will suppose that you have met with failures: I refer to disasters peculiar to yourselves. What shall you do? Sit down and fret and trouble yourselves, and give up in despair? God forbid. As the men of Judah learned the use of the bow through their being beaten by the bow, so do you gather wisdom from that which has befallen you. Have you been made to fly before your adversary? Then

FIND OUT WHERE YOUR WEAKNESS IS.

Search and see. Is it a sin indulged? Is it some point where you ought to have been guarded, but where you have been unwatchful? Is it weakness in prayer? Is it neglect of the Word of God? Is it indifference to Divine truth? Is it coldness of heart? Or what is it? If you have been defeated, there is a cause for it. If you have been cast down and brought low, say unto God, "Show me wherefore Thou contendest with me." Has the Lord a controversy with you? Be not content till you have got to the bottom of it, and found out the root that bears this gall and wormwood.

Is not this the way of wisdom? May it not happen that the cause of the disaster is that God is not with you? What if nothing prospers with you? What if it is vain for you to rise up early, and sit up late, and eat the bread of carefulness, since the hand of God is against you? What if you are to have no pleasure in the things that once gave you satisfaction, because God has set you as a target for His arrows, and in wrath is shooting at you? It may be so. Or you may not be one of His children at all as yet, and He may be tossing you to and fro like a ball, that you may never find rest until you humbly come and cry to Christ, and seek mercy at His hands. Look and see whether it be so. It is of no use to worry about the disaster; search out the cause of it. Strive to learn the lesson which it is meant to teach you. Is there any secret sin with you?

Perhaps by looking at the defeat you may learn the way to victory. David judged that if they were defeated by the bow they might yet win by the bow. It is right to learn from our adversaries. There is SOMETHING TO BE LEARNED FROM SATAN.

If he goes about, let us be diligent; if he seeks whom he may devour, let us seek whom we may save; and if he watches carefully to find out our weak points, let us watch those whom we would bless to find out how we may best reach their hearts. Many a man has grown rich through poverty, healthy through sickness, and holy by being made conscious of sin. When he has been struck down, then has he cried out to God, and God has lifted him up. Woe to that man who will not "hear the rod, and Him that hath appointed it."

I pray that you may diligently learn the lesson which every disaster would teach. May not a misfortune which happens to a church and to Christian people be to them a call to action—to general action? Saul had a little standing army, and did not drill all the nation for war; but David says, "I will teach all my own tribe the use of the bow." Now, whenever a church begins to get low, dull, stupid—and many churches go in that direction—when everybody seems to be asleep, and the minister's sermon is a kind of sanctified snore, and all the worship is steeped in slumber, why, what is to be done? Then is the time to teach the children of Judah the use of the bow, and to wake them all up to holy enterprise. Say to them, "You must not allow a few to be doing the work of Christ, but all must do it. You must all be taught the use of the bow." It was the glory of the Moravians that all their members were missionaries; and such ought to be the glory of every church; every man, woman, and child in the church should take part in the battle for Jesus. This, by God's grace, is the cure for spiritual decline; teach the people the use of the bow.

Let us learn lessons from defeat. Let us learn from the sin which has cast us down to cry unto God, the mighty One, to hold us up. If we are at this time under some great failure in life, let us learn greater care; if we have been permitted to err, let us

LEARN TO WATCH.

Do not sullenly confess, "I have done wrong:" but repent of it, and ask God for grace that you may be upheld in future, like Peter, who was stronger after his fall than before it, and was set to strengthen his brethren. What is done cannot be undone, but we may so learn from it by God's teaching that we may never do the like again. May God grant that this may be the case. If it were proper, I could sing to you to-night a song of mourning over the disasters of a soul, or of a church; but I believe that I should not do you half so much good as by stirring you up to learn the use of the bow, that is to say, to rectify your errors, and supply your defects.

III. Now, thirdly, another lesson.

is to imitate his excellences. How does that come from the text? Why, thus. When Jonathan and David communed together they fixed the meeting by Jonathan's shooting certain arrows; it is evident that Jonathan was a man who greatly favored the use of the bow; and though his father did not largely introduce it into the army, yet Jonathan was well skilled therein. "Well then," says David, "in memory of Jonathan, instead of piling up a great monument, we will teach the children of Judah the use of the bow."

Come, brethren, let this be your memorial to your dear father—if he was a child of God, be like him. If you want to keep in memory your beloved mother, exhibit in yourselves the virtues that shone in her. That sweet child of yours has gone to heaven, and can never be forgotten, and her likeness hangs over the mantelpiece. I mean that dear little child who sang of Jesus when she died; if you want to remember her beyond all forgetfulness, then love her Saviour, and go where little Jane has gone. No memorial is more fit than imitation; be yourself the monument by exhibiting within yourself all that was good in the dear departed one.

How specially true is this in connection with our Divine Lord! I see the Romanist continually putting up crosses by the roadside, and sometimes on these there are hideous representations of a person dying by crucifixion, and there are nails, and sponge, and spear, and I know not what. This arises out of a natural desire to perpetuate the memory of the crucified Redeemer; but you will do far better, dear brother, if you are yourself crucified with Christ, and if you exhibit in your own person that divine self-denial; that blessed love, that superlative holiness, which were found in Him.

THE BEST MEMORIAL.

Some will build a church, and lavish money upon architecture. I shall not condemn them, for their splendid generosity may savor of the spirit of that woman who broke the alabaster box, and poured the ointment upon the Saviour's feet; but I would suggest that to build up within one's self, by the power of God's Spirit, the Christ-like character is a better memorial than the best piece of architecture that can ever be put together. What if you should employ the greatest of statuaries, and he, with cunning hand, should mould the marble till it emulated life? Would not the monument mainly keep in mind the artist, and rather make men think of the costliness of the work than of anything else? Whereas, if you become yourself, not in marble, but in living flesh, the image of Christ, then men will take knowledge of you that you have been with Jesus, and have learned of Him, and this will keep Him best in memory.

If we do what Christ would have done under our circumstances, we shall be exhibiting a far better memorial of Him than wealth can possibly purchase. When David taught these people the use of the bow, every time they stringed an arrow they might remember Jonathan; and whenever a regiment of archers went through the streets to the butts they brought Jonathan before the public mind. David instituted this form of royal artillery on purpose that Jonathan might be kept in mind. And you, dear friends, every time you go forth to do the service of God, obediently and zealously, as Jesus did it, you put men in mind of Jesus, and they say, "God has set these men in the world to be witnesses for Christ, to keep His name alive in the earth. These men are a blessing because Jesus Himself has blessed them." I would thus stir you all up to endeavor all the days of your life so to live and serve God that the name of Jesus Christ shall be kept alive in this nation, and throughout the world.

THE SPIRITUAL BOW.

IV. Lastly, and but for a moment, I think that the form which this military order took, to teach the children of Judah the use of the bow, may be allegorically applied to-night to you, dear friends. It is a great advantage to believers to learn the use of the bow spiritually. First, there is the bow of prayer. Its use has not gone out of date; but I wish that all of us knew how to shoot the arrows of the Lord's deliverance much better than we do. Holy men of old would pick out an arrow, and when they had chosen it they knew how to use it. They knew what they wanted, and they prayed for it. They fitted their arrow on the string; that is to say, they took God's promise—the promise that answered to their desire, and fitting the one to the other, they took straight aim at heaven, and watched the flight of the arrowy petition. They knew to whom they were praying, as well as what they were praying for, and why they expected to be heard; and so they drew the bow of prayer with all their might.

When the man of God went up to the top of Carmel, and there took his bow and drew it, there was no fear of his missing the mark; or if, perchance, the arrow had not force enough, he would pull the bow a second time, and a third time, and a fourth time, and a seventh time, till at last the arrow struck the mark. He would not come down from his watch-tower till he knew that the arrow of his prayer was lodged in heaven. In all times of tribulation what is wanted is that the children of Judah should know the use of the bow of prayer.

NATIONAL SAVIOURS.

When we heard of those fearful assassinations in Ireland, the news reached the bulk of us on the Sabbath-day, and men of God went to their loop-holes of retreat, and shot up to heaven prayers for poor Ireland. It was the best thing that could be done. I have more faith in prayer than in police and prisons. In any time of national need the men that save a nation are the men of prayer. What, not the wise statesmen? Certainly, wise statesmen; but who makes them wise? God has power over all minds, and, in answer to the prayer from this pulpit, He can visit yonder mind in St. Stephen's. From a humble cottage in the western highlands there may go up to God a cry that shall come down upon the Prime Minister, and direct his thoughts.

Remember what Queen Mary used to say when she wanted to bring popery back to Scotland. She said that she was more afraid of John Knox's prayers than of all the armies that the Scottish lords could get together. She was right for once. When men overlook prayer they overlook the greatest factor in human affairs. The mystic rod of God is in the hand of many a Moses still among us—a rod which brings victory to Israel, and defeat to Amalek. The strength of the church lies not in the oratory of the pulpit, but in the oratory of the closet. That Church of God that shall do most for the world is the church that shall do most with God.

He can rule men for God who is ruled by God for men; he that giveth up his soul to God that God may write His will upon his life is the mighty man. The man who has had the will of God wrought in him by the Holy Ghost, and can work it out into fervent prayer is the man who, though princes and potentates know it not, sits nearer to the helm of affairs than they can reach. I could write you a plaintive hymn about the woes of Ireland and about the sins of men and the evils of the times; but I had far rather teach you the use of the bow of prayer; for then, if you could send your longings up to the Lord, full many a blessing would come upon the land, and the adversaries of the Lord would be discomforted, and peaceful and happy days would dawn.

ALARMED BY AN ANSWERED PRAYER.

Perhaps I speak to some here who do not know anything about praying. I dare say that the brother is here who listened to a sermon on Peckham Rye, which was rather a wild one, I am afraid. In that discourse the preacher said to all his congregation that if they would go home and ask God for anything the Lord would give it to them. I cannot endorse so wild a statement. However this man thought that the preacher having said it, it was true, and having never prayed before in all his life, he put the question to the test of a certain event; and that certain event fell out as he desired. Then he began to tremble, for he judged that assuredly there is a God.

Now, I do not say to you, dear hearers, that whatsoever all of you shall ask in prayer you shall receive. I would not say that to you ungodly ones. But I do say that if you will ask for mercy and salvation and eternal life, and anything that is promised to believing sinners, you shall have it. I wish you would try the experiment, for you would find that the Lord never breaks a promise. If you read a promise made to a sinner, it is made to you; go and plead it, and the Lord will grant it. I will be surety for Him that He will keep His word. Trust Him and try, and thus learn the use of the bow. God bless you for Christ's sake. Amen.

THE LATE M. LEON GAMBETTA.

THE death of the foremost Frenchman of the time, on the last day, and almost the last hour, of the past year was mentioned in a former number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the department of Foreign Topics. This week with a portrait of the brilliant statesman, which is on the next page, we give a brief sketch of his eventful career.

Léon Michel Gambetta was born at Cahors, in France, on the 3d of April, 1838. Though a Frenchman by birth he was of Italian descent, and his temperament showed that Italian blood flowed in his veins. His father was a tradesman of some considerable station and wealth; his mother's maiden name was Massabie.

It was at first intended that Léon should follow his father's trade; but, as he was a boy very apt at learning and fond of books, the father was persuaded to educate him for a priest.

While Gambetta was at the seminary, his tutors foretold that he would make a great figure in life, "but never," they regretfully added, "as a Churchman." The boy began well, but he had evidently no vocation for the strict discipline of the Church; he was too disputatious, not meek enough about taking blows without returning them, and, in short, too headstrong. His clerical tutors at length abandoned the attempt to train him, and in handing him over to secular teachers, characterized him as "a turbulent rebellious spirit." Young Gambetta was accordingly sent to the lycée—that is, the lay public school—of Cahors, where insubordination was charged against him. Finally, aided clandestinely by his mother he ran away to Paris, and taking up his quarters in the student haunts he commenced

THE STUDY OF THE LAW.

After a time his father was induced to forgive his flight, and agreed to furnish him with money to prosecute his studies.

LOSES THE SIGHT OF AN EYE.

When he was in his sixteenth year, an accident, which destroyed his left eye, occasioned him much pain and grief, and from the exuberance of youthful hope and high spirits, he sank for a time into despondency. Finding, however, that his fears that he would lose the sight of his other eye were not realized, he recovered his spirits and renewed his studies.

In Paris Gambetta was known among the students as an ultra-Republican, and he quickly drew the attention of the imperial police upon himself by acting as ringleader in those demonstrations which the students of the Latin Quarter were accustomed to make in times of public excitement.

His influence in the student world was very great, and at the Café Racine, where he spent a couple of hours every evening, he became the leader of an informal literary and political association, whose members were recruited from among artists and the most brilliant pupils of the Schools of Law and Medicine. Gambetta was at this time a handsome man, with dark flowing hair, not curly, but thick and clustering; a somewhat Jewish face, dazzling teeth, and a powerful, melodious voice.

But Gambetta did not spend all his time at the café. By day he worked very busily as secretary to M. Adolphe Crémieux, a stanch Republican, a devoted patriot, and the leader of the Israelite Universelle, a society devoted to promoting the welfare of the Hebrew race, to which he belonged. Crémieux had been a member of the Provisional Government of 1848, and had a large practice at the Bar of Paris. Before entering M. Crémieux's office, Gambetta had served for awhile under M. Charles Lachaud, the most eloquent and popular counsel in criminal causes.

DEFENCE OF A REPUBLICAN EDITOR.

Gambetta was utterly unknown outside the little world of the students' cafés, until he at a bound leaped to the summit of popularity with the Republicans by a speech which he delivered on the 17th of November, 1868, before the notorious Judge Delesvaux (who has been called the Jeffreys of the Second Empire) in defence of Louis Charles Delescluze, editor of the Réveil. The Réveil had started a subscription for erecting a monument to the memory of M. Baudin, who was shot at the barricades on the terrible 2d December, 1851, when Napoleon III., in grasping supreme power, struck terror into the hearts of the Parisians by firing cannon down the crowded streets. Napoleon, recognizing in the movement to erect a monument to one of his dead victims an affront to himself and his government, unwisely instituted a prosecution against the editor. It was late in the afternoon when the case was called on after a number of others, but the chamber was crowded with journalists and barristers. Just before Gambetta rose, Delesvaux observed: "I suppose you have not much to say; so it will hardly be worth while to have the gas lighted." "Never mind the gas, sir, I will throw light enough on this affair," answered Gambetta, and it was amid the laughter produced by this joke that he began. His genius found vent that day, and he poured forth a torrent of scathing eloquence in which the Emperor and his creatures were mercilessly castigated.

"They saw a ship approaching and signalled."

When Gambetta left the court that night it was felt by all who had heard him that he was the coming man of the Republican party; and next day Opposition journals of every shade of opinion from one end of France to the other acclaimed him as a leader.

ELECTED TO THE LEGISLATURE.

When he made his great speech the General Election of 1869 was at hand; he was forthwith invited to stand for Paris and Marseilles, and elected in both constituencies. He chose Marseilles, and taking his seat, waged relentless war on the Emperor.

The Franco-Prussian War broke out in 1870. On the night of the 3d of September tidings of the Emperor's surrender at Sedan arrived at Paris. Before five o'clock the next day the Deputies for Paris, with the exception of M. Thiers, had constituted themselves into a government, which, at the suggestion of M. Rochefort, took the name of Government of the National Defence; and M. Gambetta received the appointment of Minister of the Interior.

THE SIEGE OF PARIS

brought M. Gambetta to the most romantic part of his career. The National Defence Government had delegated two of their members, MM. Cremieux and Glaiz-Bizoin, to go to Tours and govern the provinces; but being both elderly men of weak health they were not equal to their work; and early in October M. Gambetta was requested by his old friend, Cremieux, to join them. He had to leave Paris in a balloon, and in going over the German lines nearly met with misadventure through the balloon sinking till it came within range of some marksmen's rifles. He reached Tours in safety, however, and set to work at once with marvellous activity to organize resistance against the invasion. His efforts were vain, for the raw levies he raised, though inspired with ardor and brave to temerity, were no match for the trained troops of Prussia. Then came the capitulation, and Gambetta, heart-broken, retired to Spain, where he remained during the frightful excesses of the Commune.

He returned when the Republic was proclaimed, and took his seat in the Legislature. Neither Thiers nor MacMahon was a Republican at heart, and it was expected on all hands that the monarchy would be restored, either in the person of the Bourbon or the Orleanist house. But Gambetta led the forces in defence of Republican principles, and thwarted every attempt at treachery. He succeeded in forcing MacMahon to resign, and substituted M. Grevy, in his stead.

DEATH.

On November 27th, 1882, he met with a pistol accident at his residence, Ville d'Avray, near Sèvres, when he was wounded in the hand. From that time his condition became one of deepening anxiety, and for several days his death was known by his intimate friends to be inevitable. The moment an abscess was discovered in the iliac cavity, the dilemma was presented to the doctors of letting him die by re-absorption of pus, or performing a surgical operation which he was too weak to bear. He gradually sank and died of embolism on December 31st, 1882, at the age of 44.

Though M. Gambetta was a man of most brilliant talents, he appears to have been utterly destitute of religious principle. He was a materialist, if not an avowed atheist, and splendid as his career was, it is impossible to review it without a gloomy consciousness that in the light of eternity it was a failure.

A DOUBLE RESCUE.

(See Illustration.)

"A NIGHT and a day have I been in the deep," is the Apostle Paul's brief statement of an experience, the horrors of which can be fully realized only by those who have passed through it. (II. Cor. 11 : 25.) From the deck of some great ocean steamer in mid-Atlantic, the aspect of the heaving, restless water impresses one with its power and pitiless fury. Many an emigrant, crossing for the first time, and looking down into those rolling billows, has shuddered to think that but a few inches of timber are between him and that fathomless abyss.

But what must it be to be actually in the water, clinging for dear life to some floating spar and hoping against hope for rescue? Only a short time ago two men were picked up by a trans-Atlantic ship, after being for a day and two nights in that terrible condition. The story they told was one of the most thrilling any man lived to tell. Both were emigrants, and neither had ever been to sea before. They were aroused from their slumbers on the fourth night of their voyage by the cry of fire, and by a stifling smoke which filled the steerage. Looking up in the half-dazed state of men only half awake, they saw the flames within a few feet of the place where they lay. Leaping to their feet they ran upon deck to find a scene of undescribable confusion.

It required but a short time to convince every one that the fire had acquired too much headway to be extinguished. The cry was raised, "The boats! the boats!" The first boat was launched and manned, and as many women placed on board as it would hold. The second and third boats were also launched and then all the women on board were safely in the boats.

She could not float more than half an hour longer, and the captain having filled the last boat with the most feeble and infirm of the men, gave orders to cut away all the spars and pieces of wood that could be got at easily, so that there might be as much wreckage as possible for the rest to cling to. This was done and the men cast themselves into the deep.

It was pitch dark; not a star was visible; no light save that of the burning ship. During the next hour death reaped a harvest, for of the emigrants few could swim, and the sea was so high that only the most practised and vigorous swimmers could breast the waves. In the darkness and gloom of that night many a soul went to its long home.

In the gray light of dawn the two men who were roused from the steerage, were holding on to one of the spars. One was about middle age, and he had the appearance of a man whose life had been passed in scenes of dissipation. His companion was younger than he, and his frank, open countenance presented a striking contrast to the other.

Through the whole of that day they clung to the spar. It seemed as if every moment the waves would drag them off. The sun went down leaving them still there, hungry, thirsty, weak, yet holding to their one chance of life.

"I am afraid I can't hold on all night," said Jones, the elder of the two. "My arms and legs are getting numbed and stiff."

"Keep a good heart, man," said the other; "we may see a ship soon and be picked up."

"I shall never see to-morrow, Wilson. You may, for you are young and strong, but I shall go down to-night, I believe, and be drowned like a rat after all. They used to say in the old country that I should live to be hanged, but it does not seem like it. I have led a bad life, and this is no more than I deserve, but I thought if I could have got to America and broken with the old companions and associations I might have done better. It is very hard to die now. I wish I could think of a prayer to say, but it might not be of any use. It's a mean thing to pray in a strait like this, when one did not pray in the brighter times."

Wilson heard his companion's lament with a sad heart. His own case was hard, and he felt sorrowful at leaving life in his early manhood, but he had faith in God and was assured that, however this experience might end, he had through Jesus a place in heaven. For his companion he felt sincere compassion. He also felt a strong desire to help him, and asking him to come close to him on the spar, he talked and prayed with him. Surely, it was a strange place for Christian work. Every moment the waves beat upon them, and almost naked as they were they were in danger of losing their grip of the frail support. Very plainly and very earnestly was the story of the cross told in that night, for at any moment the soul, then hovering on the brink of eternity might lose the last opportunity. At last, Jones was convinced that he might be saved in spite of his past life, and was induced to pray for mercy through Jesus, and in a trembling way he felt his prayer, uttered from his heart, was heard.

Both men had been so abstracted in the all-important subject of conversation that they were surprised to notice in the east a faint light. The night had passed before they knew of it, and they watched the increasing light with renewed hope. It was not yet day, when to their inexpressible delight they saw the sight, for which their eager eyes had been strained so many hours. A ship was approaching them. Wilson tore off the handkerchief he had round his throat, and holding it aloft as high as he could waved it as a signal. In a few minutes the signal was answered, and in less than an hour the two weary, exhausted men were safe on board.

The acquaintance begun in this terrible experience neither of the two was disposed to lose. Wilson was anxious that the good work begun in the darkness and danger of that night should be nurtured and grow and bear fruit. Jones, with the newly-found joy in his heart of forgiven sin, clung to the man who, under God had been the means of guiding him to it. On their arrival in America they agreed to cast in their lot together, and they became warm friends. Drawn together by common suffering and a common love for their Saviour, they worked together and prospered.

A Moment of Peril in the Arctic.

AN ADVENTURE WITH A POLAR BEAR.

AMONG the members of a hunting party in the far northwest was a young Scotchman named Angas Scott, whose love of adventure had caused him to cross the Atlantic in the hope of seeing some sport of a more exciting nature than he could have near home. He was the only son of a widowed mother who almost worshipped her fine boy, now the only male representative of an ancient and influential family. He was the child of many prayers, and the widow watched with grave anxiety the development of his character.

There was a reason too why Mrs. Scott sometimes shed silent, bitter tears, as she commended her only child to God in prayer. Instead of showing any desire or inclination to follow the example of his parents, and become a Christian, as time wore on, she could not help observing that whenever religion was the topic of remark or conversation, he manifested the most marked repugnance, and availed himself of the earliest opportunity to leave the apartment. She had questioned him rather closely upon the subject more than once, but he had listened to her representations in silence, and no good apparently had resulted from her efforts.

This Canadian expedition, involving not a little danger, she had opposed, but Angas was so bent upon it that at length she gave a reluctant consent.

The party had not fairly reached their destination when an adventure occurred which came very near closing, in an untimely way the career of the young Scotchman. He had separated himself from his companions at the close of a day's march, and with his rifle upon his shoulder, he was making his way to the rendezvous along an arm of the sea tortuously winding its way inland, and narrowing as it proceeded. It was frozen over, and covered with multitudes of wild fowl, which made the air discordant with the wearisome monotony of their incessant cries. Suddenly on turning a sharp headland covered with newly-fallen snow, and iridescent with ice, he suddenly confronted a huge she-bear, and had barely an instant to avoid the suddenness and fury of its attack.

He fired. The ball struck her on the shoulder and ploughed a furrow along her back, but otherwise did no harm. He fired again, this time with more deliberation, and struck the creature in the breast. With a vicious growl it continued to approach him, and before he had time to reload and fire again, the brute was within a few feet of him. For once in his life, Angas felt afraid. As he gazed upon the angry eyes of the monster before him, he thought his hour had come, and involuntarily cried aloud, "O God! have mercy on me!" As the prayer left his whitening lips, he lifted his rifle, and swinging it over his shoulder, brought down its butt-end with terrific force upon the head of the bear. He fell forward with the force of the blow, and instantly the bear's paw was upon his shoulder. Then he gave himself up for lost and fainted. When he opened his eyes he could not for the moment realize where he was or what had occurred. But slowly his senses took in the situation. There by his side was the bear—dead from the ball he had fired in her breast. She had expired at the very moment when he had fallen helpless before her.

Still faint with the pain in his shoulder he managed to make his way to his companions, who returned to bring in the prey. Angas remained behind. In his dazed state he could scarcely realize that he was still alive. The escape was so marvellous and so unexpected that it seemed like a miracle. He dwelt upon it thoughtfully, and recollecting his prayer in the critical moment, he knelt down to thank God for the deliverance. That night he wrote home to his mother, closing his thrilling narration with the remark: "Ah, I was brought to my senses then, for the first time; for that was the first time I had met with anything worthy to be called danger. I felt my helplessness, and called upon God to aid me. He did so, and I have resolved in faith in His strength to love and serve Him for delivering me from a horrible and untimely death." A promise which he was enabled to keep.

DIED IN HARNESS.

A TRUE STORY OF IRISH LIFE.

By Miss M. M. Ross.

The Doctor's Home.

As the doctor entered the cabin he found Dan's bed had been moved from its usual corner, and on inquiring the reason was told that the rain had come down so heavy through the roof in the night, "it's nearly swep them off the face av the flure," and that they had to keep moving the bed from place to place to prevent its getting wet.

The priest had been there, and believing Dan to be dying, administered extreme unction without delay. Consciousness was now restored, but a glance sufficed to show that life was ebbing fast. Doctor O'Neverdon applied some restoratives he had left the day before, after which the patient seemed to revive a little, and recognized the doctor's presence with a smile, making an effort at the same time to repeat something in so faint a tone as to be perfectly inaudible.

"Dan," said the doctor, pointing to the crucifix and pictures of saints which lay on the coverlet, "What atonement can these make for that sin which brought the Son of God to bleed and die? 'The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanses us from all sin.' Nothing else will do it, my man!"

The man tried to repeat the words after him.

"That kep' him quiet whin nothin' else could," said his wife, "ye said it te him afore whin he tuk bad, an' he kep' me sayin' it over an' over till nothin' could git it out of his head."

"He is able also to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by Him," continued the doctor. "He made Him to be sin for us who knew no sin. Who His own self bare our sins on the tree, took them out of the way, nailing them to His cross."

"Them's beautiful words, at any rate," said the women, wiping their eyes. "They'd soothe a body's heart. An' Dan's quieted down like a lamb wid thim! Jist look at him, now!"

"Go on, more—more," murmured the patient.

"Come to Jesus, for you are weary and heavy-laden. Cast all your care upon Him, for He careth for you; on Him who loved you, and gave Himself for you. If you look to any one else but Him you are looking away from Him."

"And now, Dan," said the doctor solemnly, taking his hand, "life is ebbing fast from you, and I know not how soon I may follow; and as one dying man to another, I beseech you to trust to Christ alone for mercy; and 'who shall separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.'" And the doctor's face shone with that peace which the world can neither give nor take away, as he raised his eyes in supplication to the throne of mercy for the poor dying sinner before him, and inwardly felt that his prayer was heard.

The violent grief of the women was awed into silence by his solemn tone and manner, and though still retaining the Papal rosaries in their hands, they ceased to utter those "vain repetitions" which they had kept up in an audible whisper almost the whole time of the doctor's visit.

The lips of the patient moved again, and as his wife bent her head to listen, she caught the words, "The blood of Jesus—cleanses from all—all sin."

And these were the last words the doctor breathed in his ear as he left the cabin.

Mrs. O'Neverdon had breakfast ready earlier than usual, and trotted briskly to and fro from the parlor to the kitchen, superintending the cooking of a little dainty of which she knew her husband was particularly fond.

Her eldest child, a fine boy of nine, was watching the postman at the window as he went from door to door, and seeing him at last stop at the gate, dashed down the gravel walk to meet him and carry the letters to the house, a thing he always delighted in doing.

"No letter for you to-day, mother; but see, there are two for papa," said he, as he entered the room, almost out of breath.

"I wonder what delays him so long," said his mother, anxiously, "he was so poorly yesterday. I think, children, I had better not keep you without your breakfast any longer. I am afraid you will be late for school. Kate and Annie, put by your books, dears, for the present; I hope you have your lessons prepared for Miss Whelan?"

"Yes, mother," said both the children, charming little girls of seven and eight summers, rising from a seat in a retired part of the room, where they had been holding a serious discussion for the last half hour on the proper pronunciation of certain French words, but now referred the final decision to their mother.

They had hardly commenced breakfast when Dr. O'Neverdon made his appearance, pale and weary-looking. He had made two or three calls on his return home from Carroll's, and that had detained him longer than he expected.

After kissing his wife and children, and asking God's blessing on their morning meal, he began his breakfast with little appetite, apparently, for the neatly-served dish his wife had so thoughtfully and carefully prepared.

His own graceful figure was slightly bent with an affection of the chest, and his face, worn though it was with overwork and anxiety, beamed with an expression of the truest benevolence. His manners were those of the most refined and highly cultivated gentleman, and won upon the hearts of even the most depressed by his soft sympathizing tones in addressing the suffering poor.

Though holding a dispensary in a retired country village, and having a wife and five children to support on his very limited salary, unprovided with many a luxury which in his delicate health was really a necessity, and unable to procure the means of supplying the cravings of his artistic and scientific tastes, he was never known to accept a fee when he thought the payment pressed, and often with thoughtful delicacy did he return the guinea to the child which the poor lady mother had just handed him.

Among the poor of the district he was never known to refuse responding promptly to a call, or turn away an applicant; and no one but He who estimates at its full value "the cup of cold water" can tell the number of those who received, in addition to his kind professional attendance, those necessaries of even greater value than medicines to the destitute poor.

His wife was a cheerful, hopeful little body, ever ready to assist him in any work of beneficence, denying herself many little comforts, and heroically slaving night and day to maintain a respectable appearance, and make both ends meet at the same time. Nobody knew who made all the caps and knickerbockers, and knit all the stockings her boys contrived to wear. Nobody knew how often she turned her own and her children's dresses, until no turning or twisting would make them look better; for Mrs. O'Neverdon was not fond of talking of her own or her neighbors' affairs. She had but few friends in the village, but to them she was devoted. As for mere acquaintances she had none. Her time was too precious to be wasted in the frivolous pastimes of "morning calls;" but did she hear of any one being ill, or in need of help which lay in her power to give, she was the first to offer it, and would willingly devote herself as night watcher by the sick couch, only there was always a baby on hands, who required constant attention at that time. And many a fine fowl and roll of butter that found its way to her larder showed how her services were appreciated.

The children having gone to school, the doctor, as was his invariable custom paused over his second cup of tea, balancing his spoon on the edge of the cup, and apparently buried in deep thought, when he was aroused by the sudden entrance of the maid, "Mr. Leet, sir, that's fallen down in a fit, an' the man says he's dyin', an' asks for the doctor to go as quick as he can."

"I am ready," said the doctor rising; "I have expected this for some time, Susan," and he left the room. A carriage being in waiting, half an hour brought him into the presence of his patient.

Mr. Leet was the chief man in the village; he owned a large property, on which he had built a beautiful mansion, without son or daughter to inherit it. His wife had been dead some years, and his two sisters, unmarried, elderly ladies, had lived with him ever since.

Three months before Dr. O'Neverdon had brought him through a perilous illness, and, apprehensive of his case ever since, the present attack did not take him by surprise.

Several hours he remained by Mr. Leet's bedside, watching the result of his remedies, nor did he leave until a slight abatement of the violent symptoms were perceptible. Promising the terrified sisters he would return as soon as his dispensary duties were over, as he had no one to fill his place, the doctor scribbled the following few lines on a scrap of paper to be taken to his wife: "Send me my dressing-gown and slippers; I have to remain all night."

Mrs. O'Neverdon sat alone in her little parlor that evening. It was nine o'clock. All the children were in bed and asleep long ago.

It had been slightly chilly, as even July evenings sometimes are, in our humid and changeable climate, and a small turf fire burned brightly in the grate, giving a cheerful look to the neat but plain little apartment.

Laying down her work after awhile, she knelt before a large bureau, and opening one of the drawers proceeded to examine its contents.

It was full of the mementos and toys of a little child she had lost but twelve months before, and as she took up one thing after another, many a tear followed the tender replacing of it.

"I am nearly as sad to-night as I was when I wrote those verses," she sighed, taking a sheet of paper from between the leaves of a child's picture book, and reading them for the twentieth time at least:

"I had a winsome little one
She was scarcely two years old,
With eyes of sparkling brightest blue,
And her hair of changing gold.

I thought I could always keep her,
That I could my treasure hide,
And when I was old and feeble,
I would have her at my side.

I have all her little wardrobe,
And her little treasures too,
The withered flower, the doll, the shell,
And the hat and tiny shoes.

I bowed my head in silence,
Low beneath the stroke that fell,
It was a father's hand that did it,
And He doeth all things well.

"I know it is very wrong of me to give way thus; it was a Father's hand that did it, and He doeth all things well." And as with a devout emphasis she repeated the last lines over again, she folded the paper, put it in its place, and locked the drawer, returning the key to her pocket.

Mrs. O'Neverdon was a thoroughly practical character; though possessed of the most acute feelings, she never allowed them to interfere with her duties; and so, turning to the table, on which lay a heap of work requiring mending, she seated herself and began stitching with busy fingers. While the needle flew in and out with a swiftness which only constant practice can acquire, her little head occupied itself with various plans relating to her household affairs.

"I am sure I hope those people will pay Robert this time, getting out of his sick bed as he did before, almost at the risk of his life. They seem to have forgotten that altogether. He wants a new coat dreadfully. I cannot make this look better, though I have sewn on new buttons and worked over the button-holes. I wish he had not bought me that new dress, but he is so unselfish that he would not even buy a pocket-handkerchief for himself if he could help it. To be sure I had to accept Mrs. Adams' invitation, and he did not like me to look shabby. Harry and Willie's boots wear out so fast, they run about so; and when baby comes to wearing them, five pairs of boots will make a large hole in our little income. It is time to take a peep at the children. I think I heard baby cry, poor child; he is teething," and folding her work carefully, Mrs. O'Neverdon ascended to the nursery.

The baby lay, tossing in his snowy cot, uttering fretful little cries at intervals. The nurse was downstairs, and Mrs. O'Neverdon, taking him in her arms wrapped him in a shawl, and walked up and down lulling him to rest again by the soothing tones of her gentle voice, and then laid him carefully in his little cot; she next turned to look at Katie and Annie, who were both fast asleep in the same bed. A stranger would easily mistake them for twins, so much alike were they. Their beautiful golden hair twined together in heavy curls, and their mother, drawing up the bedclothes which in the restlessness of their childhood they had disarranged, lightly kissed at the same time their clear rosy cheeks, on which rested the long dark eyelashes, and silently sought divine blessing for them.

Willie, younger than Annie, slept in an adjoining apartment with his elder brother. He had begged to be allowed to do so; and Mrs. O'Neverdon, shading the candle with her hand as she entered the room, gazed on her sleeping boys. Harry's dark manly beauty, his finely-formed head, surrounded by a mass of short brown curls, contrasted with Willie's transparent complexion and girlish beauty, as he lay with both his little arms thrown over the clothes. He clung with an undisguised admiration and affection at all times to his strong elder brother, who, though sometimes inclined to tease and call him a "girl," because his fair hair hung in curls nearly to his waist, yet could never resist yielding to the gentle little fellow when he stroked his cheeks caressingly with his babyish hands.

He was half awake as his mother bent over him, and "Mosser" softly fell from his lips as he turned over on his side. "Darling, what is it?" but he was asleep again; and his mother, imprinting a kiss on each of their fair young foreheads, left the room.

Descending the stairs, she heard the expostulating tones of a female voice, and standing in the centre of the hall was an old woman. Her dark blue cloak had fallen from her shoulders, and her long gray hair, escaping from the confinement of her cap, hung round her face in tangled masses. The expression of her countenance was one of fixed agony, and tear after tear coursed its way down her furrowed cheeks as she spoke.

"Mrs. O'Neverdon, ma'am," said she, as that lady entered the hall. "Me boy is dying, me only child; an' as yer a mother yersilf, an' can feel fur me this night, I know if I could get a sight av his honor, he' d run wid me on the minit."

"Ma'am," said Peggy, in a distressed tone, "I'm afther tellin' her that the masther will be out all night; bud the craythur is so bit up wid the grief she can't give heed te me; an' she d—"

"Ah! bud, Peggy, honey, maybe he's dead while I'm waitin' here, an' no wun in the house but a colleen. Misther Sharpe is out, too, the boy in the 'pothecary's tould me. I run there fust, as it was on me way."

NONE OTHER NAME.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 11. Acts 4: 1-17. Golden Text, ver. 12. By Mrs M. Baxter.

The Work of Peter and the Apostles—Opposition of the Ecclesiastics—The Doctrine Taught—Lifeless Preaching—The Night in Prison—Peter's Declaration—His Sermon to the Priests—Power at Our Disposal—They had Been with Jesus—Visible Proof—Debate in the Council—A Difficult Question—An Empty Threat.

THE influence which Peter and John were gaining over the people who were met together in Solomon's porch, listening to their inspired words and gazing upon the newly-healed man, was such that the authorities began to take alarm. "The priests and the captain (or ruler) of the temple, and the Sadducees, came upon them, being grieved that they taught the people, and preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead." Did they teach the people error? Oh no, but then they had never passed through college or been properly ordained, and this excitement bid fair to undermine the influence of the priests and to ruin their popularity. Beside, were not the scribes and Levites the recognized teachers? Why were not the people satisfied with the teachers provided for them? Was not this unhealthy excitement? No doubt such were the arguments put forth, for such are current to this day when God-sent men and women arise and go forth hither and thither on a God-given mission to bring men and women to the Saviour who died for them.

When God's covenant was with Levi, God testified "he walked with Me in peace and equity, and did turn many away from iniquity" (Mal. 2: 5, 6.) But the priests had not laid to heart the interests of their God, and He sent John the Baptist to "turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just,' and now it was the poor despised followers of the lately crucified Jesus of Nazareth who were teaching the people, and that with a power which was almost irresistible.

Their doctrine offended the priests, for they "preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead." But did not the priests teach the doctrine? Surely yes; but in lifeless words. Peter and John preached about a Man, Jesus of Nazareth, who had but some weeks past arisen by His own power from the dead; and they appealed to many present witnesses to attest the fact. But this was fatal to the priests. By their condemnation, this man had been given over to death; all the ecclesiastical reputation of Jerusalem hung on the proof that Jesus of Nazareth was an impostor. What were they to do? Stop the preaching at all costs; this they did and put the offending disciples in prison over the night. But they who had spoken through them, and who was working among the people. God can condescend to make use of human instruments, but He is not dependent upon them, and hearts melted like snow under the power of God which was among them, "many of them which heard the word believed; and the number of the men was about five thousand."

We are not told what kind of night Peter and John passed in the prison; one thing we know, that God did not leave them alone, for when on the morrow their enemies had mustered in force, and thought themselves no doubt very strong, they were, nevertheless, quite overpowered by these two men who were temples of the Holy Ghost. The priests must have been up most of the night in order to get together the company they convoked; "their rulers, and elders, and scribes, and Ananias, the high priest, and Caiaphas, and John, and Alexander, and as many as were of the kindred of the high priest." No doubt Peter and John rested like little children in their Father's arms.

When they had set their prisoners in the midst this august council asked the two disciples, "By what power, or by what name, have ye done this?" They knew of the temporal power of the Jewish church, but the manifest power of God they knew not. "Then Peter, filled with the Holy Ghost, said unto them, Ye rulers of the people, and elders of Israel, if we this day be examined of the good deed done to the impotent man, by what means he is made whole; be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even by Him doth this man stand here before you whole."

BY THE NAME OF JESUS

The Apostle Peter would not for an instant allow that the priests had ground for condemnation against them; it was a "good deed" which had been done. Who could say that making a man walk, who had been lame from his birth was a bad deed! Yet, strange to say, not only in those days, but in the very days in which we are living, while people regard it only as a common thing when medical students say they have "spoiled a hatful of eyes" in learning to perform successful operations for cataract, and this is not condemned as though there were anything wrong about it; but when the hand of God works blessedly in healing those who have been pronounced incurable, numbers of people begin to whisper, and judge, and criticise, and stand aloof, as though God were quite dead and only some power of darkness could bring about such things in our days.

But while Peter would not call it other than a good deed, he would not take the smallest degree of credit to himself. He plainly stated, "By the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, doth this man stand here before you whole." The man had the opportunity of denying this, had it been false, and every one knew that Peter had not seen him a moment in private, and therefore he could not have given him instructions to be silent. There was proof positive that Peter spoke the truth, and all the array of priests could not deny it. They were obliged to listen to the bold outspoken words of Peter when he said, "Jesus of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead." This was galling to their pride, they had been found to fight against God; but God had proved the stronger, and they were being found out, and exposed before all the people.

Peter went on preaching a sermon to the priests, an address to the clergy of that day. "This is the stone which was set at naught of you builders, which is become the head of the corner. Neither is there salvation in any other, for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved." Blessed be God, we are coming to know more and more the power of the name of Jesus, but how little we know of it yet. God has joined together let not man put them asunder. God's salvation is an all-inclusive one, embracing present, past, future, spirit, soul and body; yes more, family, occupation, circumstances; we need a salvation which includes all. The authority of the whole universe is given to Jesus, "All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. 28: 18). And He places this illimitable as we renounce our own power, and forsake our own name, becoming nothing for His sake. There is no second Jesus, there is salvation in none other, and those who seek for it through the prayers of others, or through their own, through good deeds, or through the membership of churches; through coming of godly parents, or through a religious training, will find that none of these things, good as they are, are a substitute for the name of Jesus.

SALVATION AND THE NAME OF JESUS,

When this assembly of learned divines "saw the boldness of Peter and John, and perceived that they were unlearned and ignorant men, they marvelled." An unlearned and ignorant man, when he first speaks before learned and honorable men, feels confused, apologizes for his want of grammar, makes attempts as he goes on to appear less ignorant than he is, and appears altogether very ill at ease. Why is this? He is self-conscious, is occupied with what people are thinking of him. But Peter and John were self-empty and filled with their message itself; and the priests very probably felt that they could not have spoken with the same disregard of persons, "they marvelled, they took knowledge of them, that they had been with Jesus," this was the secret. Jesus thought not of Himself, He yielded Himself up as a channel between His Father and the men whom He came to save. And the same spirit animated those two disciples, "they had been with Jesus." Oh, that it could be said of every Christian man and woman when anything uncommon is remarked in them, "they have been with Jesus, they are so like Him, they bring His presence with them wherever they come." Occupied with Him; not simply for Him, but with Him, we "with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord" (2 Cor. 3: 18).

These priests were thoroughly worsted; "beholding the man which was healed standing with them, they could say nothing against it." The man's of that which had been done upon him, he was there to answer any question. The living witnesses which we have around us, are God's proof of the reality of conversion; some few witnesses there are, who are genuine specimens of God's power to cleanse, and the witnesses to His healing power and presence are increasing constantly in numbers. When the priests had commanded the two disciples "to go aside out of the council, they conferred among themseves, saying, What shall we do to these men?"

A DIFFICULT QUESTION

indeed, as they found later on. These men were on a mission from God, nothing could by any means hurt them, backed up by God wherever they went, fear did not belong to them, and their judges felt that they were dealing with their superiors in power and holy dignity. "What shall we do to these men? For that indeed a notable miracle hath been done by them is manifest to all them that dwell in Jerusalem; and we cannot deny it." What then? Would they acknowledge it? No, that would have been at too great a cost to their reputation; they would sacrifice anything rather than that. So they took counsel, "But that it spread no further among the people, let us straitly threaten them, that they speak henceforth to no man in this name."

They had yet to learn that "the Word of God is not bound" (2 Tim. 2: 9), and that the men they had to deal with were taking orders from a higher Source. They were soon to learn that God made the cause of these disciples His own. Oh, how foolish, oh, how futile it is to fight against God! Men going out in the authority of the name of Jesus, filled with the Holy Ghost, are a match for all the resistance of an ungodly world; in the name of Jesus they can withstand "things in heaven and things in earth, and things under the earth" (Phil. 2: 10).

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Disaster to the Cimbria has not Diminished in its appalling characteristics as the details have become known. The loss of life was over 400. The breach made by the collision was so great that the Cimbria immediately lay right over with a portion of her deck under water. Upon an attempt being made to lower the boats, one of them capsized immediately. The time elapsing between the crash and the final sinking of the Cimbria was only a quarter of an hour. Several persons clung to the shrouds, after the vessel had gone down, they being above the water. Among them one man begged his neighbors to push him into the sea, he being too much chilled to move himself. They refused to do so, when he let himself fall headlong into the waves. An elderly woman, holding her Bible in her cramped hands, was washed away from the deck. The Sultan is detained pending the official investigation. The captain is charged with negligence in causing the collision with the Cimbria, and with inhumanity in failing to send boats to rescue the drowning people. The Sultan suffered severely in the collision. She has a smashed bow and holes in both sides, and her keel for twelve or fifteen feet was completely split; but the damage was temporarily repaired by the crew. According to the testimony of competent seafaring people, the crew of the Sultan displayed marvellous cleverness and rapidity in stopping the leak, and it is scarcely conceivable how the vessel ever succeeded in reaching Hamburg. The captain asserts that he was going slowly, due east, and that after the collision he remained near the spot until dawn the next morning. All the three statements are contradicted by the survivors of the Cimbria. The other portions of his account they confirm.

Prince Carl, the only Surviving Brother of the Emperor of Germany, died January 21st, in his eighty-second year. He was the father of the Prince Frederick Charles, better known as the Red Prince, whose brilliant services in the Franco-German War were reported. The deceased Prince was the chief of the whole Prussian artillery force. He was a Prussian Field Marshal and Grand Master of the Order of St. John. In 1881 he celebrated a jubilee service on the occasion of the seventieth anniversary of his appointment as an officer of the Prussian Army. Not long ago he met with a severe accident, from the effects of which he never quite recovered. He left Berlin for Wiesbaden, having determined to break his journey at Cassel, where arrangements had been made for his dining and sleeping accommodations. His foot slipped while he was rising from table after dinner, and he fell heavily, fracturing his left thigh. It was not until the day before his death that serious apprehensions as to his health were entertained. His symptoms, which assumed an aggravated character toward evening, abated somewhat in the morning, but after noon he sank rapidly until shortly before two o'clock, when he expired. The last words of Prince Charles were, "Long live the Emperor!"

The Health of Mr. Gladstone, the British Premier, has rapidly improved during his sojourn at Cannes, France. He represents himself as perfectly recovered and ready to resume his labors when Parliament meets. An effort, however, is being made to induce him to prolong his stay abroad. It is made by his physicians and personal friends who do not believe his strength is sufficiently restored to sustain the strain of the late hours and exciting debates of the House of Commons. Mr. Gladstone is notoriously disposed to overwork himself, and moreover to do unnecessary work. Throughout the whole of his career as Prime Minister he has insisted on taking the personal responsibility of the departments, and making speeches on special and technical questions, a duty which his predecessors have always left to be performed by the Secretaries, who in England have seats in the house. The members of the Cabinet are also anxious that Mr. Gladstone shall not return at the commencement of the session. His permanent illness or death would involve the disruption of the party, which now includes in its ranks men whose political principles differ more widely from those of each other than they do from the principles of the Conservatives. The Marquis of Hartington is regarded as Mr. Gladstone's legitimate successor, but the radical wing of the party, which is the most powerful and energetic, look upon Mr. Chamberlain and Sir Charles Dilke as the true leaders. In the event of Mr. Gladstone yielding to the advice of his friends, the question of succession would probably be settled during the ensuing session.

A Cabinet Crisis, Continuing the Whole of last week, arose in France out of the proposed legislation against pretenders to the throne. A panic prevailed on the Bourse, and a military guard was set on the public buildings. During the excitement Prince Napoleon, whose manifesto had caused the trouble, was apparently overlooked. The difficulty in the Cabinet, and between the majority of the Cabinet and the Chambers, refers to the Orleans Princes, now on active service in the army. The Radicals demand that they shall be cashiered while the more moderate Republicans desire that they shall be placed on the retired list. The London Times remarks that, "the most remarkable feature of the crisis is the rapidity with which Frenchmen of all conditions have begun to despair of the Republic. The discouragement does not yet show itself in the newspaper press, but it is too apparent in private conversation. It would be rash to suppose that because the republicans are disheartened, therefore the Republic is doomed. It is on trial, but it has strength to survive many mistakes." On Sunday the Premier and his colleagues resigned.

The ex-Empress Eugenie Travelled to Paris on hearing of Prince Napoleon's arrest. She did not attempt to see him, and returned to England after an interview with Prince Napoleon's wife. Her journey was made the subject of an attack upon her by one of the London radical papers, to which she has caused a reply to be published. In this official announcement the ex-Empress of the French says that her sole desire in visiting Paris was to bring about a perfect reconciliation in the Bonaparte family. Prince Napoleon, she says, was a thorn in the side of the empire, but she forgave that, and went to Paris to show her sympathy for the head of the house of Bonaparte. She declares that she has no future in France, and will never leave the country which contains the ashes of her husband and her only son, and concludes her most imperial and womanly letter thus: "That tranquillity may be restored to France, under whatever government she may choose to maintain, is the prayer of one to whom all earthly ambitions are forever forbidden."

The Crowds Attracted to the Funeral of M. Gambetta, presented an opportunity for good which Miss De Broen, the evangelist, was enabled to use. She prepared a paper, headed, "Souvenir of the Funeral of Mons. Gambetta," addressed to the "Citizens of Paris, and of all France, Freethinkers, Catholics, or Protestants," containing reflections appropriate to the occasion, and adding words of consolation from the Scriptures, suitable for a time of bereavement, and in conclusion proclaimed God's offer of pardon through Jesus, and urged the acceptance of it. The addresses of the Bible Societies were added, with an intimation that there copies of the Word of God might be obtained. An invitation was also given to those who might wish to converse on the truths spoken of in the paper, to come for the purpose to the Iron-room.

The Revelations of the Irish Informers have been continued, and show that a thoroughly organized conspiracy existed to murder the officials of the Government in Ireland. The evidence already given fixes the guilt of murder on the prisoners. The officials say that certain men who are now under arrest are deeply implicated in many of the most notorious crimes. They believe that at least one of them was personally concerned in the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish. Farrell's testimony itself furnishes accurate and capable confirmation of all important points. The charges made againstDavitt, Healy, and Quinn have resulted in the issue of an order requiring them to find bail for their good behavior before February 3d, under penalty of being committed to jail. The three men have refused to find bail. If they persist they are not to be allowed to enter prison as "first-class misdemenants," but will be condemned to hard labor. It is regarded as a significant indication that no progress has been made toward the pacification of Ireland, that Mr. O'Brien, the editor of United Ireland, was elected Member of Parliament for Mallow last week. He polled nearly double the number of votes recorded for the government candidate.

The Scheme Formulated by Lord Dufferin for the future government of Egypt is of a somewhat elaborate and intricate character. The London Times states that its leading provisions are that the Khédive of Egypt shall have a council of twelve responsible ministers, and that a legislative council of fourteen members shall be formed, half of whom shall be nominated by the Khédive and half chosen by the system of double election, such as that for which abundant precedents exist in the American constitution and others. An elective assembly of forty-four members is also proposed to be convened to occasionally discuss special subjects. The latter will not participate in legislation, but will assist legislation by giving voice to the classes hitherto inarticulate. The initiative of legislation rests wholly with the Council of Ministers, but its projects must be submitted to the Legislative Council before becoming law. In the event of irreconcilable differences between these two bodies the decision will probably be left to the Khédive. Travellers famliar with the character of the Egyptian people say that the scheme will be neither understood nor appreciated by a people so unused to self government even in its simplest form as are the Egyptians.

A Veritable Palace of Ice has been Erected in Montreal. The structure is nearly one hundred feet square in the interior, with towers thirty feet high and fifteen feet square at each angle. The walls are twenty-five feet high. From the centre rises a massive tower, thirty-two feet square, to an altitude of 120 feet. The blocks of ice used in the construction are cut on the St. Lawrence, and are as transparent as crystal. They are piled on each other by means of derricks, and water is thrown upon them from the city mains, which instantly congeals under the influence of the frosty temperature, leaving a solid mass apparently as strong and durable as marble. On January 24th, the ice palace was formally opened. The unique building was illuminated with electric lights, and in its transparent glitter shone out like a mass of brilliants. The scene was greatly enhanced when members of the snow-shue clubs, to the number of about 1500, equipped in grotesque costumes, appeared with torches in their hands. It was admitted by every one that such a picturesque sight had never been witnessed there.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Terminated their evangelistic work in Dublin on January 15th. From the opening meeting until the conclusion, the spacious hall of the Christian Union Buildings was filled long before the hours of the meetings, and the churches in the neighborhood were thronged with anxious inquirers. The hotels were nearly all filled by visitors from the country, many of whom returned without hearing Mr. Moody, so great was the throng and the struggle for admission to the hall. Mr. Bliss, who joined in the work, delivered some very heart-stirring addresses, and his singing of sacred songs proved a great attraction. On Sunday, at an early hour in the morning, crowds of business men were to be seen hurrying into the city from their suburban residences. The Freeman's Journal, a Roman Catholic paper, very hostile to Protestantism, reported Mr. Moody's addresses, and while it sneered at his mode of conducting the prayers and singing, it was faithful in reporting him. The meeting on January 12th was for soldiers of the garrison, who attended in large numbers, nearly 4000 people being present. Mr. Moody's address had a visible effect on the soldiers, and when he called upon those who desired to be prayed for, to stand up, nearly 300 in uniform rose, and afterward attended an inquiry meeting. Preparations are already being made in Belfast for the visit of the evangelists on February 9th.

THE prominence of the tariff in the political questions now under the consideration of Congress, and the certainty that the people will at no distant time be required to decide by their votes what the future policy of the country shall be on this subject, give a special interest to the character and career of the distinguished statesman whose portrait appears this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He has been identified all his life with that question, and was mainly instrumental in bringing about the change in the English tariff which for that country was vitally necessary to its commercial prosperity. He has beside that been distinguished throughout his career as an earnest and consistent Christian, and has never hesitated when his convictions and Christian principles were involved, to sacrifice place and power and his seat in Parliament, rather than cast a vote for a policy which was opposed to those principles. Such a man should be known and honored; the study of his character cannot fail to have a beneficial influence on all who study it, especially young men interested in politics.

The Right Honorable John Bright was born on the 16th of November, 1811, at Rochdale, England. His father, the late Mr. Jacob Bright, a respected member of the Society of Friends, by dint of honesty and business ability succeeded, notwithstanding many disadvantages, in making himself master of a cotton mill at Rochdale. He was thrice married, and had eleven chidren, all of whom were the offspring of his second wife, who was Miss Martha Wood, daughter of a tradesman of good repute at Bolton-le-Moors. She was a woman of no common order, having a clear, well-furnished and gifted mind, and a tender, loving Christian heart.

AN ORPHAN BOY IN JOHN'S CLOTHES.

An instance of her thoughtful regard for the wants of others which occurred during John's childhood, made an impression on him he has never forgotten. One day when he was toddling by his mother's side in a new suit of clothes, they were met by a poor widow and a ragged little boy about the same age as John. On hearing the sad story told by the widow, Mrs. Bright took them to her house and the brand new raiment was taken off her son and given to the ragged boy. Doubtless Mrs. Bright helped the orphan in this particular way in order to impress the more deeply upon the mind of her son the duty of personal care for the welfare of the poor.

The little orphan still lives. He has made a fortune as a tradesman, and though now a member of the Town Council, is proud to state that he wore in his boyhood a suit intended for the illustrious orator and statesman. No wonder, that with such a mother, John Bright should have become in after life the friend of the friendless.

As a youth Mr. Bright was not without practice in public speaking. Before he was out of his teens he was known to possess parts of considerable promise.

At the age of nineteen, Mr. Bright became a warm supporter of the temperance cause. It is stated that, in conjunction with some like-minded gentlemen, he was the first to introduce the subject of organized temperance to his native town in 1830. Meetings for the advocacy of temperance followed in neighboring villages, and it was at one of those meetings that Mr. Bright delivered his

FIRST PUBLIC ADDRESS.

On the way to that meeting, we are told that "he and his friend Mr. Oliver Ormerod recited to each other their prepared speeches, and it was arranged between them that they were to prompt each other if there was any likelihood of a breakdown. The room was crowded, and Mr. Bright, in beginning his address, was very nervous, but gained confidence as he proceeded, and delivered his speech with effect and was warmly applauded."

It further appears that the second time Mr. Bright spoke in public was at Lower Place, in the old Wesleyan Chapel. It got noised abroad in the town that a number of "unfledged speakers" were going to "spout" on temperance, and the place was crowded long before the time for commencing the meeting, and the people were not disappointed, for Mr. Bright and his friends acquitted themselves creditably. In his third speech he attempted a loftier strain and broke down. It was his intention to introduce the Upas tree in the course of his speech, to illustrate the deadly effects of intoxicating drink. But when he came to that part where he intended to introduce the figure, he forgot the name of the tree, and, after beating about the bush, he was compelled to turn round to his friend, Mr. Ormerod, to ask "What is next, Oliver?" The audience, as may be supposed, roared with laughter.

TEMPERANCE BELL RINGING.

On one occasion, it is said, Mr. Bright accompanied a temperance deputation to Rawtenstall, a Lancashire village, when the future statesman provided himself with a large bell to arouse the attention of the villagers to the fact that a temperance meeting was about to be held. The principal speaker, being a young man of little experience, broke down in his address, and the meeting might have reached a premature close, had not John Bright been prepared to stand forward as an advocate of the cause. The speech which Mr. Bright delivered on that occasion is known to have so touched and convinced one of the drunken profligates of Rawtenstall that he thereupon gave up his dissipated habits, and henceforth led a sober and praiseworthy life.

THE BIBLE SOCIETY.

Among the most noteworthy of the early addresses of Mr. Bright was one delivered at Rochdale, at a meeting of the Bible Society. The Rev. John Aldis, an honored and distinguished Baptist minister, was staying at a friend's house when John Bright arrived to accompany him to the meeting, which was to be held in the Friends' Meeting House. "Soon," says Mr. Aldis, "a slender, modest young gentleman came, who surprised me by his intelligence and thoughtfulness. I took his arm on the way to the meeting, and I thought he seemed nervous. I think it was his first public speech, at all events in such connection. It was very eloquent and powerful, and carried away the meeting, but it was elaborate and had evidently been memorized.

"On our way back, as I congratulated him, he said that such efforts cost him too dear, and asked me how I spoke so easily. I then took the full advantage of my seniority to set forth my notions, which I need not repeat here except this, that, in his case, as in most, I thought it would be best not to burden the memory too much; but having carefully prepared and committed any portions when special effect was desired, merely to put down other things in the desired order, leaving the wording of them to the moment. Years rolled away. I had entirely forgotten the name of the young friend, when the Free Trade Bazaar was held in London. One of those engaged in it, Mr. Baker, of Stockport, calling on me, asked if I had called on Mr. Bright. I said I had not been able to attend the meetings and did not, personally, know him at all. He replied, 'You must, for I heard him say that you gave him his first lesson in public speaking.' I went to a subsequent meeting and recognized the young friend of 1832."

HIS ADVANCING CULTURE.

Already he had decided literary tastes. He revelled in the biographies of illustrious men and in works of history. But, above all, the great poets delighted him. Their far-reaching vistas of thought, their mastery of expression, their sense of the sublime and beautiful, their loftiness and tenderness, their sweetness and light, their glow and perennial freshness, passed into his very soul and became part of his inmost being. The vulgar notion that sympathy with poetry is a mark of a dreamy, unpractical turn of mind found no quarter with John Bright. His clear eye for a fact, his vigorous common sense, his marked aptitude for business, were in no wise impaired but rather improved and strengthened by the studies which thus gave tone and expansion to his whole mind. Amid all his other interests, whether of business, literature or politics, John Bright never neglected his Bible, and the loftiest eloquence he has ever attained has been inspired by the high moral and spiritual convictions created and fostered by the study of the Book of books.

FIRST MEETING WITH COBDEN

who afterward became his most intimate and respected friend, was in connection with the cause of education. Unveiling the statue of Mr. Cobden at Bradford, many years after, Mr. Bright thus described that meeting: "I went over to Manchester to ask him if he would be kind enough to come to Rochdale and to speak at an education meeting which was about to be held in the schoolroom of the Baptist chapel in West Street of that town. I found him in his office in Mosley Street. I introduced myself to him. I told him what I wanted. His countenance lit up with pleasure to find that there were others who were working in this question, and he, without hesitation agreed to come. He came and he spoke; and although he was then so young as a speaker, yet the qualities of his speech were such as remained with him as long as he was able to speak at all—clearness, logic, a conversational eloquence, a persuasiveness which, when conjoined with the absolute truth there was in his eye and in his countenance, it was almost impossible to resist."

The friendship thus commenced lasted unbroken and undisturbed by a single jar of any kind, during the long period of twenty-five years. The two friends came to be known in fact as the Jonathan and David of the League.

A MEMORABLE CRISIS IN HIS HISTORY.

Mr. Bright had in 1839 married Miss Elizabeth Priestman, daughter of Mr. Jonathan Priestman, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, a lady for whom he cherished a strong and deep attachment. Her removal by death in 1841 moved him profoundly, and it was while smitten with the great grief of this bereavement that Mr. Cobden called upon him, and the interview depicted in scene 1 of our frontispiece took place. That interview had important bearings on national and historical events of the first magnitude. It is described as follows by Mr. Bright: "At that time I was at Leamington, and on the day when Mr. Cobden called on me—for he happened to be there at the same time on a visit to some relations—I was in the depth of grief, I might almost say of despair, for the light and sunshine of my house had been extinguished. All that was left on earth of my young wife, except the memory of a sainted life and of a too brief happiness, was lying still and cold in the chamber above us.

"Mr. Cobden called on me, as my friend, and addressed me, as you might suppose, with words of condolence. After a time he looked up and said, 'There are thousands of homes in England at this moment where wives, mothers, and children are dying of hunger. Now, when the first paroxysm of your grief is past, I would advise you to come with me, and we will never rest till the Corn Laws are repealed.'"

Few pages of English history are more interesting or momentous than those which record how the compact thus solemnly proposed was carried out by the two friends. The calm wisdom and intellectual circumspection of Mr. Cobden, when conjoined with the thrilling eloquence and indomitable courage of Mr. Bright, were simply irresistible. Their speeches, and those of William Johnson Fox, probably did more than all the other efforts of the Anti-Corn Law League to bring about the object for which that organization had been called into existence. They succeeded at last in so reducing the duty on foreign wheat as to practically free it, and the poor of England were able to get American wheat at a low price, and the English farmers could no longer force them to pay the high prices.

hill. There was, among others, a father who called upon me, and told me with great delight that several of his children had been brought to a clear decision for Christ at the meetings of last week. They had been long and carefully trained, and it was a great joy to his heart to see his children brought to such a clear decision in regard to receiving the Lord Jesus. 'But,' he said, 'I cannot see how my children should be so assured about their salvation, and I myself be somewhat in doubt; and I have come to you expressly to ask how I may get into the light, and be satisfied of my own personal interest in the Lord. I had the great pleasure of leading him to Jesus and His Word, and leaving him there."

A Pleasant Surprise.—Mr. McFarlane said: "I will tell you an incident in the life of a worker whom I knew, but who is now gone to his rest. My friend was engaged in teaching a class of rather wild lads in a Sabbath-school. He thought that he was not qualified to make any impression upon them, and got much discouraged. By the inducements of his fellow-teachers and superintendent he was prevailed upon to keep at the work for years, till at last he absolutely refused to continue it longer. Many years afterward an eminent missionary wrote home: 'Is that gentleman who taught in the Market Street Sabbath-school still living? If he is, please let him know that there is at least one living who dates his conversion to Christ from the lessons received in his class.' So you see that, although the teacher gave up his work because he saw no fruit, yet the seed sown was not lost; one soul, if not more, was saved, and used as God's means for saving many others."

Fourteen Sailors Converted in a Storm.—Mr. Mabon, the city missionary, said: "An old man, who at one time was a sea captain, told me that on one voyage all the crew were unconverted men. During a fearful storm, in which they all gave themselves up for lost, the crew went below, so that they might be drowned while insensible with drink. The captain alone remained on deck, and while the ship reeled and staggered like a drunken man, he calmly looked to heaven for aid. As he stood with uplifted eyes, the water dashing about and over him, one of the crew came on deck and saw him. He exclaimed, 'I wish I was like you, captain! I would die happy.' He then went below and told the rest of the crew about the captain. They all rushed on deck to see him, and were so struck by the grand spectacle that they acknowledged God was with him. These fourteen men are now rejoicing in Christ as their Saviour. Not only so, but rescued from their perilous position, they afterward went preaching the Gospel at every port they entered."

The Farmer's Parrot.—At a recent meeting in Cowcaddens, Glasgow, Mr. Marsh, pointing out the evil of Christians associating with ungodly companions, related that "A farmer down in the country had a favorite parrot, which one day was missing. Close search was made for it, but without result. The children grieved over the loss and often wondered what had come of 'Poor Polly.' One morning a great noise was heard among the crows, and the farmer took his gun to have a shot at them. At his first discharge a bird fell, and he went to pick it up, and saw it was the long-lost 'Polly' shot through the wing. Addressing the parrot, he said, 'Ah, Polly, Polly, this is the result of keeping bad company.' Putting it into his coat pocket he went home. His daughter saw him coming and ran to meet him, asking, 'What have you shot, father?' 'Poor Polly; I have shot poor Polly.' 'O father, how did Polly get shot?' Polly popped out her head from the pocket, and said, 'Bad company! bad company!' And that is how many Christians get shot at and wounded by the devil."

Converted in a Theatre.—"There was a man and his wife, said Mr. Marsh, walking past Astley's Theatre one night. The devil was giving them their wages for their faithful service in his cause in the shape of cold and hunger. A young man stepped up and said, 'We shall be pleased to see you in the meeting inside.' 'We are too poor.' 'No, you are not; seats are free, there is no collection.' 'Wife, that's the place for us, then; come along.' During the address the wife was convinced of sin, but the man remained indifferent till the last prayer, in which the words, 'Where will you spend eternity?' occurred. These words arrested him, and he stayed to be spoken to. The way of salvation was pointed out to him, but the man said, 'Ah, that is not for me; I have been a prize fighter, a thief, and almost everything that is bad.' Having read John 3: 16, the worker said, 'Have you never seen, when in the country, a board fastened to a post in a turnip field, on which was painted—Whosoever trespasses on this field will be prosecuted?' It so happened that on the previous day the man passed a turnip field where such a notice was erected, and being hungry had stolen a turnip, and he remembered well the feeling which came over him when he read the threat, as he knew that the word whosoever meant himself. The illustration was therefore so appropriate that he grasped the truth at once, and left the building a happy man. He is now a most useful and successful evangelist."

Cards and Dancing Before Christ.—Mr. Marsh, in closing, said: "While an evangelist was conducting some services in America, a young lady attended with the rest of the family all the meetings, and was the only one of the family still unsaved when the last meeting took place. The young lady felt that she was a sinner, and had need of a Saviour, but struggled hard against the promptings of the Holy Spirit. Before the final meeting was dismissed, she hurriedly left, and a voice seemed to say to the evangelist, 'Follow her!' Obeying it, he found the young lady standing on the top of the steps leading to the hall, praying aloud, and this was the substance of her prayer, 'O God! I know Thou art willing to save all; I know Thou art willing to save me; but Thou knowest I do so love cards, dancing, and other pleasures which I cannot give up. I choose the world, although I lose my soul.' Appalled with horror, the evangelist was rooted to the spot speechless, and saw the lady hurry away to her home. In a fortnight she lay dying, and when her friends urged her to flee from the wrath to come, she said, 'God has taken me at my word; my heart is hardened, I am lost.'"

COLONIZATION PROSPECTS IN PALESTINE.

(From the Jewish World.)

The Return from the Captivity has Commenced—The Vanguard of the Return—A Second Jewish Colony in Palestine—The Number of Societies Existing for Colonizing Palestine.

WHATEVER opinions may be held as to the wisdom and desirability, under existing conditions, of encouraging the settlement of Jewish agriculturists in the Holy Land, there can be no gainsaying the fact that a serious and evidently well-considered movement in that direction has been inaugurated under very promising auspices, and that the colonization of Palestine by our co-religionists is on the road to becoming un fait accompli. Already, those who cling to the older traditions of our race can assert that

THE RETURN FROM THE CAPTIVITY HAS COMMENCED.

The diaspora, after eighteen centuries, has at length been broken; and Israel is beginning, "little by little," to repossess her own. Strange as this may read to us "Children of the West"—Beni Malaraba, as in Talmudic phrase we may not inaptly call ourselves—it is nevertheless true; and though we are far from disposed to exaggerate the importance of the movement to which we refer, there can be no reasonable doubt that, on a small scale, colonization has commenced. Its permanence has yet to be proved; and the possibility of its success remains to be tested by the sternest of all tests, actual experience. The hard realities of a commonplace occupation, undertaken under abnormal conditions in face of modern life, will sufficiently try both the vigor and enthusiasm of the promoters and colonists.

Consistently opposed as we have been throughout to the ambitious and fanciful schemes propounded from time to time by well-meaning but impracticable people, who would like to see—what they call—"prophecy fulfilled," we can watch with interest of no ordinary kind the movement now inaugurated, which is of a description altogether different from the absurd and senseless projects which aim at the purchase of the fee-simple of Palestine, and a return, in imposing procession, to the Land of Promise.

THE VANGUARD OF THE RETURN.

The first colony—the vanguard of the return—was that known as the Kehilath Yaacob, a Congregation of Jacob. Its formation was scarcely noted until, but a few weeks ago, it was announced that a whole village and the land pertaining to it, between Zareah and Eshtael, capable of furnishing farms for 200 families, had been purchased on the 17th of Sivah, 1882—a date that may yet become historic in the annals of a rejuvenated Hebrew nationality. The example of the "Congregation of Jacob," consisting mainly of Russian Jews—refugees of last year—was speedily followed by their Roumanian brethren, whose existence also has been made intolerable to them by the wire-pullers and Jew-baiters of the ex-Principality.

On Shemini Azereth a telegram was received at Bucharest, from the agents of the Roumanian Committee for Colonizing Palestine, Herren Abeles and Pineles, stating that they had concluded the purchase of the entire village of Samarin, close to Khaifa, and five additional tracts of land, for the sum of £1840. Within a few days of purchase the emigrants were selected, and the establishment of in the Holy Land was already a thing of the past.

Since October 4th, 1882, when this took place, the Roumanian journals contain nothing but long lists, recording the names and numbers of those emigrating to the Holy Land, and those who have joined the local committees formed in almost every town and village to facilitate the colonization of Palestine by the descendants of its rightful possessors. Day after day announcements are made of parties—sometimes 180 strong, at others consisting of a few families—starting for Palestine. One day an important town like Braila sends 1200f. to the central fund; the next, two insignificant villages like Iresti and Busanaia 600f. each.

MORE THAN FIFTY "VEREINE"—SOCIETIES—FOR COLONIZING PALESTINE

have been formed in central districts, each of which is gathering money for colonization purposes, the members being the intending emigrants, who are thus saving out of their own scant resources the money required for the purchase of land and implements, and for sustenance until the settlements become self-supporting. This has now been going on for months; and at the present moment negotiations are proceeding for the acquisition of another extensive tract of land in Palestine, which is to form the locale of the third colony of those who return. Such facts as the above cannot, of course, be ignored. They certainly do point to the conclusion that a determined effort is being made to colonize Palestine with Jews, and after the only fashion in which colonies are likely to be successful—that is, by settling Jews in small batches, in suitable districts, at proper intervals of time, so that mistakes made by the first comers may be avoided by those who follow them, and in order that advantage may be taken of the experience gained in localizing, organizing, and administering farming communities of this kind. The difficulties are great, it must be admitted, even under such an arrangement; but they are mostly difficulties that money can overcome; and the judicious way in which the Roumanian societies are organizing themselves speaks well for their appreciation of this fact. Their recognition, too, of the principle of "helping themselves," as they are doing, shows in a favorable light the spirit which animates them in their undertaking.

From what we may venture to call the sentimental point of view, one might enlarge considerably on this colonization, which is inaugurating, after a fashion, a return to Palestine. But our doubts as to the fitness of the Jews themselves for colonization remain strong as ever.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Reduction in the Public Debt During the month of January attained the large figure of $13,500,000. This sum makes an aggregate of $95,000,000 which has been paid off during the first seven months of the fiscal year. The Secretary of the Treasury estimated the available surplus of the year at $120,000,000, but the figures quoted, show that it may be over $160,000,000. This is in part due to the decrease of expenses, chiefly in the pension bureau, in which the disbursements have been unusually light during January and December. The total receipts of the government from all sources have been greater than those of the corresponding seven months of last year by nearly four million dollars, and the disbursements less by more than twelve millions. Thus the surplus as compared with last year is better by about sixteen millions. The taxpayer groaning under his heavy burdens is not cheered by this prosperous statement. He has learned by experience that Congress has little sympathy for him, and prefers accumulating a surplus to be put "where it will do good," to making any change that will afford him relief.

The Senate and the House Both Devoted the whole of last week to the subject of the tariff. During the early part of the week hopes were entertained that a bill of some kind would pass this session. That it would be a measure satisfactory to low tariff men could not be expected, but prominent members of both branches of the Legislature confidently predicted that a compromise between the Senate and the House would be effected that would remove some of the most glaring anomalies of our system. The slow progress made during the week, however, renders the prospect anything but encouraging. This Congress has but a comparatively short time to live, and several appropriation bills have to be considered beside other work that must be done. It is clear, therefore, that unless a change of an unexpected character is made in the rate of progress, there is no hope of a tariff bill. The lengthy speeches made on the subject, and which take up the time, appear to be delivered with the object of setting the speakers right with their districts, rather than of advancing the measure. On one side, the speakers hope to convince the workingmen that opposition to a reduction is prompted by a desire to prevent the laborer being reduced to the condition of his class in Europe. On the other side, the speakers want the country to understand that their advocacy of a reduction in the tariff is based on the conviction that it will reduce the cost of living. Meanwhile as there are a considerable number of men desiring to fully explain their attitude, the prospects of any bill passing are very slight.

The Protracted Contest over Mr. Windom's seat in the Senate has ended in the defeat of the ex-Secretary. Mr. D. M. Sabin, of Stillwater, was elected on February 1st United States Senator from Minnesota. Mr. Windom's friends voted for him to the last, but when the break occurred in the deadlock, the Democrats voted with the friends of three other candidates for Mr. Sabin, and he thus secured 81 out of the 135 votes cast. Mr. Sabin is 39 years of age, having been born in Connecticut in 1844. He commenced business as a contractor in Minnesota on the death of his father in 1868. He subsequently became Managing Director of the Northwestern Car Company, the most important corporation in the State. Mr. Sabin is a shrewd political manager, and though a popular man in his State is not noted as an orator.

Another Defalcation by a State Treasurer startled society last week. Mr. Isaac H. Vincent, the Treasurer of Alabama, was declared a defaulter on January 31st. In a message sent to the Legislature, Governor O'Neal stated that a letter had been received by the chief clerk of the Treasurer's Department from Mr. Vincent, in which the Treasurer said he was short in his accounts, and had gone to New York to raise money to straighten the matter. The Legislature had already commenced an investigation of Mr. Vincent's Department when he left Montgomery. A cursory examination of the books showed that at least $200,000 were missing. It is stated that Mr. Vincent had used the funds of the State in stock speculations, and that a loss of $100,000 could be traced in one speculation on cotton futures. Mr. Vincent could not be found in New York, and the General Assembly of Alabama has authorized the Governor to offer a reward of $5000 for his apprehension. Mrs. Vincent handed to the Treasury after her husband's departure a package containing $15,000. Considerable sympathy is manifested for the defaulter in Montgomery, and an impression prevails that he has been made a victim by designing men. The State is said to be fully protected, though Mr. Vincent's bond has been abstracted from the Treasury.

Among the Many Disasters of the New Year the burning of the New York pier of the Inman Steamship Company on February 1st, is one of the most costly, though, happily, no lives were lost. The fire broke out soon after midnight, and was at first supposed to be of insignificant character. The men on duty attempted to extinguish it with some hose on the pier, but becoming alarmed by its rapid progress, sent out a fire alarm. It was then too late to save the pier, which was completely destroyed, with the large stores of valuable merchandise upon it. The steamship Egypt, of the National Line, which had been chartered by the Inman Company lay alongside the pier, and was saved with difficulty. The ice had collected around her, and it was not until tugboats came to her assistance that she could leave the burning pier. Her sails and rigging were burnt, and but for her masts and spars being of iron she would have been destroyed. The pier was the finest in the city; it was built in 1880 at a cost of $70,000. The total loss is estimated at $800,000.

The Veteran Missionary, Rev. William G. Schauffler, D.D., LL.D., died in New York on January 26th, at the age of eighty-five. He was a native of Stuttgart, Germany, but most of his early days were spent at Odessa, where his father held a municipal office. He was converted at the age of 22, and immediately commenced study with the view of fitting himself for the work of a missionary. By the advice of Dr. Joseph Wolff, the Jewish missionary, Mr. Schauffler went to Constantinople. There he met Rev. Jonas King, the American missionary, who urged him to come to this country to obtain an education. He landed in Boston with only one dollar in his pocket; but he made his way to Andover, where he was cordially received. He worked earnestly, often devoting sixteen consecutive hours to study. In 1831 he was ordained as a missionary under the American Board. He immediately proceeded to Turkey, where in conjunction with the American missionaries there he labored unceasingly and successfully for Christ for eighteen years. Subsequently he labored in Austria, Hungary, and for a time with his son, also a missionary in Moravia. He returned to America in 1877, and has devoted his last years to translations and other literary work for the cause he loved. Dr. Schauffler was an accomplished linguist. He could speak fluently in more than twenty languages.

The Christian Work Among the Jews of New York city, conducted by Rev. Jacob Freshman, is making progress. The difficulties in Mr. Freshman's way do not consist so much in the tenacity with which the Jews cling to their ancient faith, as in the fact that they have, in many cases, abandoned all faith and are practically infidels. The results of the past year's work are such as to encourage the evangelist to continue. Several converted Israelites have been baptized, and on one occasion an entire family. The present membership, under the charge of Rev. Mr. Freshman, is twenty. The Sunday-school, held over a Jewish synagogue, is increasingly attended by Hebrew children. Every Saturday afternoon Mrs. Freshman meets a class of about twenty for religious instruction, and conducts also a sewing-school for girls. They are held at her residence, No. 25 Seventh St., New York.

The Sunday-School Festival of the Bethany School at Philadelphia, conducted by Mr. John Wanamaker, was a reversal of the ordinary methods. It is thus described by a contemporary: "Instead of giving presents to the children, the children brought presents to give to others. These presents were as miscellaneous a lot as were ever collected on a Sunday-school platform. Nearly every one of the two thousand children in the Sunday-school brought some gift. The parents and friends also bestowed liberally, some of the articles presented being of considerable value. There were all manner of toys for little children, and garments for those of every size. There were bags and barrels of flour and immense quantities of vegetables. There were whole carcasses of sheep and hogs, which were not the less acceptable because novel. Many of the gifts were given out to the poor and needy of the neighborhood. The rest were sent to some of the orphans' homes and other benevolent institutions of the city. A procession of wagons waited for them outside the Sunday-school hall during the services.

A Cordial Welcome has been Given by the pastors of New York to the young English clergyman who has accepted the pastorate of St. George's Church, of which Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Sr., was formerly minister. A New York journal gives the following sketch of the young clergyman: "Rev. W. T. Rainsford is a native of Dublin, Ireland, but comes of English parentage. His father is Rev. Marcus Rainsford, Rector of St. John's Protestant Episcopal Church, in Belgrade Square, London. He went to Quebec in 1868, and assisted in settling 700 emigrants in Canada. He is a graduate of St. John's College, Cambridge, and was ordained for the ministry in 1874. Declining a rectorship in England, he accepted the position of curate in the Church of St. Giles, in Norwich. Here he labored successfully until the summer of 1876, when he came here to assist in Lent services, and since then has labored in Baltimore, Louisville, and Canada as an evangelist.

Fifty Dollars were Received Last Week by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from a subscriber who desired that the journal might be sent to persons whose names and addresses he supplied. He requested that his name should not be disclosed, but there is no reason why his attempt to do good by introducing into the families of his friends sound religious teaching should not be mentioned. We may hope that God's blessing will attend this effort to do good, and that the example thus set may encourage others to similar liberality.

The Danger of Neglecting an Opportunity is illustrated by an incident related in the New York Witness. At a Gospel Temperance meeting, held in Hyde & Behmann's Theatre, Brooklyn, a few weeks since, a street preacher pleaded with a man to give up drinking. He evidently felt the effects of the argument used, for he trembled, and said to the missionary, "I could cut off my right arm if I could give up drinking." But he went out of that meeting and took more liquor. To-day that victim of strong drink is on trial for his life.

The Strange Inconsistency of a Physician was the subject of remark lately in an Ohio criminal court. He was sent to the work-house for thirty days for cruelty to his family. The testimony showed that the particular offence for which he was arraigned was not an isolated one, but had been repeated on numerous occasions, and the judge in sentencing him said it seemed strange that a man of his intelligence and standing in the community, who often had been noted in that very court as one of the most persevering witnesses against those who were cruel to animals, should be brought there for cruelty to women. This was an extreme instance of a fault only too common in the church and the world. Men who are among the most censorious and unmerciful as to the sins of others are often themselves guilty of other sins. It becomes us all to pray for deliverance from the sins to which we are constitutionally liable (Heb. 12 : 1).

A Floor Sinking Under a Dancing Party caused some alarm in Brooklyn last week. In the course of an entertainment given in Lincoln Hall in which about five hundred persons participated, there was an ominous creaking of the floor, which at the same time settled in the centre nearly a foot. There was a cry, "The floor is giving way," and all those present were instantly upon their feet. "Keep your seats," cried one of the managers, "there is no immediate danger," and his presence of mind and that of others prevented the panic. Then, without any rush, and as quietly as possible, every one left the hall. In speaking of the matter, the manager said: "I felt pretty faint myself when I heard that creaking of the floor, but at the same time I knew that had there been a rush for the door the floor would certainly have given away. Fortunately there was presence of mind enough in the guests, though appreciating the danger, to keep still, and there is no question but to that fact we all owe our lives." Upon examination afterward it was found that the floor beams were broken. The day is coming when all worldly merriment will be as suddenly checked. In that day presence of mind will not avail. Only those who are in Christ will be delivered (Luke 17 : 26, 27).

Two Bears Caused a Panic in a Philadelphia boarding house on January 20th. Some itinerant musicians who arrived in the city on that day were admitted as boarders at the house of Mrs. Luccarina, and their bears which assisted them in their exhibitions were accommodated in a shed in the rear of the premises. The musicians started outthe next morning for a jaunt through the city, leaving their charges carelessly tied. The appetites of the shaggy denizens of the thickets became considerably sharpened, and when Mrs. Luccarina, forgetting that the bears were there, went out into the shed to get some coal they suddenly grasped her about the body much to her alarm. She yelled lustily, and a number of the boarders went to her assistance and dragged her from the grasp of the bears into the house. The animals, however, had become loosened and pursued the party in-doors. The human occupants precipitately fled through the front door, leaving the intruders in possession. The bears instantly cleared the supper table and demolished nearly all the chinaware, beside breaking several chairs. The owners arrived upon the scene when the excitement was at its height, and easily captured the animals. The boarding-house keeper will doubtless exercise more care in future as to the inmates she receives, and those identical animals are not likely to find accommodation on the premises of any one who has heard of her experience. In these matters people learn by experience, of their own and of others, but in spiritual matters there is more carelessness. In the souls which ought to be the temple of the Holy Ghost, passions and appetites are harbored far more dangerous than the bears proved (Mark 7 : 21, 22).

A Capital Gradually Diminishing Led to a suicide at Niagara on January 22d. A gentleman staying at one of the hotels at the Falls, quietly paid his hotel bill on that day, and driving to Goat Island, cast himself into the watery abyss. His friends could assign no cause for his desperate act until a communication found among his effects was forwarded to them. Then it appeared that he had been living for years upon his capital, and that being a man of expensive tastes, and finding poverty staring him in the face, he preferred to seek relief in the icy cataract. In one of his letters he said, "For years I have been eating myself up, always hoping against hope for a better business. When I saw you last I had already made up my mind to end an existence I have not the means to continue." The miseries of poverty must have been grossly overestimated by the suicide before they could have appeared worse than the doom he sought. The believer has, at all events, the satisfaction of knowing that in using his spiritual riches, he is not expending his capital. That is inexhaustible, and God gives fresh supplies every day and hour (2 Cor. 9 : 8).

A Reunion after Thirty-three Years' Separation caused great joy in a family residing at Machias, Me., on January 9th. The Machias Union states that on that day Levi Farnsworth, of Jonesboro, who left Machias November 4th, 1849, in the brig Agate, for the Pacific coast, arrived at the home of his son, Mr. J. E. Farnsworth, where his wife and children assembled in less than two hours after his arrival. There were twenty friends at tea—his wife, children, and some of his grandchildren, and they had a very pleasant meeting. The old gentleman said: "This is the happiest hour of my life." Mr. Farnsworth had during his long absence resided in Vancouver, Washington Territory, Ellisburg, and many other towns on the Pacific coast, and is respected wherever known. He has held many prominent positions in Vancouver; has been Mayor of the city; also Sheriff several years. He was elected several times member of the Territorial Legislature. He is seventy-eight years of age. When Mr. Farnsworth left home he parted with wife and six children. On his return from his long journey of 5000 miles all were alive to greet him but one daughter, who died about twenty years ago. The changes wrought during his absence in his own appearance and in that of his wife and children rendered the meeting a very remarkable one. The thought was irresistibly suggested of the joyful reunion in heaven of families whom death has dispersed (Eph. 3 : 15).

A Curious Exposure of a Plagiarist Occurred recently at Newburyport, Mass. A local journal reports that at a Bible reading in one of the churches, a young man was present whose pithy remarks and beautiful illustrations had on previous meetings rendered him a very popular speaker. The subject on this occasion was the book of Ruth. The young man's turn to speak came, and he said: "Brethren and sisters, the subject this evening is the book of Ruth. And do you know that I never turn to the book of Ruth without a thought coming to my mind that there it lies, like a beautiful jewel, between the ermine of the Judges and the purple of the Kings." Such an exquisite thought did not fail to have its effect upon his admiring hearers. Later in the evening an elderly clergyman came in, and, after listening to the remarks for some time, arose and said: "My friends, whenever I turn to the book of Ruth, I am always reminded of that beautiful thought of Jeremy Taylor, that it lies, like a lovely jewel, between the ermine of the Judges and the purple of the Kings." The clergyman sat down puzzled by the general amusement his quotation had caused, and did not learn until afterward that he had unconsciously ruined a growing reputation. The incident shows how powerful in some minds is the love of adulation when, even in dealing with sacred things the common principles of honesty are outraged (11 Cor. 4 : 2).

A MONUMENT FOR THE DEAD, AND A VOICE TO THE LIVING.

A New Sermon, by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, That the man which doeth those things shall live by them. But the righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise; . . . . that if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved."—Romans 10 : 5, 9.

John Ploughman's Brother—A Huckster's Creed—Not for Perfectionists—I. What Moses Said—The Fractured Vase—An Inaccessible Path—II. What the Gospel Says—Clear as Moses—Forbids Questions of Despair—Answers Them—Nearness of the Word of Life—Confession Necessary—III. What the Scripture Says—A Cardinal's Admission—No Man Forbidden to Believe—Strength of Saving Faith—IV. What Experience Says—The Grandest Way of Living—Little Perfection Boats—A Christian's Death—A Testimony from Mentone.

YOU see by this mourning that our church has been bereaved. I have lost a friend tender and true to me, and my heart is too full for utterance.* I scarcely knew what to preach from this morning; but at last I settled in my mind that I would raise a memorial to my departed friend by preaching a sermon which should be connected with himself. Therefore I cast about me, and I considered what subject he would wish me to preach from if he were sitting behind me this morning as he was last Lord's day. I had no difficulty in answering that question. His life and death pointed in one direction. He was a man of rare common sense, straightforward and downright in his aims, and most pithy in his speech, with such a mixture of mother-wit that he might have been taken for John Ploughman's brother, as indeed he was. He cared nothing for oratory, which I have heard him call "a flash in the pan;" he delighted in the plain, solid Gospel of Jesus Christ.

I know that he would have said to me—Give them Christ crucified, and salvation by grace through faith, as plainly as ever you can; for when he was sore sick and in the very agony of death, he repeated as his dying creed—

"Nothing in my hand I bring:
Simply to thy cross I cling."

and in his own quaint way he added, "They may talk as much as ever they like, but the whole of it lies in Jack the Huckster's verse—

"'"I'm a poor sinner, and nothing at all;
But Jesus Christ is my all in all."'"

In Park Street early in my ministry I told the story, and it did my friend good, and helped to rest his soul all those years ago, so that he remembered it and repeated it at the last. For his sake let me tell it again.

This Huckster Jack was a poor, wicked fellow, who had gone about from village to village, swearing, drinking, huckstering, and perhaps pilfering. Some thought him half-witted, but the story would show his mind to be sound enough. He heard a poor woman sing somewhere—

"I'm a poor sinner, and nothing at all;
But Jesus Christ is my all in all."

He remembered the words, and what was better, he felt their sense; and he kept on humming them to himself till God's good Spirit engraved them on his heart. There they were recorded, and Jack was a new man and a saved man. So he essayed to join himself unto the church, but the brethren looked suspiciously at him and inquired, "What is your experience?" He said he had no experience but this—

"I'm a poor sinner, and nothing at all;
But Jesus Christ is my all in all."

Well, they must take him into the church; they could not well refuse a man with such a confession of faith; and when he was in the church, walking with the brethren, he was happier than the rest of them, at which they greatly marvelled, and one said to him, "Brother Jack, don't you sometimes feel

* William Higgs, Esq., for many years a beloved deacon of the church in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, fell on sleep January 3d, 1883, in his fifty-ninth year.

doubts and fears?" "Doubts," he said, "what do you mean? I never doubt that

"'I'm a poor sinner, and nothing at all;'

for I have daily proofs of it, and why should I doubt that

"'Jesus Christ is my all in all?'

for He says He is, and I must believe Him." "Ah, well," said one, "sometimes I enjoy good frames and feelings, and feel very happy, and then I lose them, and sink in spirit." Jack answered, "I never get lower than I am, for I am down at the bottom—

"'A poor sinner, and nothing at all.'

I cannot get lower than that, can I? But I am also at the top, for

"'Jesus Christ is my all in all,'

and I cannot get higher than that, can I?" They tried him many ways with their blessed experience, of which you and I have got cartloads, perhaps wagonloads; but he could not be drawn out of his one firm position. They tried him with their various attainments, depressions, anxieties, quibbles, and questions; but still the huckster would not budge. He had bought the truth and would not sell it, and so he stuck to—

"I'm a poor sinner, and nothing at all;
But Jesus Christ is my all in all."

The conies are a feeble folk, yet have they their habitations among the rocks; they are safe, but they keep to their hiding place.

Of course our new perfection brethren,

SPICK AND SPAN SAINTS

as they are, are not like Jack, they are not "poor sinners, and nothing at all," and I am afraid lest some of them should find out that Jesus Christ is not their all in all. But if you and I are as he was, "poor sinners, and nothing at all," we may, with firm and resolute grip, lay hold upon the other line, "But Jesus Christ is my all in all." Christ's fulness is meant for our emptiness; Christ's righteousness is meant for our sin, salvation is for the lost. When you and I are no longer sinners, Christ is no longer our Saviour; when you and I no more need Him, then we shall not have Him.

I now plunge into my text. Notice, first, what Moses said. Moses said, "That the man which doeth those things shall live by them." Next, what the Gospel says: "But the righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise," and so on. Thirdly, we shall consider what the Scripture saith: "Whosoever believeth on Him shall not be ashamed." Then, fourthly, we will hear what experience saith: for we may bring in the experience of believers to back up the declarations of God.

I. I invite your earnest attention to the first point—

WHAT MOSES SAID.

"Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, That the man which doeth those things shall live by them." This is a clear statement. There is no mystery or obscurity about it. You need not go to the universities and earn a degree of D.D. in order to understand this declaration; it is as plain as words can make it. If you wish to be saved by the law you must do its commands and you shall live. The law is written in the ten commandments; you know them; and if you desire to live by them you must keep them. It will not suffice for you to learn those commands by heart, or to write them up in your churches, or to read them over and say, "Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law;" all that may be well enough, but it is not to the point. If you are to be saved by the commandments you must do them; that is clear.

Mark you, Moses does not tone down the law to suit our fallen state, or talk of our doing our best and God's being satisfied with our imperfect obedience. No, he says only, "He that doeth those things shall live by them." He demands perfect and entire obedience, if life is to come of it. He does not say that if you have broken the law you may still live by some other means. No; clear, straight, cutting like a sharp razor, he puts before us the single sentence, "He that doeth those things shall live by them."

Judge ye whether any one of us has fulfilled the whole law. To my mind this word of Moses is conclusive that none of us can possibly live by the works of the law. We cannot keep the law now, for we have already broken it; the vase is fractured, and to talk of keeping it entire is nonsense. But even if it were not already broken, should we get through to-morrow with its temptations, bearing such a heart as we have within us, without breaking that perfect and spotless law? I am sure we should not. You that hope to be saved by your works are indulging a forlorn hope; whatever you may do or be in the future, the past has already ruined you. The way to heaven up the steep sides of Sinai is inaccessible to trembling feet like ours.

Clear, then, as possible it must be to every man among us who will think, that if the only way of salvation by the works of the law is by the keeping of the law in its entirety, then that road is closed against us, and the sooner we have done with it the better; for then we shall turn our thoughts in the right direction, and travel on the way which the Lord in great mercy has prepared for us. This is what Moses saith: hear it and be humbled.

II. Now I ask you to listen to

WHAT THE GOSPEL SAYS.

"The righteousness which is of faith, or believing, "speaketh on this wise, Say not in thy heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? (that is to bring Christ down from above:) or, Who shall descend into the deep? (that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead.) But what saith it? The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart; that is, the word of faith, which we preach; that if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved."

Now observe, first, that the Gospel claims to be like the law in its clearness. Moses claimed for the law which God had given to the people through him that it was clear, and within the range of their knowledge and understanding. I will read his exact words to you. Turn to Deuteronomy 30: 11: "For this commandment which I command thee this day, it is not hidden from thee, neither is it far off. It is not in heaven, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it? Neither is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go over the sea for us, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it? But the word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it."

Now Paul here very adroitly takes these words out of the mouth of Moses, alters them somewhat, and as good as says, "It was the boast of the law that it was clear, known, and accessible to the people; but much more is this the glory of the Gospel." Did not I show you just now that when Moses spoke he did not mystify the matter; but put it plainly, "The man that doeth those things shall live by them." So also the Gospel by no means involves itself in obscurity, but says, "Believe and live," quite as distinctly as Moses said, "Do and live." Here you have it, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

Let us go a little further. What saith the Gospel? Why, next, it forbids the questions of despair. "The righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise, Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? or, Who shall descend into the deep?" When a man is at length awakened to a sense of sin he cries, "I long to be saved! All that I have and all that I am I would give to escape from the righteous wrath of God. Sirs, what must I do to be saved? Surely it would need that I mount to heaven to own my sin, or dive to hell to bear its punishment. I want a righteousness which would need as much labor to produce as a climb to heaven would need; and I require an expiation for sin as great as though a man were plunged into the abyss itself, and there were made to suffer the divine anger. How is it possible that I can be saved?"

This wail of despair takes many forms; one man puts it thus: "What doings can I perform by which I can be saved?

"'Could my zeal no respite know,
Could my tears for ever flow,
All for sin could not atone.'"

Another, despairing of deliverance by his doings, runs upon his feelings, and cries, "If I am to be saved, surely I shall need to experience joys like those which are felt by spirits before the throne. If I had a sense of sin as deep as that of lost souls in hell, I could hope that I should be saved." Thus the second man looks to excitements and feelings just as the first looked to works and self-denials. Now, the Gospel forbids us to dream in this fashion. Do not suppose that anything is wanted as to doings or feelings in order to complete the righteousness which is wrought out by the Lord Jesus, and imputed by God to the believer.

"Ah, well," says one, "I know I must undergo a singular experience—either I must be carried right away to heaven with delirious delight, or be plunged into the waves of hell in frightful despair." No, my dear friend, do not say that even in your thought. The righteousness of faith lies not in dreams and visions, delusions or depressions; it lies only in reliance upon the work of Jesus finished for you. Go not to the loom to weave a righteousness.

THE GARMENT IS WOVEN

already; put it on; Christ gives it to you. Dig not into the bowels of the earth to find the gold of salvation. Christ holds it out to you; take it freely, and be rich forever. So one of the first works of the Gospel is silencing the questions of our unbelief.

Listen to it, lost ones; you need not climb to heaven; Christ has come down from heaven to you; and if you lie among the spiritually dead to-day, or think you do, He has come down to you, and you need not inquire how you can go up to Him. No prayers or tears are wanted to bring Him down; He has already come and is near at hand. You asked, "Who shall descend into the deep?" Now listen. Here is your answer. You need not "bring up Christ again from the dead," for the Lord has risen indeed. Now, your hope lies wholly in what this Son of God did in His descent and ascent. God has brought Him again from the dead and exalted Him at His own right hand, and this is not for Himself, but for all those who trust in Him. His death is instead of the death of our souls; His life is the life of our spirits.

Now, soul, thou hast nothing to do with asking vain questions; thou hast to accept the result of the Saviour's actual performances. The saving work is done, done by Him who was anointed of the Lord to do it. Look to Him and salvation is thine. Thy salvation rests in Jesus, rest thou in Jesus. Throw thyself upon Him now; even as a babe casts itself upon its mother's breast. Have done with every other confidence. What canst thou need more than to rely upon the Anointed of the Lord?

Now, Paul declares, or rather the Gospel speaking for itself declares, this word of life by faith in the risen Christ to be near us, that is, to be ACCESSIBLE TO US.

As your next door neighbor's house is not hard to get at, so neither is salvation by the Gospel. It is nigh you; it is night you now: it will never be nigher than it is at this moment. You may now believe in Christ and live eternally. Difficulty there is none; only believe and thou art saved. It is not a mystical, obscure thing; it is near and familiar. Believe in Christ as you would believe in your friend; believe that He died for sinners, and trust in Him for salvation. If God has made you feel yourself a sinner, then Christ is such a Saviour as you need and you may have Him at once; the only difficulty lies in the way being so easy that you can hardly think it can be so. Have done with doings, and feelings, and trust yourself with Christ. "The word is nigh thee."

Just as I lean all my weight upon this rail, so do I lean my soul wholly upon Christ. If what Christ has done will not save a sinner I am damned; for I have nothing else to depend upon; but if it will save, and sure I am that it will, I am saved as surely as Christ has risen from the dead. This is the substance of the matter—Christ saves, and we trust. This is what that word of faith says, even the Gospel which we preach.

Yet note, that Paul opens this up into two things. He says, "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." So there must be confession with the mouth. Do not leave that out. Do not suppose that you can be a believer and conceal your faith. As I said the other day, Do not behave like a rat behind the wainscot, only daring to come out in the dark. That is not Christ's way. If you trust in Him with your heart, trust Him openly, and confess Him with your mouth, owning that He is your Lord, and your Saviour. He has put the two things together—"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." The believing and the confession of that beliving in God's own way are never to be separated, for "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.' See ye well to this.

III. Thirdly, let us consider,

WHAT THE SCRIPTURE SAYS:

"Whosoever believeth on Him shall not be ashamed." "Whosoever." Whatever man in all the world, throughout all the ages, shall come and trust himself on Christ shall never be ashamed of having done so. You know what Cardinal Bellarmine said; he was a great antagonist of Luther, and thought that we might trust in our works; but, looking it all over, he admitted that inasmuch as no man could be quite sure that he had done enough good works, it was perhaps best on the whole and safest to trust altogether to the blood and merits of Jesus Christ. I have always felt obliged to the Cardinal for that admission; because the best is good enough for me, and since trusting in Jesus is the safest, I intend to stick to it even to the end.

What else does the Scripture say? It says that no man is forbidden to believe; "for there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek; for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon Him." There never was a sinner yet to whom God said, "You must not trust My Son;" on the contrary, it is written, "Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out." What about the doctrine of election? I need not speak about it this morning; I believe it, and rejoice in it; but it is not at all contrary to this precious truth. Read this verse, "All that the Father giveth Me shall come to Me; and him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out." Whoever will in the whole world believe in Christ may do so; he is neither too old or too young, or too rich, or too poor, or too wicked, or too moral; if he will but trust Christ he shall be saved, and he is fully allowed and permitted, yea, commanded to believe and live.

Once, again, though your faith should only be strong enough to lead you to pray, yet it shall save you, for "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved." Suppose your faith cannot work miracles; never mind about miracles. Suppose you cannot walk on the sea, like Peter; never mind; you are not called to do it. Can your faith pray? Can it cry? Then call upon the Lord, and you shall be saved. Poor dear heart, if you can but trust Christ, even though the feeblest possible manifestation of it should be the only thing visible, namely, your calling upon God in prayer, it must and shall save you.

IV. Now, I hope I have put it plainly. I have tried my best; and so I close by bidding you hear

WHAT EXPERIENCE SAYS.

What does experience say about believing in Christ? Experience says, and we are some of us here to say it, that it is the grandest way of living in the world. I assure you that I daily find the value of living by faith. In hours of dire distress and great heaviness of spirit, of which I know enough, I prove the power of faith in Jesus. Ah, my Lord, what should I do then if I could not as "a poor sinner, and nothing at all" find Christ to be my "all in all."

Fair-weather sailors, who go out in their little painted perfection boats, are people who have had small temptation and little soul-trouble. They are generally gentlemen in good health, with regular incomes and sweet tempers, and so they soon reach their imaginary sinlessness—vain creatures that they are; but you never get any of that among the poor, suffering, tried people of God. In stormy weather our beauty and glory soon turn pale; when the devil meets us face to face, he cracks up our tinsel perfection with a blow. He laughs at all our comeliness, he knows that it is a hollow cheat, a vile sham. In the moments when the soul is in the lowest depths, faith is the only way to live. That mode of living which will do for the depths is safe for the heights.

Now as to the test of death. Does this sort of faith enable men to FACE DEATH WITH COURAGE?

I have had almost thirty years among you, and God has been very gracious to us, so that we have lost very few comparatively by death; but now many are going home, and, according to the course of nature, many of our honored brethren and sisters will soon follow. As to those who have been called home, how have they died? I have the deep satisfaction of saying that when our dear brethren and sisters fall asleep they reflect honor upon the Gospel which we have preached. Ask those who have seen them die. These dear ones at this hour look back upon me and say, "Go on; preach the same Gospel to others; for we found it blessed truth to die upon."

Look at our dear, departed brother, Mr. Higgs, the last who has crossed the stream. His sons and daughters will tell you that his death was sad to them, but not to him. He suffered agonizing pain, but his peace was as deep as the sea. He had no uncertainty; he was as sure of his safety as if it had been a matter of calculation by the rules of arithmetic. He knew whom he had believed, and knew what the Lord had done for him, and he could not see a weak point in it all. He spent the whole night in trying to cheer and comfort others; he had no trembling thought.

He did not say, "Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O my friends, for the hand of the Lord hath touched me." No; he knew that Christ was the Resurrection and the Life, and he was ready to depart. He wished his beloved ones to go to their beds; and since they would stop with him, he desired them to sing." "What shall we sing?" "Sing," said he—

"Forever with the Lord,

It is hard singing when your father is dying, but it was not hard to him. He bade them read that chapter, "Let not your hearts be troubled," and, as they read it, he did not take the verses, and apply them to himself. No, he directed the comfort to his dear wife, for she had greater need of it than he had; his faith was firm. It was for her he cared, and for those about him; as for himself, all was rest. One said somewhat roughly to him a fortnight before, "Don't be down-hearted; you may get better yet." "Stop a minute," said he. "What do you mean? I have never been down-hearted at anything in my life; certainly not at the thought of dying. If it was the Lord's will that I should die in the street at this moment, I would cheerfully go." He never said a word more than he felt; yet that was the style of man. God send us more like him—men to whom religion is for home consumption. Not a pretty toy for Sundays, but food to live upon; a common-sense hope; a blunt man's religion that he can carry into business.

One reported to me the other day a word which cheered me much. An Italian gentleman, who has known me since I have been at Mentone, was asked, "Are you a Catholic?" "No, I am not." "Are you a Protestant?" "I am not sure, for I know little about it." "What are you?" "I am of Mr. Spurgeon's religion, which makes people happy themselves, and causes them to do good to others." I thank God he could say that of my religion; it did this for my dear friend—it made him a happy man, whose pleasure it was to please others; and now he has passed away in full sunlight into a still brighter noon. Amen, so let it be.

THE TOP AND BOTTOM OF THE MATTER

is, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ." Be nothing; be nobody; and trust HIM. Do not believe in yourself, but believe in Jesus. Have as many good works as you can cram into your life, but never tell anybody about them, or think anything of them. The best of them are but filthy rags; stow them all away in the coal-hole, and look to the merits of your Lord for salvation. Go to Jesus for everything. He says, "I counsel thee to buy of Me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed." Take His counsel. As he whom we sorrow for to day could die peacefully, and even merrily, so shall you and I if we rely on the same Saviour. When our time comes to depart, we shall just step aside and say, "Good-by, dear friends, awhile; we will meet again in the home of the blessed." I hear him say so at this moment; and I answer him, "Dear brother, we will be with you speedily."

WITCHCRAFT IN AFRICA.

THE paganism of Africa bears little or no resemblance to the complicated and elaborate systems which are found in some other heathen countries. It is a strange and foolish combination of unmeaning superstitions, rites, and ceremonies. It seems to recognize the existence of a superior spiritual power, but knows nothing of the character and claims of the true and living God. It requires divine homage to be paid to the spirits of departed chiefs and heroes, and to images, stocks, stones, mountains, rivers, beasts, birds, and reptiles, under the impression that they become animated or inspired by supernatural powers on certain occasions. They also worship and offer sacrifices to the devil himself, under the conviction that he alone has power to injure them, and that it is prudent to cultivate friendship with him that he may do them no harm.

Our picture on page 92 represents an execution for witchcraft in Africa. In many parts of "The Dark Continent," especially in the region of the Congo and in the South, all misfortunes, diseases, and deaths among men and cattle, are attributed to the influence of witchcraft. When any untoward event occurs to persons of rank, the first question asked is, "Who is the witch?" And as the person implicated is always liable to have his property confiscated, the wily "witch doctor" employed on the occasion is sure to fix upon some one possessed of wealth. At the command of the chief, a summons is issued to the suspected parties. A grand meeting is convened, and various foolish ceremonies are performed, with a view to "smell out" the culprit.

When the declaration is made by the "witch-doctor" implicating some one present, the unhappy victim is at once seized and subjected to the most revolting cruelty, to make him or her confess the crime and divulge all the particulars as to where the bewitching matter has been concealed, etc. Sometimes the suspected witch is bound with cords, besmeared with grease, and placed upon an ant-hill to be tormented by the noisome insects; at other times burning-hot stones are applied to the feet and other sensitive parts of the body, producing the most excruciating pain; and thousands of innocent persons have been put to death by spearing or decapitation (as shown in our picture), and by burning, strangulation, and in various other ways under this appalling system of superstition. So true is it that "the dark parts of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty."

Ta-Ren, the Chinese Barrow-man.

TA-REN, THE CHINESE BARROW-MAN.

(See Illustration.)

OUR picture on this page represents a Chinese barrow-man, pursuing his primitive, but arduous vocation. The barrow is the cheapest of all conveyances in China, both for the locomotion of passengers and the carrying of goods. For a marvellously small sum the coolie will patiently trundle his fare, or run with the goods, for any distance through the busy streets, or into the most remote country place. The missionaries sometimes use the conveyance when they wish to go from one place to another, not too far apart, and they distribute the Word of Life as they pass long.

A missionary relates that Ta-ren was led to Christ during one of these journeys. His astonishment was amazing as he listened to the story of Jesus and His love. It seemed really too great for him to receive all at once. By-and-by he comprehended the idea that Christ should wish to save a great, guilty, unhappy world, and that He Himself should die to give effect to His generous wish. He could also understand why He should desire to save great and wealthy men like the mandarins, and holy men like the priests, but he could not for a long time be got to understand that Christ had an equal love for all sinners, big and little, rich and poor, and that He loved, and would save as gladly, Ta-ren, the sinful, needy barrow-man, as anybody else.

At last, the Holy Spirit opened his eyes and he saw that Christ was a Saviour for him. His joy from this time forth was unbounded, and his love for One who had done such great things for him led him to seek opportunities for telling people about Him. Wherever he went he was a happy herald of salvation, and even the children cried out, as he passed along, "Here is the Jesus man again!" Already he has been exceedingly useful, and it is hoped that his life may be long spared to do greater good still.

One of the first to whom he spoke about the great salvation was his own brother, a desperately wicked character, and a notorious gambler and opium smoker. His vices threatened to speedily ruin him, and most certainly would have done so, had he not been influenced by Ta-ren, and the glad tidings of deliverance and joy which he proclaimed, so that he became a Christian, and, like his brother, is trying to win others to the knowledge and love of the same Saviour.

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

A MINISTER'S EXPERIENCE.

A communication is published by Miss Carrie F. Judd in her "Triumphs of Faith," from Rev. John Walton, a minister in Dakota, in the course of which he says: "I have seen two wonderful displays of God's power to answer prayer, since I came home. I went to the camp-meeting (Red Rock, Minn.) with my health greatly broken down, but when I received the baptism of power, God healed my left lung, and the pain around my heart was removed, so that from that time until now I have had no pain, and I am stronger than I have been for years. You would be surprised to

"When I came home I found one of my officials very sick from congestion of the lungs. His friends had given up all hope, and were in great trouble. I went to see him and offered prayer. God gave me faith to believe he would recover. I told them so; they did not believe it; but he is now fast recovering, and they are amazed.

"A woman who had lost her babe, when five weeks old, was sinking in rapid decline; her friends told me there was no hope. I went to see her and found her very happy. Her soul had been sanctified through her sickness and the death of her babe, and she was so joyous she could not keep from singing. I asked her if she wished me to pray for her recovery. 'Oh, yes, I do.' I read the promises bearing upon the subject of healing (James 5: 13-18), then we prayed. God powerfully blessed us, and we both believed for her healing. I saw at once there was a change; her pulse went down rapidly, the fever left her; she asked for food, her voice grew stronger, and there was such a wonderful change that when her husband came in from the field he was amazed, as she had been so weak and feverish the day before, and now was singing and praising God. I have strong faith for her complete recovery."

AT BETHSHAN.

A woman stood up with a child in her arms, and said: "Dear friends, you will remember me coming here on the first of November for the healing of my child here, who was suffering from consumption and bronchitis. I had, I may say, given up the doctors, and on getting home I found that the bronchitis had entirely gone. The consumption, however, had not gone, and I thought that it was for some sin that the Lord had witheld His healing power. But one night I heard a voice saying plainly to me, 'Your baby will be healed at five o'clock to-morrow morning.' But I said to myself, 'I may be asleep at that time, and how do I know that my child will be cured at five o'clock?' At a quarter to five I awoke, and so also did my child at ten minutes past five. For three days before she had never had anything, but immediately on awaking, she pointed to the dressing-table, where stood some milk, and she never stopped till she had drank it all. I have also to thank the Lord for the conversion of my husband."

THE BLACKSMITH'S ANTAGONIST.

A LITTLE group of farm-workers stood gossipping in a blacksmith's shop in a small village one summer morning. Farmer Jones's new team, the reclaiming of a bit of waste land for allotments, and similar subjects were the topics of conversation. Joshua Brown, the blacksmith, was busy about his work, but heard what was being said, and put in a word at intervals when standing at the fire he watched the heating of the piece of iron he held in the glowing embers by his tongs.

Joshua's opinions were held in some respect in the village. He was a shrewd, observant man, knew a good deal about horseflesh, a little of farming, a little of politics, and a little (not so much as he supposed) of science. He knew a great deal too about the quality of beer and spirits, and had in his time experimented in his own person on the effects of those fluids. That time was gone by now. Joshua was a strong temperance man, and the farmers who sent their horses to the smithy to be shod knew that the work would be done at once, an assurance they did not have in the days when Joshua used to have drinking spells that would continue two or three days at a time.

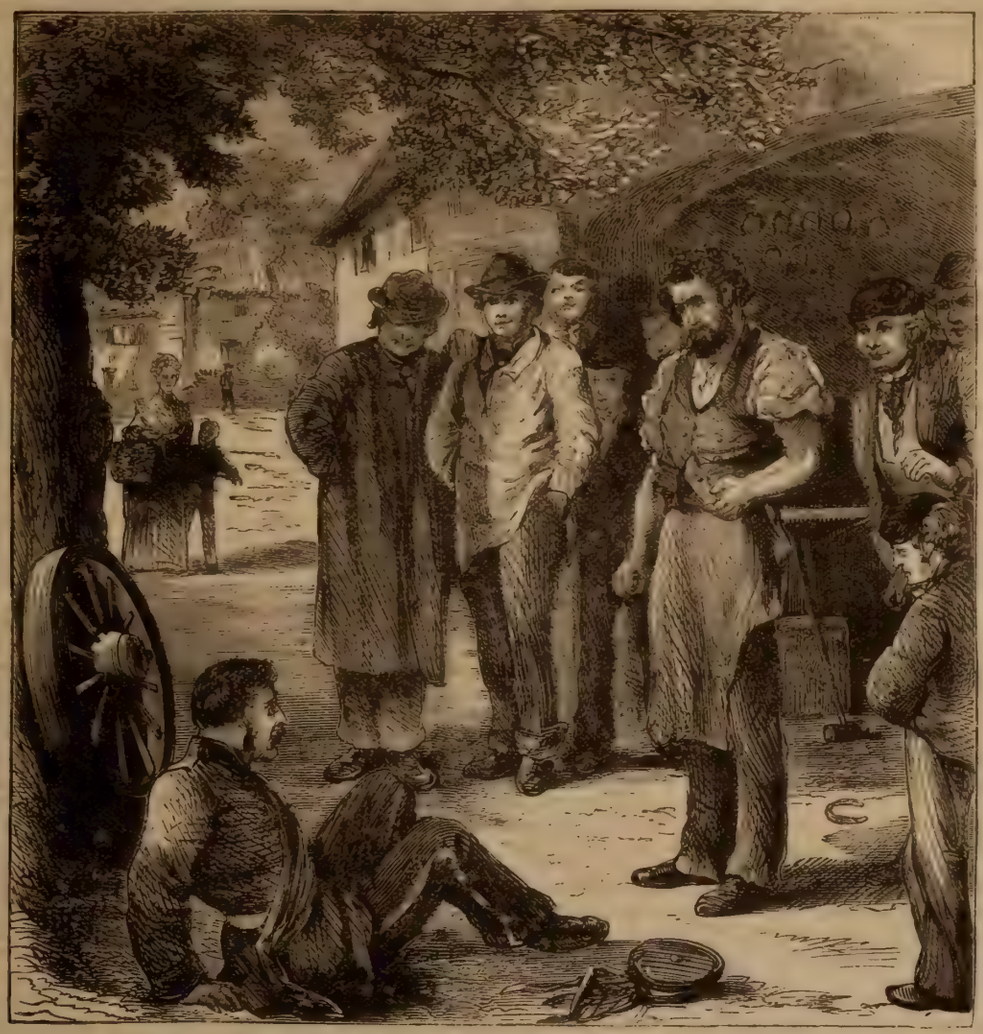
With his temperance reformation Joshua "got religion." He had a sonorous bass voice, and the news that some splendid singing was going on at revival meetings being held in the village chapel attracted Joshua to the little wooden building at the end of the village street. He caught one or two of the tunes quickly, and joined in the singing with a good deal of pleasure and heartiness. That was to be expected, but no one in the village expected what did occur. Joshua was seen one night in conversation with the minister, and was afterward observed kneeling down with him in prayer. The news spread through the village the next morning that the blacksmith was converted. It was not believed at first, for Joshua was looked upon as an infidel, and would on occasion explain on scientific grounds why certain miracles mentioned in Scripture could not have taken place. But the news was confirmed, Joshua was publicly received into the Church on Sunday, and regularly thereafter took his seat in the choir.



The Swearing Soldier's Expulsion from the Smithy.

An intimation of the change in Joshua's character appeared in his shop. On the wall hung a card on which the smith with infinite pains had inscribed in large letters, "No swearing allowed around here." That was a startling change. Heretofore the conversation in the smithy had been plentifully garnished with oaths, and the smith himself used pretty strong expletives at times. But Joshua was master inside the shop, and the general verdict on the law he had enacted was that it was a consistent thing to do, and that Joshua had a right to do it in his own place. Such a man was the smith, and such was the state of affairs on that particular morning, which was about six months after the smith's conversion.

Work and conversation were going on as described, when the minister unexpectedly entered the shop, and nodding to the men around went over to Joshua. There was a little talk between them, and then the minister and the smith went together outside and stood chatting under the big tree.

"Don't get into a passion, Joshua," said the minister; "you must be on your guard against that. That is why I came to see you this morning. I heard that Tom Atkins had come home, and last night in the ale-house the talk was about you, and Tom Atkins is set upon annoying you in some way."

"I knew Tom, sir, before he went for a soldier, and I ain't afraid of him," said the smith.

"I know that," said the minister, "but I am afraid of your being irritated by him and doing something desperate. Tom has been made a sergeant, and he has a showy new uniform, and is very proud of it and himself. If he comes here showing off and acting as he acted at the ale-house, I am afraid you'll be tempted—"

"To take him down a bit," said the smith, as the minister hesitated for a word. "Yes, so I should, but I guess he won't try me so far. He knows something of my muscle of old, and if he thinks a bit he'll be aware that his line of life has made him weaker and mine has made me stronger since then. He won't interfere with me, sir, you may be sure."

"I hope not, Joshua; but have a care of your temper. Remember who it was that was reviled and spat upon and bore that treatment patiently." And the minister shook hands cordially and went his way.

Less than an hour afterward Tom Atkins sauntered into the shop and greeted his old acquaintance. Joshua received him cordially, and for a few minutes all went well. Then a few of the men who had heard the soldier's talk in the ale-house dropped in too, to witness anything that might happen. The soldier had evidently been to the ale-house again that morning, and the audience gathered around encouraged him to chaff the converted blacksmith. Joshua bore the chaff very well, and having some wit of his own, the laugh went against the soldier more than once, and Atkins lost his temper. A volley of guard-room oaths burst from his lips.

"Swearing not allowed," said Joshua, pointing to the notice to that effect on the smithy wall.

"You need not swear yourself, my man," said Atkins, "but you are not going to command me. My tongue's my own, and I shall not be hindered in using it. These men can take your orders if they like, but when I want to swear I shall swear," and he gave another specimen of his powers in that bad line.

Joshua laid down his hammer, and confronting the soldier ordered him out of his shop. Atkins refused to stir, and intimated that there would be a fight if the smith touched him. The smith obviously intended to enforce his order, and Atkins seeing that he did, struck at him viciously. Instead of parrying the blow as the soldier expected he would, the smith stepped backward, and Atkins, who was not particularly steady on his feet, was almost overbalanced by the force he had expended on empty air. Before he had recovered himself, his arms were pinioned to his sides, and the smith was pushing him backward to the door of the shop. The soldier made an effort to free himself there, but it was of no use; he was lifted bodily by the smith, whose strength seemed at that moment the strength of a giant, and he was hurled out of the shop on the turf outside, where he lay for a moment stunned and helpless on his back.

"You had better keep yourself on the outside of my place for the future," said the smith, as Atkins raised himself to a sitting posture and glared savagely at his mighty antagonist. "I am not a fighting man, but I mean to stop swearing in my place, and you see I can do it in your case. Now let me help you up, and then you go home and get sober." So saying the smith good-naturedly raised the discomfited man to his feet, and saw him slouch off with abashed face toward his home. He then quietly returned to his work, congratulating himself on having administered a lesson to his tormentor he would not soon forget.

The minister heard of what had occurred in a short time, and before the day closed he thought he would see Atkins, and he called on him and had a long conversation with him. The next day the smith was astonished to see the soldier enter his shop again. He expected there was to be another trial for his temper, but to his amazement Atkins came right up to him, and putting out his hand he blurted out an apology. Joshua shook it cordially, and told him he was glad there was to be no ill-will between them. Before the soldier left the village he had signed the pledge, and had been seen in the choir by Joshua's side.

DIED IN HARNESS.

A TRUE STORY OF IRISH LIFE.

By Miss M. M. Ross.

God's Promise Fulfilled.

"WHAT is the matter with your son, my good woman?" said Mrs. O'Neverdon, compassionately. "I hope your fears have exaggerated his case."

"Bad, ma'am; they batthered an' bruk his head. Batthered it," continued she, wringing her hands. "He an' another 'boy' was talkin' te the same little girl, an' she tuk te me 'boy,' an' small blame te her fur that; fur he was the cleverest an' clanest limbed 'boy' ye'd meet wid anywhere, T'other feller fell to on' fought an account av that, an' that was the way it come about. But I must go."

"I think the best thing you can do," said Mrs. O'Neverdon, "is to set a person to watch for Mr. Sharpe. I know my husband cannot leave his patient to-night. If there was anything I could do—"

"Av there was anything ye could do! Didn't ye give me the feelin' av yer heart an' a tear from yer eye, and that'll help to sweeten the bittherest cup that falls to the lot av a poor widdy woman. May God bless ye fur it; an' may the time niver come whin ye'll see the pride av yer eyes an' the staff av yer ould age swep' from yer arms by the could blast av death."

"Who was that knocked at the door a little time ago?" said Dr. O'Neverdon to his wife, as he lay confined to the sofa with a severe headache, the blinds being down to exclude the light.

"It was Mr. Jeet's man," said his wife, drawing her hand out of the stocking she was darning, and refilling her needle with fresh cotton as she answered, "I told him you were quite unable to leave the house to-day, and to go for Mr. Sharpe."

"He can't bear Sharpe. He was going on very well—did the man say his master was worse?" said her husband, anxiously sitting up with difficulty to watch his wife's face as she answered; for he well knew when his health was concerned how skilfully she would parry his questions.

"No, dear, and I am quite sure he is not; you know they are rather fussy people. Let me put this pillow under your head, dear; you will find that table so hard," as, unable to keep his head up unsupported, he rested it on a little table beside him.

"No, love; just push me my large Bible; it is the 'Book of rest,'" and as he clasped his hands reverently on it, he said, half aloud:

"Oh, the love of Christ! It passeth knowledge. He loved us in our ruin; while we were His enemies; while we hated Him; while there was nothing lovely is us; and by this amazing love draws us to Himself. It is unspeakable; it can be felt by a renewed heart, but it cannot be uttered; and it can only be fully realized when we see the King in His beauty, when our lips shall move with ceaseless praises, 'Worthy the Lamb!'"

He had just fallen into a light slumber when he was aroused again by another loud knock at the hall door.

"I must see Dr. O'Neverdon," was repeated in rather an irritated tone by a man's voice as the door was quickly opened. "Miss Leet thinks she has got brankuytas, and Miss Lavinia is in istericks."

"No matther who has got bronkuytas or astericks ayther, I'll not disturb the poor man; an' he so sick, he niver put a bit into his head since this time yestherday," replied faithful Peggy.

"It's not my fault," answered the man, sulkily; "but it's as much as my place is worth to go back without—"

"An' what d'ye think his life is worth?" interrupted the woman, in an indignant tone. "D'ye think he's a black injy slave intirely? It's what I think ye do, all av yees. Ye may say that Peggy Callan wouldn't disturb her masther, an' he's lyin' bad on the sophy; if I was te be put out an' kilt this minnit, I won't do it!"

Every word of this argument was distinctly heard in the parlor, which was off the hall, and completely roused the poor doctor.

"I suppose I had better go," he groaned, as he tried to rise, but immediately fell back helplessly in a faint.

As Mrs. O'Neverdon feared, Dr. Sharpe pronounced her husband's case to be one of fever. He had tried to struggle against the feeling of illness for some days, until at last, mastered by the disease, he sank down in harness.

Several days elapsed, and no bad symptoms appeared; but Dr. Sharpe's intensest and most gloomy apprehensions were in the want of symptoms. At this advanced stage they should be more palpable, better defined, he thought. "We have no ground to stand upon," was his answer to all inquiries. "There was great want of tone, the system was unable to develop the fever in the usual time, and yet there was extreme exhaustion."

Finding the case becoming more serious, and the difficulty in the treatment increasing, he urged the necessity of having another physician in daily attendance; and Dr. Nixon, a man of great professional ability, was accordingly telegraphed for. He followed up the treatment of the other physician, and on his first visit gave rather a favorable prognosis.

Poor Mrs. O'Neverdon, night and day devoted herself wholly to her husband. She had sent the three elder children to her mother, and some kind friends in the village insisted on taking the younger ones. Ceaseless were the inquiries and untiring the sympathy that flowed in to her; all the nourishment used by her husband his grateful patients supplied, and though provided with an excellent nurse, she herself performed nearly every possible duty about the patient.

Day by day the faithful watchers saw the gradually declining strength, and the awful truth dawned upon Mrs. O'Neverdon, that but a few hours now remained to him who was her dearest earthly treasure. So intense was the agony that her very life seemed ebbing with his. But, blessed be God, not only the pasture, but the rod and staff comfort, and He seldom gives us so sweet a foretaste of future rest as in days of deep affliction and suffering, so that when at last sweetly and calmly the weary, worn spirit fled to the Father's bosom, she was led as it were to the backside of the desert to hear the still small voice, and to feel the shadow of a Great Rock in a weary land. Oh, there is a "needs-be," for every stroke, and it is a Father's hand that applies the rod.

It was some months after her husband's death. Summer was passed away, and the last leaves of autumn had fallen, when the sad reality pressed upon Mrs. O'Neverdon that she must leave her home. But whither she could go, she knew not.

"There is no help for it, my child," said she, trying to look brightly at the eldest boy who had spent the morning with her in his father's study, trying to select what books they were to reserve from the sale, which was to take place in a few days. "There is no help for it, it is hard to part with any, but we could not possibly keep all."

"Mother! there is a very large double knock at the door," said little Willie at that moment, coming into the room, with his arms full of broken toys, "Betty says it's a gentleman, p'raps he's coming 'bout the house."

"Tell Betty to show him in here, my child; the other rooms are in such confusion."

"I'll open door 'self," said the independent little fellow, and hastily dropping his treasures in the midst of the floor, he eagerly ushered the visitor into the little study.

"I am sorry you have found us in such confusion," said Mrs. O'Neverdon, bowing gracefully, as the gentleman entered the room; while Willie, seized with a sudden fit of shyness, carefully hid himself behind her dress.

"This must be my introduction," said the stranger, handing Mrs. O'Neverdon a small and well-worn copy of the New Testament. Opening it she read on the title-page, "Ralph O'Neverdon, on his eighth birthday, from his affectionate father, Lewis O'Neverdon, June 12th, 1836."

"Yes; this was my husband's book," said Mrs. O'Neverdon, "it was accidentally given away."

"Pardon me, madam, I can never believe it was an accident," said the gentleman, taking the offered chair; "it was a most providential thing."

"How did you get it, pray?" asked the lady.

Without answering her he drew from his pocket a carefully-folded tartan muffler.

"You remember the occasion on which your husband gave this away?"

Mrs. O'Neverdon looked with a puzzled expression from the muffler to the handsome face of the speaker, and looked still more surprised.

"Yes, madam; I am Percival St. Cloud, and it was with feelings of deep regret I learned this morning in the village the sad news your dress confirms to me, that I should see the face of him no more on earth, whose memory has been for the last few years as my guardian angel. Perhaps you have heard my story, madam? I will repeat it.

"I had made my way, now more than five years ago, from the north of Ireland to the county of T——, on foot. Having squandered a noble patrimony left me by my father, I knew no one who would help or pity me, and as I sank on the road, sick, exhausted, footsore, and hungry, I was almost tempted to put an end to a life which had become a burden to myself Just then a gentleman on a car drove by, and something in his face arrested my attention. I raised one arm feebly, and immediately he was at my side. With the assistance of his man he lifted me on his car and brought me to a neighboring farm-house, got me food, and, hearing I was anxious to proceed to A——, where a relative resided who, I thought, would help me to obtain some employment, he took out his purse and gave me ten shillings. I objected taking so much, as I saw very few coins remained, but he smilingly said, 'The Lord is my banker; He will give me good interest.'

"When he was leaving, seeing I was thinly clad for the time of year, he took from his pocket this muffler, and in doing so the little Testament fell to the ground. I clutched it eagerly, it was so long since I had seen one. Dr. O'Neverdon said, 'I value that little book very much, but perhaps the Lord means you should have it, and may He bless it to you!'

"After many kind words of counsel from him we parted. I made my way to A——, was assisted to emigrate to one of the Western States of America, and have now more than regained my former position. I have come back purposely to pay with interest the sum your husband lent me.

"That little book has been my constant companion for the last five years, and the means of eternal blessing to my soul. The day before I left America I went to New York to transact some business in the office of a respectable broker there. Having some time to wait before seeing him, I took out my little friend to read, laying it on the desk. At his entrance he mechanically took it up, and on opening it I saw him turn ashy pale as he read the names written inside. 'Where did you get this?' said he, quickly. I told him the story I have just told you, and we both knelt down to return thanks for the wonderful way in which we had been led.

"The gentleman is your husband's uncle. Over and over again he has made ineffectual attempts to find out if any of his sister's family were living, and, too old to take a long journey himself to pay you a visit, he has deputed me to be the bearer of his message."

"I often heard my dear husband speak of his uncle, Mr. Moon. He remembered his kindness when a child, but he always thought he was lost at sea. We have considered him as dead."

"No, madam, he is a prosperous man, has no living children, and his wife having died within the last year, makes him all the more anxious to have you with him."

After some further conversation, Mr. St. Cloud took leave, and Mrs. O'Neverdon sat down to think and ponder on that truth of inspiration, "I have been young and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread."

As our readers will have guessed, the letter Mrs. O'Neverdon received from her uncle contained more than mere words—a handsome sum of money accompanied a pressing and loving invitation that the whole family should, as soon as possible, take up their abode with the lonely old man; and, as the letter was, of course, addressed to her husband, many were the tears that fell, but no drop of bitterness was in her cup, for He that said, "Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive, and let thy widows trust in Me," had caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.

A bank-note for fifty pounds had been left by Mr. St. Cloud in an envelope with a few touching lines, and Mrs. O'Neverdon had now enough and to spare for all her wants.

* * * * * * *

It was a bright morning as Mrs. O'Neverdon, early astir on the day of her departure from her village home, drew aside the curtains to look out. It was a fair day in R——, and already the country people were fast flocking in with their various articles for sale. Women with scarlet handkerchiefs tied over their jet-black hair carrying carefully-covered baskets of butter and eggs; tall, stalwart men vainly trying to guide the straggling steps of wilful "boneens" by means of a straw rope tied to their hinder legs; here and there a sturdy old dame in her dark blue cloak and short petticoats, with a long switch in her hand, drove before her a huge mother pig followed by her litter. Down each side of the street men were busily engaged in erecting tents for the safe display of more perishable articles; and on snow-white tables gaudy crockery and bright tin ware tempted the eyes of country housewives.

A large stand of old clothes held the most prominent place under the supervision of "Cheap John," and, to judge from the admiring glances which were already cast at some of his wonderful store, his efforts to reduce his stock during the day would prove a decided success.

All these scenes Mrs. O'Neverdon took in at a glance, and for a moment sad memories took possession of her, but with a struggle she flung them away, for much had to be done and thought of still.

After breakfast the children visited all their loved haunts, and carefully treasured a bunch of daisies from the paddock.

Mrs. O'Neverdon alone paid her last visit to her husband's grave. It was in a retired nook of the quaint old churchyard, beneath a spreading laurel, unmarked as yet by stone or slab.

As she finished planting some favorite flowers on the sacred spot, her eye caught the figure of a woman, wrapped in a gray cloak, kneeling beside a grave in the part of the ground reserved for the Roman Catholics. Her sobs could every now and then be heard distinctly, and moved by the sight of her grief, Mrs. O'Neverdon gently touched her shoulder. She started to her feet—it was poor Dan Carroli's widow.

A short and prosperous voyage in the Syren, and Mrs. O'Neverdon and her family were safely landed at New York. An old man with snowy hair was anxiously waiting their arrival as they steamed up the River Hudson, and a hearty welcome to his handsome and luxuriantly-furnished house soon made the weary traveller feel at home.

CHRISTIAN COURAGE.

S.S. Lesson for Feb. 18. Acts 4: 18-33. Golden Text, ver. 19. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Useless Threats—Orders from Headquarters—Distinct Direction May be Had—Constrained to Speak—An Unendowed Priesthood—Springtime in the Church—Christian Communism—The Normal State of the Church—The Result—Power and Grace—Full Surrender and Full Trust.

THE assembly which sat in council as to the method of dealing with Peter and John, had come to the determination to threaten these disciples "that they speak henceforth to no man in this name." But they were unacquainted with the power, authority, and weight, which God had given to the name of Jesus. "They called them and commanded them not to speak at all nor teach in the name of Jesus." But the men they threatened were standing at that very time in the presence of God; God the Holy Ghost was dwelling in them, Jesus was with them always, and especially so now in the time of their need. They took orders from headquarters, and so real was God to them that they were overtaken with no timidity or fear of man, but they brought even their judges face to face with God Until now Peter had been the chief spokesman, but now it seems John spoke with equal boldness. They said, "Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye. For we cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard." "Ye are bought with a price, be ye not the servants of men" said Paul (1 Cor. 7 : 23). Servile consideration for the opinion, the prejudices, the position of men, brings the servants of God into bondage. While we are called to submit to every ordinance of men for the Lord's sake, we are equally bound to act under the authority of God when He commands us to follow any course of action, which men forbid without so much as inquiring whether God has called us to it or not.

Every really consecrated child of God may have distinct and clear direction from God about all things. There is no imagination, there need be no delusion when a heart is thoroughly upright and an eye thoroughly single toward God. When once a course is clear, we can speak with God's authority about it, though all men should be against us. There are some who would subvert all ecclesiastical authority and uproot all existing churches; but this spirit is most surely not of God; rather remain as God's light and God's salt. But when men attempt to hinder the work of the Spirit of God who calls men, women or children to win souls, then bring in God's authority, for He has called every converted soul to be a witness for Him, and a winner of other souls. And to such as would hinder them, we have one answer and that is the answer of Peter and John. It is the instinct of every truly converted soul to testify of what God has done for him; he cannot help it, it flows out unbidden.

"WE CANNOT BUT SPEAK

the things which we have seen and heard."

The rulers "further threatened them," but they could do no more; the mass of the people glorified God for that which was done, and thus they could not punish them. The people had no personal interests at stake, the priests had a great deal; it had never been known that one of their number had made a man to walk who had been born lame and had continued so for forty years, and if such manifestations continued, the people would all discover that the power of God was with Christ's disciples and not with the priests. This would be fatal to their authority, so at any cost they must put it down. This is the way in which many unspiritual ministers and elders of churches argue. But why do they not come to God to be endued with the same power? Alas! this would be too great a blow to their pride, they would rather pass for what they are not, and would rather cast discredit upon the work of the Holy Ghost, than come down to the position of learners.

Peter and John left the council, and related to their own company all which the chief priests and elders had said unto them. How would men filled with the Holy Ghost act under such circumstances? Would they talk it over, reflect upon the want of spirituality among the priests, and take advantage of the occasion to magnify themselves at their expense? This would be the way of the world; but these were not of the world even as Christ was not of the world. No, "they lifted up their voice to God with one accord" and strengthened themselves in God. They prayed as though themselves were not concerned; practically denying or they saw the people rising up against, "Thy holy child Jesus, whom Thou hast anointed . . . for to do whatsoever Thy hand and Thy counsel determined before to be done." Oh, glorious independence of man! Oh, glorious freedom from circumstances which comes of taking all things from God and seeing His hand in all! Reader, recognize God, and turn your eye from yourself and all men, then all will come right.

Then the disciples said, "And now, Lord, behold their threatenings, and grant Thy servants, that with all boldness they may speak Thy Word, by stretching forth Thine hand to heal, and that signs and wonders may be done by the name of Thy holy child Jesus." Here is a specimen of a Holy Ghost-made prayer. They do not pray, "Behold their threatenings, and keep us in safety;" themselves were lost and forgotten, they lived but for the commission which had been given them. Seeing how this healing had been used in awakening hundreds, they thirsted for boldness in speaking of Jesus, which should be warranted, as their Lord had promised, by "signs following" them that believe. Teach us, our Lord, thus to pray, and thus to receive answer. "When they had prayed, the place was shaken where they were assembled together; and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and they spake the Word of God with boldness.". There was no cowardice, no shrinking from that which had brought them into trouble; no, it was springtide in the Church then, self seemed to be non-existent, all was seen in the light of God, and souls, in

THE LIGHT OF ETERNITY.

"And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul; neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common." The last yearning prayer of our beloved Lord was receiving its answer, "That they all may be one, as Thou Father art in Me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us, that the world may believe that Thou hast sent Me" (John 17 : 21). O reader, this is life, the life of God—shall it be repeated and realized in you and me? Shall we have but one heart and one soul, the heart and soul of Jesus? Shall "I" and "me," "yours" and "mine," cease to be named among us? Shall all be His and all be ours? Shall self be laid down and Himself take its place, so that nothing personal shall touch us any more, and the only person recognized among us shall be the Person of Christ?

Many may say "these are Utopian ideas." But this state of things and can exist again. Let us have done with looking at this picture of the primitive Church as though it were some fable or fairy story, it is but the normal state of a truly healthy church. Lord, it is Thine own standard, bring us up to it! It is the want of this state of things which lies at the root of all our weakness, all our death, all our powerlessness, all our unspirituality. It is the want of this which creates infidels and gives them occasion for their boast that Christianity is a failure. It is the want of this which brings disunion in churches, which hinders the healing of disease, the casting out of devils, the conversion of thousands among the heathen, it is this probably which delays the coming of our Lord, for His wife hath not yet "made herself ready" (Rev. 19 : 7).

What was the result of this state of things in the early church? "With great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, and great grace was upon them all." No wonder the Word was with power; the hearers looked from the message to the messengers, and saw before them men whom no personal or earthly motive could move, they feared neither shame, suffering, temporal loss, reproach, nor death, they were vulnerable nowhere; covered with the whole armor of God, the fierce darts of the enemy glanced back from off them, and men felt an irresistible power in the message which they spoke.

Why should it not be so among us? Brethren, are we willing to pay the price? Are we willing to lay down our own life, our own interests, and by renouncing self, to put ourselves out at interest for God, reserving nothing for ourselves? Hundreds of millions of heathens, millions of so-called but unconverted Christians, thousands of possessed ones and thousands of sick ones are waiting for deliverance; and the miserable state of Christianity is such that but a few crumbs here and there are thrown to the perishing multitudes. God is calling for a holy church, separate from the world, separate from self, through which He can work as in these early days. Every individual man who surrenders all, really all for God, and renounces all self, life, power, interests in God's favor, is throwing in his little share to that mighty cause of God which cries out to us for a whole hearted, thorough life of godliness in these last days. Full surrender and then full trust; moment by moment rejoicing in God's will in all the little crosses of daily life, and letting Him take possession, letting Him try us and use us as He will; this is really helping forward the kingdom of God in a measure which only eternity will show us. And this, though it may be in the humblest life in a cottage home, or that of a young servant girl. Lord, awaken Thy people to a life worthy of Thee and of the vocation wherewith Thou hast called them.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Charge of Being Concerned in the Murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke was made on Saturday against eight of the twenty prisoners recently captured in Ireland. Among them was Carey, the town councillor of Dublin. The prisoners on being arraigned conducted themselves with gross indecorum. They shook hands with each other, laughed boisterously, and nodded to friends in the court. They are said to have become more serious as the evidence against them proceeded. Carey, the town councillor, was the owner of the premises on which the knives were found that are supposed to have been used in the murder. Testimony was given by the occupier of the building, showing that Carey often visited the place where they were concealed. The knives were found hidden among rubbish between the roof and the slates. They are sharp dissecting knives nine inches long. A surgeon testified that only knives of such a length and shape could have inflicted the wounds on the victims. Brady, another prisoner, was identified by five witnesses as being near the scene of the murder when it was committed. The park ranger swore that he saw him on the car which contained the men believed to have committed the murder. A man and his wife saw him near the spot shortly after the crime, and separately singled him out from his fellow prisoners, and two other witnesses swore that they saw him lurking under the trees before the murder. Two other prisoners, O'Brien and McCaffrey were each identified by two witnesses. Considerable excitement has been caused by the trial, but it is evident that unless the government has the evidence of accomplices to offer there can be no conviction. The testimony given on the first day of the trial furnishes ground for suspicion, but does not supply the actual proof necessary for conviction on so grave a charge. The police believe that twenty men took part in the crime as watchers and in other capacities, beside the actual perpetrators.

Reports of Severe Distress are Sent from Ireland. In some cases the people are reported to be living on seaweed as their staple food, supplemented by occasional gifts from charitable persons. An account published in the New York Herald, states that the measures passed by the liberal government for the relief of the people have unhappily aggravated the evil. When the Arrears act was passed it was a tempting bait to the tenant farmers. The parish priests explained to them its provisions, told them that if they would pay an additional year's rent the government would contribute an equal sum, and they would be free. Since this was known they have made extraordinary exertions to gather the necessary amount. They have sold their sheep, their cattle, even their pigs. Those who had looked on rent-paying as an obsolete practice have been stinting themselves in the hope of having a share in the new boon. The landlords have pocketed the instalment with avidity and, when the pinch of famine comes, the tenants are penniless.

The Floods in Germany have Caused Intense misery. A graphic description of the scene at Hofhein is furnished to the Worms Zeitung by an eye-witness. He says: "With much difficulty our boat was pushed through masses of wood, straw, garden railings, which the water had heaped together in the streets. The water reached up to the upper part of the windows, through which the flood rushed in and out, swimming away furniture and all that could pass out of the opening. The upper story of the Rathaus was crowded with men, women and children, who stretched out their hands to receive the provisions brought to them in the boats. We were about to return, having distributed all our stock of provisions, when we were asked to take food and bedding to the church. The entrance was crowded with men, and we had some difficulty in getting inside. Candles were lighted on the altar as if for divine service, and spread a magical light through the gloomy space. Before the altar, on the elevated portion, stood a number of horses, while on the floor of the church cattle stood packed like herring, side by side. Among them the men moved with difficulty. In the gallery women occupied the lay benches. They held little children in their arms, while older ones sat on the floor beside them. There was scarcely a word spoken. All seemed to be overcome with terror and weariness." It is stated that an inquiry has been commenced by the German Government with a view to devising measures for the prevention of a recurrence of the calamity.

The New Cabinet in France is Regarded as a provisional arrangement to tide over the present difficulty. President Grévy invited M. Jules Ferry, a prominent republican leader to become Premier, but he declined. M. Fallières was then requested to form a cabinet; which he did, several members of the late Cabinet consenting to serve under him. M. Fallières is a young man not yet forty-two years of age. He is very popular in the department of Lot-et-Garonne where he resides; but is little known in the social or political world of Paris. On the first day of his appearing in the Legislature as Prime Minister, M. Fallières was seized with illness and the sitting was suspended. M. Fabre has introduced a bill to take the place of the one proscribing the French Princes. The first clause prohibits the Princes from filling any civil or military post, the second empowers the President to decree their expulsion, and the third enacts a penalty of from one to five years' imprisonment for a violation of such a decree. The bill was passed by the Chamber of Deputies and sent to the Senate.

The Czar of Russia has Overcome his Fears of assassination sufficiently to participate in a state ball. A cable from St. Petersburg states that on Wednesday, January 31st, he gave a ball at the Winter Palace which was the most brilliant affair of the kind seen for many years. Invitations were issued to the number of 2500, and tickets of entry to the Palace were distributed as a precaution against the intrusion of persons having evil intentions. At the supper the Emperor walked around the tables and paid attentions to his guests. It is stated in Berlin that the Czar has ordered his coronation manifesto to be ready for his signature on the 26th of February.

A Welcome Change in the Postal Arrangements of the British Government is said to be under consideration. Merchants and others having correspondence with England, have during the past six or seven years been subjected to considerable inconvenience by the conservative policy of the government. Four mails leave this country for England every week, while only three leave England for America. The English Government too, have persisted in sending the mails by the slowest steamers, even when fast steamers start from the same port on the same day. Thus the Alaska, which usually makes the voyage in seven days, left Liverpool on January 20th, the same day as the Catalonia which usually takes ten or twelve days, and on this occasion had not accomplished the voyage in fifteen days; but the British mail was put on board the Catalonia. Mr. Fawcett, the English Postmaster-General, now proposes to send the mails by the quicker of two vessels starting on the same day.

An Improvement of the Suez Canal is Projected. M. de Lesseps and the Works Committee of the Suez Canal have accepted the scheme of the Board of Directors for the improvement of the Canal, and intend to set about carrying it out at once. The suggestions, seven in number, include the construction of a new dock at Port Said and the widening of the Canal near Suez. The total cost of the changes is to be twenty-three millions of francs, and it is expected that a year or two will be required to accomplish them.

The Mission to the Jews in Jerusalem has recently received an accession to its staff in the person of Mr. William Greene, who lately left England for the Holy City. He thus writes of the condition and prospects of the mission: "The Jews are rapidly returning here, not only from Russia, but from other quarters, and their numbers may be estimated safely at some 20,000, and the total population of Jerusalem at 40,000. These figures I got from the best sources. The town is extending so rapidly outside the walls that in a little time the outside portion will be the most important, as it is already by far the most agreeable, and house-property is lowering in the old town. One principal object I had in view in coming was to find out the possibilty of placing the afflicted families in the land of their fathers; I am glad to say that this object is perfectly attainable, and already three good proposals have been made that will make the great problem of the beginning of the colonization of Palestine no longer a vision or a chimera, but a fact. I feel that all the friends in England require is a practical, tangible scheme that they can see their way to be a success, and the money to carry it out will be forthcoming. This information I hope to give on my return."

The Friends of Mr. B. Aitken, Formerly of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will be glad to learn of his safe arrival in India, where he hopes to labor for Christ. Writing to the Editor, Mr. Aitken describes his journey as one to which American travellers would object. During the two weeks preceding the date of his letter he had "walked thirty miles in nine hours over an uphill road, covered with broken and jagged stones as thick as they could lie; ridden eighty miles in two days upon a donkey (a humiliating and wearisome exercise); performed indefinite distances on horseback; travelled a long journey in a mule cart without springs over a road like the rocks on a seashore; and gone sixty miles in a small native boat with no company except five boatmen, not one word of whose language I understood. I have been pelted and hailed as 'Yangkweitz' (foreign devil), by innumerable Chinamen in the hostile city of Winchango, but am now once more in the midst of old Indian associations and practices at the end of my journey."

An Encounter with a Chinese Junk.—The Rev. Dr. Wenyon, the distinguished Methodist medical missionary at Fatshan, China, has just had a narrow escape. While he was on a visiting-tour among the stations in the circuit, he was fired at twice at Shin Han, by a Chinese junk, anchored about five hundred yards away, while he was sitting on the grassy bank of the river, close to his own boat. The first ball flew past his head, and, standing up at once to look round, wondering whence the shot proceeded, he saw in a moment or two on the side of the junk the flash of a second shot; instinctively he threw himself flat upon the ground close to the water's edge, and in an instant he heard the bullet whiz over him into the bank. It was evidently thought by the would-be-assassin on the junk, from seeing him fall, that he was struck, and no more shots were fired. He applied to the Mandarins for protection, but they refused to do anything whatever for him. Dr. Wenyon says: "I stayed that day at Shin Han to dispense medicines to the sick, went on to San-tu and did my work there, and four days afterward reached Fatshan. I do not consider this a case of religious persecution, it was not opposition to mission work, nor dislike to Christianity which prompted the act, for the man could not well know what my work was. The motive, no doubt, was simply the inveterate hate of the foreigner which is everywhere apparent in this part of China, and which is, I think, perhaps the morst formidable obstacle to our work."

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), for January, may be obtained at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price six cents, postage paid.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

FREQUENT reference has been made in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the work Dr. T. J. Barnardo is doing among the homeless boys of London. This week, with a portrait of the philanthropist, a picture of the homes he has established, and two characteristic sketches of his work, which appear on the first page, we give a more detailed account of his labors. Briefly stated, Dr. Barnardo does a work which the government of his own and other countries has left undone, that of prevention of crime. In all the great cities of the world there are to be seen boys who have no home; some who have not even a shelter, and many others who have a place they call home, but which has none of the associations about it which give to the word its meaning and true import. Such boys soon become criminals. Their necessities, their associations, their companionships, all tend in that direction. But in London Dr. Barnardo has been led to interpose so far as his strength and means would allow. As the result of his efforts many a young man is now earning a livelihood by his honest labor, who a few years ago was just commencing in sheer desperation a life of crime. The methods Dr. Barnardo employs, and the origin and progress of the work form a very interesting and suggestive narrative.

Dr. Barnardo is an Irishman. He was born in Dublin in 1845, and is now in the thirty-eighth year of his age. When he was about nineteen years old, he was brought to a knowledge of Christ as his Saviour, and after prayerful deliberation he resolved to devote himself to the Lord's service as a medical missionary in China, and removed to London for the purpose of preparing himself for the self-sacrificing vocation he had chosen.

AT LONDON HOSPITAL.

Accordingly, in 1866, he entered the London Hospital as a student of medicine. It was at this time that he became acquainted with the necessitous condition of the children of the London streets, and utterly oblivious of all apprehension that the work of helping and rescuing these unfortunate ones would prove an obstacle in the way of realizing his early hopes, he magnanimously devoted the whole of his leisure to an attempt to effect their reclamation.

INDICATIONS OF DIVINE LEADING.

The finger of God soon indicated with unmistakable clearness that his life and energies were to be occupied and expended in the interests of the hapless youth, whose destitute and perilous condition he so deeply commiserated, and, as time wore on, the conviction that this was the pathway of duty and service which his Heavenly Father would have him adopt, at length led him to unreservedly give himself to the colossal task before him, and in which he has been blessed in a remarkable manner.

In 1876 he obtained the diploma of the Royal College of Surgeons, Edinboro', and subsequently proceeded to the fellowship. But although a properly-qualified medical man, and always taking a keen interest in professional matters, he has for more than sixteen years been almost wholly absorbed in his present large and growing work

GRATUITOUS SERVICE.

It is a noteworthy fact that Dr. Barnardo has given his life to the work without any hope of worldly remuneration. He commenced it in faith, and though large sums of money have been given him to enable him to carry it on, he has not used any of it for his own support, but has given it all to the work. It has now grown to vast proportions, but still he has accepted neither fee nor reward for all he has done (Heb. 11 : 26).

Referring to this fact, not generally known,

LORD CAIRNS, THE PRESIDENT of the institution, at the annual meeting in Exeter Hall, in June, 1878, when calling upon Dr. Barnardo to address the meeting, made the following statement:

"I will ask Dr. Barnardo—Dr. Barnardo who has been the origin, the framer, and the worker of this great organization—Dr. Barnardo who has brought to it an energy and ability, and constant care which no money could have purchased, and no money could pay for—who has done all this without money and without price—I will call upon him to read the statement of the work of the past year."

A MEMORABLE VISIT.

Seventeen and a half years ago, while Dr. Barnardo was preparing to qualify himself for the honorable profession to which he belongs, he happened to visit a miserable lodging-house of the lowest type, in one of the densely crowded thoroughfares of the East End of London. The apartment was a horrible den, and it was filled with men and women whom in many instances destitution had made criminals, and who now seemed to be beyond the possibility of amelioration, and to whom the approach of death and the sheltering darkness of the grave might prove the greatest of blessings.

In this lodging-house, Dr. Bardnardo found a boy in the very extremity of sickness, and whose only hope of recovery lay in immediate removal to a neighboring hospital. The owner, or lessee of the lodging-house, a very virago of a woman, in the most peremptory manner intimated her determination to prohibit the departure of the lad until he had paid his arrears of rent, and at once seized upon his tattered clothing as a security for the liquidation of the debt. The young medical student, however, was quite equal to the emergency, and taking off his great-coat, snatched up the lad from the filthy pallet on which he was helplessly lying, and wrapping him in it, speedily carried him in his arms to the nearest hospital, and had the satisfaction there of seeing him gradually gather strength and finally recover.

NIGHTLY EXPLORATIONS.

Having thus commenced the Christlike work of "rescuing the perishing," he continued his labor of love, and every night after his hours of study were over, instead of visiting the theatres or spending the evening in dissipation, Dr. Barnardo started off on a tour of exploration in the abodes of the poor, looking for sick people to whom his skill might be of service.

Once, on a moonless night, in the very depth of midwinter, he saw no fewer than seventy-three children lying one upon another, packed like sardines, the small fellows above, and the bigger below, under a tarpaulin by a wharf, on the north bank of the river Thames. He heard of thousands of whose hand even in youth was against every man and every man's hand against them, and with the determination of his naturally resolute character, made more intense by his prayerful waiting upon God, he resolved that whatever of ease, strength, or money it might cost, a home should be found for these destitute ones, for whom no man seemed to have the least solicitude.

Notorious lodging-houses and haunts of vice were visited with nightly regularity. Sometimes the genial visitor was made the target of scorn, and at other times he might be seen confronting peril from those who had every reason to fear the invasion of their immoral lairs. But, at last, having secured a dilapidated house in Stepney Causeway, which has since developed, under his administrative ability and persistent purpose, into the present he deliberately, and with true nobility of character, resolved that henceforth it should be the work of his life to save, both temporally and spiritually, the crowds of half-famished, half-naked children who were to be found prowling about the narrow alleys, and railway arches, fruit-markets, and the river foreshore, graduating in vice, becoming adepts in criminality, and constituting an increasing danger in the midst of a somnolent and apathetic community.

THE INSTITUTIONS.

The work of Dr. Barnardo's entire mission, as originally designed, and as it has grown until today, is threefold, the leading departments of which may be thus described:

The first, or Preventive Department, for the rescue and reclamation of orphan, destitute, or neglected children, includes the Boys' Home, which was founded in 1870; the Girls' Village Home (a picture of which appears on the front page), which was opened in 1873; the Little Boys' Home; the Infirmary for Sick Children of the destitute class, founded in 1876; the Labor House for Destitute Youths, opened in 1882 (as shown on page 108), and Leopold House Orphan Home for Little Boys, about to be occupied.

The second, or Industrial and Educational Section, for the instruction and employment of boys and girls not absolutely helpless, comprises the various brigades of boys who are employed out of doors, Shoeblack Brigade, City Messengers, etc.; the Ragged and Day School work; Factory Girls' Mission; the Free Dinner Table to Children; and the Young Workmen's Hotel, which is one of the latest and likely to prove not the least valuable additions.

The third, or the Adult Mission Section, embraces the Mission Halls and Coffee Palaces, like the "Edinburgh Castle," "Dublin Castle," Burdett Hall, etc., Deaconess House, Medical Mission, and all the network of beneficent agencies—Evangelistic, Temperance, and Medical—at work among the laboring poor.

The oldest and most important of all is the Boys' Home, at Stepney Causeway, now occupying the site where six old houses once stood. It is the chief centre of the mission, and has at present about three hundred and eighty inmates. The following illustration, taken from the Annual Report for 1880–81, will show with sufficient distinctness the kind of boys received, and

THE WORK DONE BY THE HOME.

J. L. (12) is the son of criminals, his mother having undergone several terms of imprisonment, varying from six months to seven years. She is now on ticket-of-leave. His father is dead. The person with whom his mother has since cohabited has also been convicted of felony. The boy J. L. is thin, and small for his age, and bears the appearance of great neglect. Careful investigation proved that the boy had not a relative in the world except his mother, and that he was on the way to become a thief.

X., Y., Z., three boys (11, 9, and 7 years), were discovered at night on the racecourse at Epsom, huddled together for shelter underneath a barrel, fast asleep. When roused, it was found that they had tramped down from London the previous day, and had not since had a morsel of bread to eat. They shivered with cold, and looked indescribably wretched. They had never known a father; their mother, a woman of evil fame, had driven them out daily to beg and steal, beating them cruelly if unsuccessful. When found, they were clad in rags, covered with vermin and filth, and apparently existing upon garbage. After close inquiry, which confirmed the statement of the children, they were admitted.

THE HOME FOR LITTLE BOYS, at Gorey, in the Island of Jersey was opened in July, 1879. It had long been felt that, however desirable public school life was for big boys, and however suitable large institutions were for their training, girls and younger boys ought always to be reared in a more homely fashion and in smaller numbers. Moreover, it had long been Dr. Barnardo's desire to obtain a distinct institution where little boys, not far removed from infancy, might be reared under climacteric and other conditions more favorable than a London Home presents. With very great pleasure, therefore, an offer from a gentleman (since deceased) was received and accepted, by which a house and land, favorably situated at Gorey, were transferred to trustees under Dr. Barnardo's superintendence on terms which form a lasting memorial of the giver's liber-

William, to see you read your Bible; will you let me join you?' Then we two anxious souls read together day after day, but we were not cured till nearly at the West Indies. One Sunday, Bill was cured, and the shot extracted between 8 and 12 o'clock, and the same day during the dog watch between 6 and 8 o'clock at night the captain knelt and prayed wth me, and I also was cured. Now for thirty-eight years I have been speaking and witnessing for Jesus the Physician who cured me."

A Good Chance Thrown Away.—"In a little village near Berwick a man was suddenly seized with a severe illness. The doctors gave him up, but he said 'I am determined not to die just now.' His friends prayed for him, and he vowed for himself that if God gave him another chance he would pray, read the Bible, and go to church and prayer-meetings. Well, God heard his vow, and his friends' prayers, and raised him up. For a little time he fulfilled his vow; by-and-by he dropped reading the Bible, then prayer, then the weekly meeting, then the church, and soon he was deeper in evil than before. One night, three months after he was raised from his sick bed, as he was crossing the threshold of his house, half drunk, he fell down dead without a minute to gasp out 'God be merciful to me a sinner!' He, like thousands of others, got his chance and threw it away."

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

SPINAL DISEASE.

In a letter to Miss C. F. Judd, Ella Cleveland, of Pawlet, Vt., writes: "How can I better tell what the Lord has done for me than by quoting Psa. 30: 2, 3. For fourteen years I have not known a day that I was free from pain, and for four years I have been confined to my bed. Two years ago last winter, my friends thought I might get help at the Woman's Hospital in New York City. So I was conveyed to the depot on my bed, and thence to New York by rail. After remaining in the institution three and one half months, and receiving the best medical treatment, I returned home weaker than when I went. Human help was of no avail. I had yet to learn that our blessed Saviour was just as ready to heal the body as the soul.

"From that time, up to the 22d of June, my bodily sufferings were terrible. Kind friends with loving hands ministered to me, but they could not ease the pain. My spine became badly diseased, and my nerves were in a terrible condition.

"In March I received a letter from my aunt, Mrs. Hattie Buswell, of Glen's Falls, N. Y., saying that she believed it was my privilege to be healed by the Divine Healer, and soon after, I received a letter from Miss Alice Churchill of the same place, giving an account of her wonderful healing in answer to prayer. About the 18th of June, my mother presented my case to you by letter, and you replied that you would pray for my recovery, in your faith meeting.

"The battle raged in my soul until I was enable to consecrate myself fully and to believe, and I was healed. I felt the warm, healing, thrilling influence of the touch of the Great Physician. I arose from my bed, and walked across the room to a chair; sat up a few moments, then went to bed and rested well till morning; what I had not done before in years. I had been utterly unable to rise from my bed, or stand on my feet. I have been gaining ever since, and am now able to do a great deal."

A CHRONIC DISEASE.

A believer, writing from Indianapolis, Ind., says: "Several years ago my vital energies were so impaired by suffering, that my work was often performed with great weariness and pain. There still lingered in my system a tendency to disease of the mucous membrane, which settled into a chronic disease of the bowels. This I was able, by certain remedies, to keep in check.

"Last fall I took a heavy cold which settled on my lungs. As I was teaching little children, I could not save my voice much, and I coughed all winter. I was very miserable when school dismissed, and would have been prostrated if I had not gone to the country. I grew stronger, but my lungs and throat no better. My sister had gone in this manner, and it looked as if there were no hope of recovery for me.

"But I went to the Lord and He healed me. I took off my lung plaster and put away my medicines. That was Friday. On Saturday morning I went to Matoon, Ill. Was not one bit sick on the cars (I always was before). I spoke in a Gospel meeting that night, and four times the next day, and talked much of the time out of meeting, and my throat was not even tired at night. Now, mind you, I could hardly talk in ordinary conversation the day before I was healed.

"And thus it has been ever since, victory after victory. Sometimes Satan brings up dreadful symptoms. Then I start on my work as though nothing had happened, and the pain leaves immediately. If I do not act faith, it does not leave so quickly. I am pale no longer, and have gained about nine pounds in three weeks, while I gained nothing in the country.

"But best of all, the greatest spiritual blessing of my life came with the healing. I thought I was near God when I first tasted the bliss of the life of faith, but this is being held on the very bosom of our Lord, and feeling the warm beats of His great loving heart."

THE NAPOLEONIC MANIFESTO AND ITS AUTHOR.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

THAT the quiet elderly gentleman, sixty years of age, who has been living in comparative retirement in Paris for the last ten years, should suddenly proceed to run an extraordinary political and military career during the next ten years, eclipsing even the career of the First Napoleon, may seem more like a fable of the Arabian Nights' Entertainment than a reasonable probability. Yet there are very strong reasons for believing, from Daniel and Revelation, that some Napoleon will achieve such a career during the next few years, as being the closing years of this dispensation, and we do not see any Napoleon more likely to fulfil this destiny than Prince Jerome Napoleon.

In the pamphlet called "The Coming Napoleon," which we published ten years ago (in 1873), we stated that the Rev. R. A. Purdon and others had predicted in 1854 that one of the two cousins, Louis Napoleon and Jerome Napoleon, would become eventually the Antichrist, and we see no reason, even now, to deviate from that belief.

The Antichrist is to become King of Syria; then in two or three years' time afterward to be raised to be Emperor of the ten kings of the ten kingdoms, and then to be the Great Antichrist for three and a half years. Time will soon show whether Prince Jerome Napoleon is to fulfil this rôle.

The fact that the Antichrist is to be a vile person or reviled and ridiculed (Dan. 11: 21), so far agrees with Prince Jerome Napoleon's ridiculousness in the eyes of France, although he is confessedly a clever man.

Commenting upon Prince Napoleon's arrest, because of the issue of his manifesto in Paris, which has made him the hero of the hour, the Daily News of January 18th, says:

"Prince Napoleon's manifesto has excited

MORE HILARITY THAN ANGER

in Paris. The newspaper squibs which it has suggested are endless. The Evenement has a column filled with facetious Bonapartist advertisements, each of which begin with the words 'Plon-Plon.' M. Camille Pelletan, applying humorously to the event of yesterday a maxim of M. Thiers, says that it would be ridiculous to take this Pretender 'au tragique,' and that do what he can, he is unable to take him 'au serieux.' M. de Cassagnac's opinion is that the manifesto is beneath contempt, and he descrbes it as 'incolore et inodore.' The peculiar force of the latter epithet only Parisians can understand. Though a Bonapartist, M. Janvier de la Motte spoke yesterday of Prince Napoleon's act of treason as a coup d'état à la colle. There was more paste, he said, in it than powder.

"The République Française attributes Prince Napoleon's silly manifesto to the blindness and emasculation caused by hope deferred. It notices the particular impudence of his signing in large capitals 'Napoleon' without the prefix Jerome, which hitherto distinguished him. There would have been no great harm if had been left to the vengeance of ridicule.

"The Voltaire says: 'Plon-Plon is not dangerous—only profoundly ridiculous.' The Evenement says: 'Never did a vulgar ambition fail amid more universal laughter than Plon-Plon.' The Pays strongly condemns the manifesto of Prince Napoleon, as an act of stupidity, and burlesque incident."

The London Daily Telegraph says: "The New Year promised to open with a few months of political quiet. Lovers of peace predicted a long lease of life to the Cabinet which came into power last August. But a few yellow bills posted on the walls of Paris, and the arrest of Prince Jerome Napoleon, at whom only a week ago all good Republicans affected to sneer as incapable of drawing a single policeman from his beat, have all altered this. The Chamber of Deputies has so far lost its equanimity as to give a semi-sanction to one of the most arbitrary measures ever placed before it. The Cabinet is divided against itself. The organization of was fast approaching completion when the timely Bonapartist manœuvre unexpectedly caused delay.

"The ex-Pontificial Zouaves, Royalists to a man, had received confidential instructions to congregate in uniform at a given spot on a preconcerted signal and were only awaiting the 'mot d'ordre' to take to arms 'for God and the King.' Thirty-three thousand men are said to be already brigaded in legions of 1000 each in the Western, Central, and Eastern provinces, and their organization is due to the 'Catholic Alliance,' the badge of which is a small cross attached to the button-hole. Funds are not wanting, for the association possesses a well-stocked treasury, safely deposited abroad. Nor is there any scarcity of arms, which are freely purchased through third parties at the Government sales of chassepots and other disused weapons. Infantry would be provided by simply arming and secretly drilling the peasants. Cavalry the Alliance hopes to acquire in two ways. Firstly, by providing horses for the men who know how to ride, and, secondly, by endeavoring to gain over to the Legitimist cause certain cavalry regiments of the regular army.

"This latter manœuvre is reckoned upon with some degree of confidence, owing to the number of young noblemen and members of Royalist families serving in the mounted forces. Dinners, banquets, and shooting parties given by the local 'squires' are not wanting in the neighborhood of cavalry stations. To these festivities young officers of the bourgeois class are freely invited by their aristocratic comrades. As to the command of this irregular force little is known, but it is affirmed that the coming leader of the Royalist troops is not the voluble old general whose name appears so prominently at all the Legitimist banquets in town and country. Still less is known about the proposed plans for utilizing the 33,000 men said to be ready to assemble under the White Flag with the golden lilies. That things were fast approaching a head when the manifesto of Prince Napoleon fell like a bombshell on Royalists and Republicans alike is beyond a doubt. The authorities are fully alive to the movements of the Royalist plotters, and any insurrectionary attempt will be promptly suppressed."

Temperance Progress in the South Moves by the route of local option. Three States have adopted it—Kentucky, Mississippi, and South Carolina. In the former State a number of counties have passed prohibitory acts. The right to sell liquor has also been refused in the neighborhood of some colleges and churches. In Mississippi, about fifty different localities have forbidden the sale of intoxicants, while a less number have taken the same course in South Carolina. There has been less agitation of prohibition in the Southern than in the Northern States, but the former appear, to be making progress in dealing with the subject.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Rival Tariff Bills Occupied the Attention of both Senate and the House last week without making such progress as justifies the hope that this Congress will succeed in settling the question. The most remarkable feature of the proceedings was a speech by Senator Lamar, of Mississippi, which attracted a full attendance of the Senate and to which many members of the House listened attentively. The Senator dealt with the subject in its broader features rather than with details. He argued the discussion of the Senate bill had shown plainly that it is impossible to effect a very considerable reduction of taxation, and at the same time maintain the system of protection. The public demand for reduction of taxation had put a delicate task on the party in power. If the only question had been the relation of taxation to revenue, its problem would have been easily solved, but they chose to consider with that the other question of a bounty to certain industries, and here began their troubles. This, he said, was probably the only country in the world whose people were severely and superfluously taxed for a series of years only because their rulers were unable to devise a mode of reduction.

Some Surprise has been Caused by the Publication of the statistics of insanity, idiocy, blindness, pauperism and crime by the census bureau. Mr. Frederick H. Wines, who has charge of that department, says: "It is startling to know that of 50,000,000 of inhabitants over 400,000 are either insane, idiots, deaf-mutes, or blind, or are inmates of prisons, reformatories, or poor-houses. If to these we add the outdoor poor and the inmates of private charitable institutions, the number will swell to nearly or quite 500,000, or 1 per cent of the total population. We cannot begin too soon or prosecute too vigorously the inquiry into the causes of the prevalence of these evils, which are like a canker at the heart of all our prosperity." The facts published are rendered still more remarkable when the figures are compared with those of previous censuses. The number of insane persons, idiots, blind persons, and deaf-mutes, was 50,994 in 1850; 68,451 in 1860; 98,484 in 1870; and 251,698 in 1880. In other words, although the population has a little more than doubled in 30 years, the number of defective persons returned is apparently nearly five times as great as it was 30 years ago. The increase of population between 1870 and 1880 was only 30 per cent, while the apparent increase of these defective classes was 155 per cent. While there were only 2554 defective persons in each million in 1870, there were 5018 in each million in 1880. Mr. Wines is perfectly right in advocating an inquiry into the cause of the increase, but that is not sufficient. An inquiry should be followed by practical results. It is well known that one of the principal causes is the use of intoxicants, but the knowledge of that fact does not insure the triumph of prohibition.

The Action of the Secretary of the Treasury on the coinage of the silver dollars has failed to elicit from Congress the response expected. The House Committee on Coinage, Weights and Measures has adopted resolutions to the effect that it is inexpedient to discontinue the coinage of silver under existing laws; that all coin now in the Treasury, excepting an amount exceeding 25 per cent of the outstanding greenback circulation as a redemption fund, and also excepting all sums held for the redemption of outstanding gold and silver certificates, should be at once used in payment of outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the Government which are subject to call and payment. It also recommended an appropriation for providing the additional vaults for storing the coins as the public do not want them, and foreign nations will not take them. It also suggested that the new vaults should be located in the Mississippi Valley.

A Plan for Reorganizing the Customs Service was sent to the House last week by Secretary Folger. It is in brief a system of consolidating districts, so that where there are now several small or comparatively unimportant districts having each a custom house organization, there will be one large district, with only one set of custom house officers, each subordinate office being in charge of a deputy, instead of a collector or surveyor as now. The scheme appears to have grown out of an examination by the Secretary of the Customs Districts which was rendered necessary by the form in which last year's appropriations were passed. The examination showed in the 140 customs districts 4255 employes with salaries amounting to $5,404,000, and the miscellaneous expenses $1,144,000—a total of $6,548,000. The estimates of the commissions, instead of showing a reduction, called for 4262 employes, with $5,419,000 for salaries and $1,160,000 for miscellaneous expenses—making an appreciable increase on the present cost of collecting the revenue. As Mr. Folger's plan involves a curtailment of patronage its chances of adoption are but slight.

Petitions in Favor of a Prohibitory Amendment in Ohio have been put in circulation by the Women's Christian Temperance Union. The petitions, though issued only a few weeks, received the names of 70,000 voters and 90,000 women. With this long list of petitioners the officers of the association and many prominent ladies intend holding meetings in Columbus and other cities, with a view of impressing upon the Legislature the importance of submitting to the people such an amendment. The interest taken by the ladies of the State in the question, and their zeal in circulating the petition are hopeful signs for the success of the movement.

The Death of the Hon. William E. Dodge at his home in New York on Friday, February 9th, removes from the world one of the most active, earnest, and benevolent workers in the cause of Christian philanthropy. Mr. Dodge was in his seventy-eighth year, but he was distinguished to the last by his efforts to advance the interests of religion and temperance. On February 1st, Mr. Dodge presided with his friend, Peter Cooper, at the Tariff meeting at Cooper Union, and it was remarked that his voice had lost none of its power nor his step any of its elasticity. Beside Peter Cooper he seemed, comparatively, a young man. On Saturday, February 3d, he went with Mrs. Dodge to inspect the New Home for Intemperate Women in Fifty-seventh Street, an institution inaugurated mainly through his efforts and those of Mrs. Dodge. While there he was seized with severe pain, and on returning home his physician was summoned. Mr. Dodge experienced relief from the remedies prescribed, and though unable to go out he received numerous callers. On the morning of Friday, February 9th, he was dressing when Mrs. Dodge, hearing a noise in his room entered, and saw him lie gasping on the floor. She raised his head, but he almost instantly expired. Mr. Dodge was President of the National Temperance Society from its inauguration to the time of his death. He gave $20,000 toward its capital, and his contributions to other institutions were exceedingly liberal.

The Newhall House Disaster at Milwaukee, Wis., has been under the consideration of a coroner's jury which has now delivered its verdict. It declares the proprietor of the house guilty of culpable negligence in not employing a sufficient number of watchmen to guard the house against fire and to awaken the inmates in time to save all the lives possible. They found the Newhall House easy of egress and devoid of intricate passages, with two outside escapes, ladders, etc. Nevertheless, they found the owner of the house guilty of negligence in not having provided more escapes in case of fire, and also found fault with the network of telegraph wires surrounding the hotel. The last clause of the verdict refers to a matter demanding legislative interference. In all the recent serious fires the telegraph wires have seriously impeded the work of the firemen. At the fire at the Moffat Building in New York on January 31st, they prevented the water tower being raised. Until the wealthy corporations are forced by the Legislature to put their wires in an underground tube, this serious evil will not be abated.

Ex-Governor Marshall Jewell is Dead. A telegram from his home at Hartford, Conn., announces that he died of pneumonia on Saturday night, after only a few days' suffering. He was fifty-eight years of age, and since 1869, when he was elected Governor of Connecticut, he has been one of the most prominent members of the Republican party. He was re-elected in 1871 and in 1872. In 1873 he was appointed Minister to Russia, but in 1874 he returned to become Postmaster-General in President Grant's administration. He was chairman of the National Republican Committee in the last presidential election, and his exertions contributed in no small degree to the success of the candidate of his party. It is stated that he was a member of the Congregational Church at Hartford, and during his residence in St. Petersburg surprised the leaders of Russian society by his regular attendance at the little Protestant Church in that city, when the custom was to spend the Sabbath in gaming, the theatre or amusements. He found, too, that Americans visiting St. Petersburg had no place where they would be likely to meet each other, and access to the American Minister was not so easy as desirable. So he established a free reading room at the legation, supplied with American and other newspapers, where American visitors could freely meet each other, and had his own office there, where he could readily be found by his countrymen.

Disastrous Floods in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana during the past two weeks have caused much loss of property. Fremont and Defiance in Ohio, Allegheny City and Pittsburg in Pennsylvania, and several cities in Indiana along the line of the White and Wabash Rivers have been flooded. It is feared that many lives have been lost, and in the Scioto Valley alone the damage is estimated at over a million dollars. A telegram from Parkersburg, W. Va., says there has been immense destruction of manufacturing, milling and lumber properties. Fully three hundred families are homeless. The water was the highest since 1860. The news from adjoining towns is very distressing, but the river must fall before one half the misery occasioned will be known. It is believed that the inhabitants of many of the towns will be in need of relief.

A Fortune was Found in a Grave near New York last week. A stranger in the city stayed here a few days on his way to California, there to join his brother. But he was taken ill soon after his arrival and died. Having no friends in New York, and no money being found among his effects, his body was interred in the pauper's burying-ground at Weehawken. When the dead man's brother was informed of his death he sent back word that his brother had a considerable amount of money in his possession. Search was made for it a second time, but it could not be found in either of his three trunks. It was then decided to exhume the body, which was done. Three undershirts were upon the body, and at the back of the inner one was found a pocket containing $2091 in greenbacks. The money was taken possession of by the authorities, and will be held to await the order of the deceased's brother. It is probable that in his sudden sickness the approach of death drove out of the man's mind all thought of the money on his person, or he would have had it put in some safe place. He doubtless never intended that it should be taken to the grave with him. No one in these days is foolish enough to suppose that money is of any use there; though the avarice of men on the verge of the grave is often so strong as to suggest that as the only consistent explanation of their conduct (Psa. 49 : 17–19).

Steering by Guess Work is not an Arrange-men tending to insure the safety of steamboat passengers, but the pilot of a river boat recently informed a reporter that it was often done. During the prevalence of a dense fog, the reporter of The Register of Mobile, Ala., asked the pilot how he could steer when it was not possible to see the boat's length ahead. He replied, "We go by guess—plain guess. We move slow and have one hand on the engineer's bell all the time. We nose up into the bushes once in a while, and back out and turn around. Why, I recall once I was on the Alice Vivian going up at the foot of the island, following Captain Peoples, of the Johnson, in a fog, listening to her escape-pipes and steering well in to the point. I thought everything was going all right, when the Johnson came steaming back, and I learned that Captain Peoples had been up the Tensas River and was going right through to the Atlantic Ocean when he heard a dog bark. Knowing there was no dog put down on his chart, he turned back, and came down where I was. Well, we run by any indication we can get, but for the most part piloting in a fog is pure guess work." Some recent pulpit utterances, much commented upon in the press, lead us to think that some ministers, who occupy a position metaphorically analogous to the pilot, are also steering by guess. But in their case there is no excuse. The fog is their own production, they are criticising their chart instead of running by it, and they do not seem clear as to their destination (1 Tim. 5 : 5–7).

A Petition for a Beacon has been Sent to Con-gress by the representatives of the steamship firms and companies whose vessels ply between New York and domestic and foreign ports. Soon after the wrecking of the steamer Nankin on the Romer shoals at the entrance to the lower Bay of New York, the representatives of these same companies united in a petition to the Lighthouse Board for some sort of protective light at this point. The request was granted, and a gas-lighted buoy was placed near the wreck of the Nankin. This proved of the greatest assistance, especially during thick and foggy weather, and furnished the temporary relief required. As is the case with all can buoys, this was removed when the approach of winter set the ice to running in this harbor, and now when such a light would be especially serviceable the ship-master meets with no such assistance. An incoming vessel sights the Sandy Hook lights and in thick weather has no chance to proceed further toward the city without great risk. If there were a light at Romer Shoals this might be easily made, and then the range lights, as they are called, could be sighted, and an entrance into the Upper Bay, and thence to the docks, be easily effected. It may be hoped that Congress will grant the request. The records of social wrecks which may be read every day in the newspapers, show that there are shoals in the city on which, for the sake of young people, it would also be good to place a beacon. Many souls have been wrecked in places the dangerous character of which is not outwardly visible (Prov. 7 : 24–27).

The Prompt Decision of the Judge of an In-diana court, caused surprise to the parties and lawyers in the case. It was a suit for divorce brought by the wife of a man of intemperate habits. When the case came on a witness was called to testify to the habits of the respondent, but before he had given his testimony the judge asked him if the respondent was the same man as one of that name who was in Company K of a certain Indiana regiment during the war? "The same man, Judge," was the answer. "You need go no further," said the Judge to the plaintiff's lawyer, "the divorce is granted," and judgment was entered accordingly for the plaintiff. After court adjourned the Judge was joked about the hasty entry of the judgment, referring to the fact that no evidence had been introduced into the case. "Why, gentlemen," said his Honor, "I know that fellow. He was in my company during the war, and I never will let a woman live with him if she asks me for a divorce. I know him better than any witness who can be brought here." What defence the man intended making was not disclosed, but whatever it might have been, it must have broken down before the personal knowledge of the judge. In the last judgment there will be no possibility of mistake for the judge is omniscient (Psa. 96 : 13).

A Disastrous Snow Slide Occurred in the Rocky Mountain region on January 31st. Thirty men employed near Crested Butte, Col., at an anthracite coal mine were startled from their sleep by an ominous rumbling noise, and almost instantly the avalanche was upon them. The building in which they were sleeping was crushed to atoms and its occupants were hurled down the mountain side. A rescuing party started out from Crested Butte as soon as the news was received there, and after several hours of indefatigable labor the men were all uncovered. Seven of the men were dead and eighteen others were injured, several fatally. All of the company's expensive machinery was destroyed. On the same day a passenger train, when within six miles of Crested Butte, was divided, the engine going ahead to clear the track. When about four miles from where it had left the coaches the engine was struck by a snow-slide and ditched, and lay under about twenty feet of snow. A wrecking engine, sent to their relief, could not get nearer than within two miles of the cars, and returned for provisions for the starving passengers. It is terrible to think of the fate of those upon whom those enormous masses fell, yet we are assured that even such an end would be welcomed by the impenitent in the day of the wrath of the Lamb (Rev. 6 : 16).

A Valid Defence to a Suit was Made in the New York Marine Court recently. A young man was sued by the proprietor of a flat house in the city for the rent of a flat for one month. He leased the apartments for a year agreeing to pay $135 a month. Soon after taking possession he and his wife became sick and had a severe illness. The doctors pronounced the disease one that is produced by sewer gas, and said the apartments were filled with it, arising from bad plumbing, and that the sick persons were suffering from malaria produced by breathing impure air. The Board of Health inquired into the condition of the premises, and ordered the owner to repair the plumbing within five days. The necessary repairs not having been made within the five days, the sick man and his wife moved from the apartments, taking their furniture with them. He refused to pay rent for them after his removal, and the suit was begun against him. The fact of the defective plumbing was fully proved, and a verdict was given against the proprietor of the house. It was considered very natural and proper that the young man and his wife should remove out of the foul air. It would be a good thing if Christians displayed the same promptitude in quitting a poiluted moral atmosphere in which they often remain for the sake of gain, until their own souls are tainted by their surroundings (Psa. 106 : 35, 36).

ON LAYING FOUNDATIONS.

A New Sermon, by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And why call ye me, Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say? Whosoever cometh to me, and heareth my sayings, and doeth them, I will shew you to whom he is like," &c.—Luke 6 : 46–49.

THESE parables describe two classes of hearers; but they say nothing of those who are not hearers. Their position and prospects we must infer from what is said of hearers. Our Lord Jesus Christ has come into the world to tell us of the Father's love, and never man spake as He spake, and yet there are many who refuse to hear Him. I do not mean those who are far away, to whom the name of Jesus is well-nigh unknown, but I mean persons in this land, and especially in this great and highly favored city, who wilfully refuse to hear Him whom God has anointed to bring tidings of salvation. Our Lord Jesus is proclaimed, I was about to say, upon the house-tops in this city; for even in their music-halls and theatres Christ is preached to the multitude, and at the corners of our streets His banner is lifted up; and yet there are tens of thousands to whom the preaching of the Gospel is as music in the ears of a corpse. They shut their ears and will not hear, though the testimony be concerning God's own Son, and life eternal, and the way to escape from everlasting wrath.

To their own best interests, to their eternal benefit, men are dead; nothing will secure their attention to their God. To what, then, are these men like? They may fitly be compared to the man who built and remained homeless by day and shelterless by night. When worldly trouble comes like a storm those persons who will not hear the words of Jesus have no consolation to cheer them; when sickness comes they have no joy of heart to sustain them under its pains; and when death, that most terrible of storms, beats upon them they feel its full fury, but they cannot find a hiding place. They neglect the housing of their souls, and when the hurricane of almighty wrath shall break forth in the world to come they will have no place of refuge. In vain will they call upon the rocks to fall upon them, and the mountains to cover them. They shall be in that day without a shelter from the righteous wrath of the Most High. Alas, that any being who wears the image of man should be found in such a plight!

Our earnest attention will now be given to those who are hearers of the Word, and are somewhat affected by it.

ALL HEARERS ARE BUILDERS

of houses for their souls; they are each one doing something to set up a spiritual habitation. Some of these go a considerable distance in this house-building, and even crown the structure by publicly confessing Christ. They say unto Him, "Lord, Lord": they meet with His followers, and join with them in reverence to the Master's name; but they do not obey the Lord; they hear Him, but they fail to do the things which He says. Hence they are mistaken builders, who fail in the foundation, and make nothing sure except that their house will come down about their ears. Others there are, and we trust they will be found to be many among us, who are building rightly, building for eternity; constructing a dwelling-place with basis of rock, and walls of well-built stone, of which the Lord Christ is both foundation and corner-stone.

I am anxious to speak at this time to those who are just beginning to build for eternity. I am indeed happy to know that there are many such among us. May the Holy Spirit bless this sermon to them.

I. Our first subject will be

A COMMON TEMPTATION

with spiritual builders. A common temptation with hearers of the Word, according to the two parables before us, is to neglect foundation work, to get hurriedly over the first part of the business, and run up the building quickly. They are tempted to assume that all is done which is said to be done; to take it for granted that all is right which is hoped to be right; and then to go on piling up the walls as rapidly as possible. The great temptation, I say, with young beginners in religious life, is and treat those things lightly which are of the first importance. The same temptation comes to us throughout the whole of life, but to young beginners it is especially perilous; Satan would have them neglect the fundamental principles upon which their future hope and character are to rest, so that in a future trying hour, from want of a solid foundation, they may yield to evil, and lose the whole of their life-building.

This temptation is all the more dangerous, first, because these young beginners have no experience. Even the most experienced child of God is often deceived; how much more the pilgrim who has but just entered the wicket-gate! Like children at play upon the beach, the anxious heap up their sand-castles, and please themselves therewith, for they are ignorant of Satan's devices. I am for this cause doubly anxious to save my beloved young friends from the deceiver. The common temptation is, instead of really repenting, to talk about repentance; instead of heartily believing, to say, "I believe," without believing; instead of truly loving, to talk of love, without loving; instead of coming to Christ, to speak about coming to Christ, and profess to come to Christ, and yet not to come at all.

The character of Talkative in Pilgrim's Progress is ably drawn. I have met the gentleman many times, and can bear witness that John Bunyan was a photographer before photography was invented. Christian said of him "He talketh of prayer, of repentance, of faith, and of the new birth; but he knows but only to talk of them. I have been in his family, and his house is as empty of religion as the white of an egg is of savor." We have too many such persons around us who are, as to what they say, everything that is to be desired, and yet, by what they are proven to be, mere shams. As tradesmen place dummies in their shops, papered and labelled to look like goods, while yet they are nothing of the sort, so are these men marked and labelled as Christians, but the grace of God is not in them. Oh, that you young beginners may be on the alert, that you be not content with the form of godliness, but are made to feel the power of it.

TO SAVE TROUBLE.

There is this to help the temptation too, that this plan for the present saves a great deal of trouble. Your mind is distressed, and you want comfort; well, it will comfort you to say, "Lord, Lord," though you do not the things that Christ says. If you admit the claims of Jesus to be Lord, even though you do not believe on Him for salvation, and so neglect the main thing which He commands, yet you will find some ease in the admission. The crown of eternal glory is not won without fighting, nor the prize of our high calling received without running; yet by just making a holy profession, and by practising an outward form, a man imagines that the same result is produced as by seeking the Lord with his whole heart, and believing in the Lord Jesus. If it were so, there would be a fine broad road to heaven, and Satan himself would turn pilgrim. Believe me, dear hearers, this saving of trouble will turn out to be a making of trouble, and, before matters end, the hardest way will turn out to be the easiest way.

This kind of building without foundation has this advantage to back up the temptation, it enables a man to run up a religion very quickly. He makes splendid progress. While the anxious heart is searching after truth in the inward parts, and begging to be renewed by grace, his exulting friend is as happy as he can be in a peace which he has suddenly obtained without question or examination. See how fast he goes! The fog is dense, but he steams through it, heedless of danger! He has joined the church; he has commenced work for God; he is boasting of his own attainments; he hints that he is perfect. But is this safe? Will it pass muster in the last great survey? Will it stand should a tempest happen? The chimney-shaft is tall, but is it safe? Ay, there's the rub. This is the question which makes anend of much of the boasting which is all around us.

How common, how deceptive is this temptation! For the young beginner, the man who is just aroused to seek the Lord, will find a great many to help him in his mistake, should he neglect the foundation. Kind, good, Christian friends often, without a thought of doing so, help to mislead seeking souls. "Yes," they say, "you are converted," and so perhaps the person would be if all he said was true; but then it is said without feeling; it comes from the lip only, and does not come from the heart; and therefore it is ruinous to encourage him. A kindly assurance from a Christian friend may breed false confidence, if that assurance was mistakenly given.

I have heard of one who had been into the inquiry room a dozen times, and when on another occasion she was invited to go there she said, "I really do not know why I should go, for I have been told that I was and I am not a bit better than before they told me so." It would be better to send some home weeping rather than rejoicing. Many a wound needs the lancet more than the plaster. You may be comforted by well-meant assurances of tender friends, and yet that comfort may be all a lie. I therefore warn you against any peace except that which comes from doing that which Jesus commands, or in other words, against any confidence except that which rests in Jesus only, and is attended with repentance, faith, and a life of obedience to your Lord.

No doubt many are encouraged in slight building by the fact that so many professors are making a fair show, and yet their building is without foundation. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that in all churches there are persons who have no depth of spiritual root, and we are afraid no real spiritual life. We cannot root them up, though we fear that they are tares, for we are assured that we should unavoidably root up the wheat with them, and this our Master forbids.

Young people are apt to think, "So-and-so is a member of the church, and he is never very precise. If a lukewarm profession satisfies him, why should it not satisfy me!" Ah, my dear friends, but you would not say so in business. If you knew a man was trading without capital and likely to come to bankruptcy, you would not say, "I may do the same." If you saw a man venturing into deep water who could not swim, and you felt sure that he would ultimately sink, you would not follow his example and be drowned too. No, no; let these frothy professors be beacons to you. Get away from Mr. Talkative, lest he make you as hollow a drum as himself. Beware of loose professors, who are as wreckers' lights that lure men upon the rocks. Make sure work for eternity, and bid triflers begone.

Again, there is always at the back of all this an inducement to build without a foundation because it will not be known, and possibly may not be found out for years. Foundation-work is quite out of sight, and the house can be got up and be very useful in a great many ways, and it may stand a good while without the underground work; for houses without foundations do not tumble down at once; they will stand for years; nobody knows how long they may keep up; perhaps they may even be inhabited with comfort till the last great flood. Death alone will discover some impostures. Hence, because the ill-founded house will do for the present, and can be used, and may bring immediate comfort, many people consider it economical to leave out the foundation as a needless superfluity. We would have you build that which will not need to be pulled down again, work that will stand when the waters are out and the stream beats vehemently upon it. I dread that any man should perish without religion, but I dread far more that any man should perish with it, finding his faith to have been false after all.

II. So I advance to the second step, and there we will consider which safe builders never forget. They dig deep, and never rest till they get a good substantial foundation; they are glad to get to the bottom of all the loose earth and to build on the rock. Let me commend this wise precaution to all of you.

Follow the text and learn to see to your sincerity. The Lord Jesus says "Why call ye me, Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" May the Holy Ghost make you true to the core. Be afraid to say a word more than you feel. Never permit yourself to speak as if you had an experience of which you have only read. Let not your outward worship go a step beyond the inward emotion of your soul. If Christ be truly your Lord you will obey Him; if He be not your Lord do not call Him so. It is an awful thing to make a high profession of sanctity, and yet live in the indulgence of secret vice. Be true! Be true! If truth will carry you no further than despair, better that you stop in despair than gain a hope by a lie. Do not live on fiction, profession, presumption.

The next thing is thoroughness. For observe, according to our Lord, the wise builder digged deep. You cannot do a right thing too well. Dig deep if you do dig a foundation. If it be repentance, let it be an intensely earnest repentance, including a vehement hatred of every form of sin. If you make confession before God, confess with your very soul, and not with your lips only; lay bare your spirit before the glance of Deity. If it be faith that you talk of, believe right up to the hilt. Do not go in for that kind of sceptical believing which is so common nowadays. If thou believest, believe; if thou repentest, repent. Sincerity and thoroughness are fine building-materials.

Next to that add self-renunciation; for that is in the parable. When a man digs a deep foundation he has much earth to throw out. So he that builds for eternity has a great deal to get rid of. Self-trust must go at the beginning; love of sin must follow; worldliness, pride, self-seeking, all sorts of iniquity—these must be cast aside. There is very much rubbish, and the rubbish must go. You cannot make sure work for eternity without clearing away much which flesh and blood would like to retain. See ye to this, and count the cost.

Then must come solid principle. The man who is determined that if he does build he will build securely, digs down to the rock. He says, "I believe in God, He is my helper. I believe in Christ Jesus, and on His atoning sacrifice and living intercession I build my eternal hopes. I also build on the doctrine of grace, for the Lord hath said it, By grace are ye saved, through faith. I build on Scripture; nothing but the warrant of the Word will do for me."

These truthful principles must be firmly adhered to. Bind your building to the rock. A house will not stand merely because it is on the rock; you must get its foundation into the rock. The house must take a grip of the rock, and the rock must grasp the house. The more you can get the house to be a bit of the rock, and the rock, as it were, to grow up into the house, the more secure you are. It is of no use saying, "Yes, I confide in Christ, in grace, in revelation," unless your very life enters into these things, and they enter into you.

The man in the second parable did not build as he should; what may I say of him? I will say three words. First, he was a man who had you could see all his house when you looked at it. If you can see all a man's religion at a glance he has no religion worth having. Godliness lies most in secret prayer, private devotion, and inward grace. The wise builder had the most costly part of his house buried in the ground; but the other man showed all that he had above ground. He is a poor tradesman who has no stock but that which he puts into the window. He will not last long who has no capital. He cannot long stand who has no backbone within. Beware of a religion of show.

Next, this man had nothing to hold to. He built a house, but it stood upon the loose soil; he easily dug into that, and stuck up his house; but his walls had no holdfast. Beware of a religion without holdfasts. But if I get a grip upon a doctrine they call me a bigot. Let them do so. Bigotry is a hateful thing, and yet that which is now abused as bigotry is a great virtue, and greatly needed in these frivolous times. I have been inclined lately to start a new denomination, and call it

"THE CHURCH OF THE BIGOTED."

Everybody is getting to be so oily, so plastic, so untrue, that we need a race of hard-shells to teach us how to believe. Those old-fashioned people who in former ages believed something, and thought the opposite of it to be false, were truer folk than the present time-servers.

I should like to ask the divines of the broad school whether any doctrine is worth a man's dying for it. They would have to reply, "Well, of course, if a man had to go to the stake, or change his opinions, the proper way would be to state them with much diffidence, and to be extremely respectful to the opposite school." But suppose he is required to deny the truth? "Well, there is much to be said on each side, and probably the negative may have a measure of truth in it as well as the positive. At any rate, it cannot be a prudent thing to incur the odium of being burned, and so it might be preferable to leave the matter an open question for the time being." Yes, and as these gentlemen always find it unpleasant to be unpopular, they soften down the hard threatenings of Scripture as to the world to come, and put a color upon every doctrine to which worldly-wise men object. The teachers of doubt are very doubtful teachers. You must have something to hold to; but the builder in the parable had not, and so he perished.

III. Thirdly, we will now gather from our text urging us to take care of the foundation. I will glance over these arguments, wishing much that I had time to enforce them. The first is this. We ought to build with a good foundation at the beginning, because otherwise we shall not build well in any other part of the house. Bad work in the foundation influences all the rest of the courses. In the Revised Version at the end of the forty-eighth verse instead of, "For it was founded upon a rock," we read, "Because it had been well builded." The house was built well at the bottom, and that led the workman to put in good work all the way up, so that all through "it had been well builded." The other man built badly underground, and did the same up to the roof.

A SET OF ARGUMENTS,

When a great Grecian artist was fashioning an image for the temple he was diligently carving the back part of the goddess, and one said to him, "You need not finish that part of the statue, because it is to be built into the wall." He replied, "The gods can see in the wall." He had a right idea of what is due to God. That part of my religion which no man can see should be as perfect as if it were to be observed by all. The day shall declare it. When Christ shall come everything shall be made known, and published before the universe. Therefore see to it that it be fit to be thus made known.

A FRENCH HOTEL IN PERIL.

See, again, that we ought to have good foundations when we look at the situation whereon the house is to be built. It is clear from this parable that both these houses were built in places not far from a river, or where streams might be expected to come. Certain parts of the South of France are marvellously like Palestine, and perhaps at the present moment they are more like what the Holy Land was in Christ's day than the Holy Land now is. When I reached Cannes last year I found that there had been a flood in the town. This flood did not come by reason of a river being swollen, but through a deluge of rain. A waterspout seems to have burst upon the hill-side tearing up earth, and rocks, and stones, and then hurrying down to the sea. It rushed across the railway station and poured down the street which led to it, drowning several persons in its progress.

When I was there a large hotel—I should think five stories high—was shored up with timber, and was evidently doomed; for when this stream rushed down the narrow street it undermined the lower courses of the building, and as there were no foundations at all able to bear such a test the whole erection was rendered unsafe. The Saviour had some such case in his mind's eye. A torrent of water would come tearing down the side of the mountain, and if a house was built on the mere earth, it would be carried away directly, but if it were fastened into the rock so that it became part and parcel of it, then the flood might rush all around it, but it would not shake the walls.

Beloved builder of a house for your soul, your house is so situated that one of these days there must come great pressure upon it. "How do you know?" Well, I know that the house wherein my soul lives is pitched just where winds blow, and waves rise, and storms beat. Where is yours? Do you live in a snug corner? Yes, but one of these times you will find that the snug corner will be no more shielded than the open riverside; for God so orders providence that every man has his test sooner or later. It may be that you think yourself past temptation, but the idea is a delusion, as time will show. Perhaps from the very fact that you seem quite out of the way, a peculiar temptation may befall you. Therefore, I do pray you, because of the exposed condition of your life's building, build upon a good foundation.

The next argument is, build deep, which will result from a bad foundation. The foolish builder's house was without a foundation. Notice that word, "without a foundation." Write down the expression, and see whether they apply to you or not. What happened to this house without a foundation? The stream beat vehemently on it. The river's bed had long been dry, but suddenly it was flooded, and the torrent rolled with tremendous power. Perhaps it was persecution, perhaps it was prosperity, perhaps it was trouble, perhaps it was temptation, perhaps it was prevalent scepticism, perhaps it was death; but, anyhow, the flood beat vehemently upon that house; "And immediately it fell." It did not stand a prolonged assault, it was captured at once.

What! in a minute, all that fair profession gone? "Immediately it fell." Why, that is the man I shook hands with the other Sunday, and called him "Brother," and he has been seen drunk! or he has been in the frivolous assembly, using unhallowed language! or he has become an utter doubter all on a sudden! It is sorrowful work burying our friends, but it is much more sorrowful work to lose them in this fashion; and yet so they vanish.

For lastly, and perhaps this will be the best argument, observe the effect of this good, sure building, this deep building. We read that when the flood beat upon the wise man's house "it could not shake it." That is very beautiful. Not only could it not carry it away, but "it could not shake it." I see the man; he lost his money and became poor, but he did not give up his faith: "It could not shake it." He was ridiculed and slandered, and many of his former friends gave him the cold shoulder; but "It could not shake it." He went to Jesus under his great trial and he was sustained: "It could not shake it." He was very sick and his spirit was depressed within him, but still he held his confidence in Christ: "It could not shake it." He was near to die; he knew that he must soon depart out of this world, but all the pains of death and the certainty of dissolution could not shake him. He died as he lived, firm as a rock, rejoicing as much as ever, nay, rejoicing more, because he was nearer to the kingdom and to the fruition of all his hopes. "It could not shake it."

It is a grand thing to have

A FAITH WHICH CANNOT BE SHAKEN.

I saw one day a number of beech trees which had formed a wood; they had all fallen to the ground through a storm. The fact was they leaned upon one another to a great extent, and the thickness of the wood prevented each tree from getting a firm hold of the soil. They kept each other up and also constrained each other to grow up tall and thin, to the neglect of root-growth. When the tempest forced down the first few trees the others readily followed one after the other. Close to that same spot I saw another tree in the open, bravely defying the blast, in solitary strength. The hurricane had beaten upon it, but it had endured all its force unsheltered. That lone, brave tree seemed to be better rooted than before the storm. I thought, "Is it not so with professors?" They often hold together, and help each other to grow up, but if they have not firm personal roothold, when a storm arises they fall in rows. A minister dies, or certain leaders are taken away, and over go the members by departure from the faith and from holiness.

I would have you be self-contained, growing each man into Christ for himself, rooted and grounded in love and faith and every holy grace. Then when the worst storm that ever blew on mortal man shall come, it will be said of your faith, "It could not shake it." I beseech you who are now seeking Christ to take care that you build well, that you may stand long in our Zion, steadfast and unmovable. God grant it for Christ's sake. Amen.

DR. T. J. BARNARDO.

"I once saw Jack selling mouse-traps in the street, and several military men, struck by his appearance, stopped to speak to him. Their exclamation, 'An old soldier!' was followed by a quick salute from him, and this gained him their interest at once, and I paused to hear the story he told of his past history. One perfectly new, which even I had never heard before, somewhat amazed me, for by this time I was thoroughly familiar with Jack, having only about three nights before this incident occurred had a long talk with him in a lodging-house near Bethnal Green. On this occasion 'Gentleman Jack' looked as if he had never seen me before in his life. With a perfectly oblivious air his glance fell upon me as I was included in the general salute he made his auditors, some of whom, in their benevolence, gave him money as they moved away. I was in too great a hurry to wait; had I done so I should doubtless have seen 'Gentleman Jack' move on also, but it could only have been to a public-house, where the money obtained from the credulity of the passers-by would be spent in gin."

"HIS REVERENCE."

"Another occasional lodger in the same house was a perfect contrast to 'Gentleman Jack.' He was low-sized in stature, rather squarely built; but what attracted most attention was his face and head. He had a grand head—massive, well-shaped, and large, with quantities of white hair which hung down on either side, and gave him a truly benevolent appearance, an impression which was increased from the fact that his face was closely shaven, and he always wore something about his neck that looked in the distance like a white cravat. 'His Reverence' was the sobriquet by which he was known in the lodging-house.

"His chief art lay in writing begging-letters. I have now in my possession two or three epistles received from him of the most plausible and, I had almost written, touching kind. The curious part of the matter is that each letter tells a different tale, all of which could not be true ; but when he wrote them he did not know that they would both come under my eye. ' His Reverence ' was utterly incorrigible.

" As I entered, ' Gentleman Jack ' was about to cook his supper at the large fire which blazed at the further end of the room, and ' His Reverence ' was sitting in the ingle corner, while others were scattered about the room. The looks of these men excited my sympathy, and I would certainly have endeavored to assist them in some way, but some of the company who knew me well, and supposed I was as familiar as they with the two celebrities of the house, gave the latter a sign that I was no stranger, and they accordingly conversed before me, not as they would have done and as I have since heard them do to the uninitiated, but with that dreadful mixture of profanity and slang which stamped them at once as utterly abandoned.

ANNIE AND HER FATHER.

" That very night, and in that dreadful house, I found two or three men who, with their children, were worthy of a better fate than associationship with such company. Among others, a little girl, the companion of a middle-aged man whom she called father, was then recommended to my notice. Father and child were only stopping in the kitchen until the hour came for closing, when they must turn out, not merely because the house was for men only, and therefore could afford no lodging for the girl, but chiefly because they were without the few pence which would secure them beds in any lodging-house. Hearing from the ' Deputy ' the facts of the case, I beckoned them both out into the street, and when at a sufficient distance to avoid observance, gave them a card which, by arrangement previously made, procured them a decent lodging not very far from where we stood.

THE RESULTS OF A MOTHER'S SIN.

" My offers of permanent assistance for the girl were gladly accepted ; and two days after that she presented herself at the Home with her father. It was a dark story they had to tell, but not very different from those with which I had already been made so sadly familiar from other lips. A poor country home broken up through a mother's sin, and then a journey to the Metropolis in the vain hope of doing better there—a hope entirely dispelled, and yet as often renewed, until their clothing was worn to rags, and the respectable appearance first possessed was gone. The father and the girl—the latter twelve years of age—wandered from day to day about the streets, sometimes picking up enough through the pity of passers-by to secure the shelter of a roof for at least one night. But this was not always so ; and many a night had been passed in the parks or in the open streets, or lying down in some dark corner where they could remain unobserved, only to awake next morning stiff and cold, footsore and weary, to begin the sad tramp of life over again.

" Our Home for Girls was then entering upon its second year's existence. I gladly made room for Annie, who was gratefully surrendered to my care by her poor heart-broken father. Fortunately she was his only child, and when she was gone he was able, with greater energy and less anxiety, to seek work for himself. A few years ago I heard he had been sent to one of the colonies by an Emigration Society, but I have not since had tidings of him." (The right-hand section of the lower portion of our frontispiece picture represents " Gentleman Jack " in the act of cooking his supper.)

In the Girls' Home at Ilford there are 590 orphan and destitute girls being trained for domestic service. In the Boys' Home at Stepney there are 380 vagrant boys. In these and the several other homes under Dr. Barnardo's directorship, more than 4000 boys and girls have been received since their foundation in 1870, and there are now 1200 in residence, fed, clothed, and receiving an industrial and Christian education. The cost of all this work is defrayed by voluntary contributions, which hitherto have flowed in as they have been needed. It requires five hundred dollars a day to pay the entire expenses, and though at times the funds have been almost exhausted, God has inclined some servant of His to replenish the empty exchequer in time to prevent a collapse.

A NIGHT'S WORK IN A LIFE BOAT.

The citizens of Beachhaven were gathered one bitter winter afternoon on the cliffs overlooking the Atlantic. A storm almost unprecedented in fury on that coast was raging. The sky where the sun was setting was of an angry copper color. The waves lashed by the wind raised their crested heads high above the confused sea, and where the billows struck the rock-bound coast the surface was covered with foam. In the distance a vessel was laboring heavily. Every eye in the crowd was turned in that direction, and many a heart beat quickly as she sank in the trough of the sea and mounted again on the waves. Not one there of those gazing intently from the cliff at the ship knew what vessel it was, or who were on board of her. The anxiety displayed about her fate was the product of that sympathy of man with man, which is always aroused by the spectacle of human life in peril.

Among the group of anxious watchers was a middle-aged man in sailor's dress. His frame was sturdy and well knit, a powerful man whose bronzed face and keen, watchful eye proclaimed him an experienced sailor. This was Charles Spencer, the mate of a vessel then in dock for repairs.

He was spending the brief holiday thus afforded him with his family in his own little cottage about a mile from Beachhaven. That afternoon a strange restlessness came over him, and seizing his telescope and wrapping himself up in his pilot coat he hurried away to the cliff which commanded a view of the open sea. The men who were watching the ship gathered around him and tacitly left the direction of affairs in his hands. His experienced eye soon detected an ominous fact no one else had noticed. " She has lost her rudder," he said, not removing his eye from his telescope. " There will be work for us to do tonight."

They all knew what he meant. The life-boat would be needed, and they were thankful that a vacant place in the crew would be filled by a man in whom they had so much confidence, as all had in Charles Spencer. It was gradually growing dark, and the vessel they were watching was being borne swiftly and surely toward the fatal rocks. Her destruction was inevitable, but it might be that she would be cast on the shore where all on board could be easily rescued. In her course, however, and a full mile from the beach, were a number of treacherous jagged rocks well known to every sailor and easily avoided under ordinary circumstances, but in such a sea and without a rudder she was almost certain to strike them. Charles Spencer saw this, and suggested that the life-boat should be launched and everything prepared to go to her assistance. It was quickly done, and every man stood ready at his post, while the mate stood on the summit of the cliff still following through his telescope the movements of the doomed craft.

It was evident that the crew were aware of their danger for they could be seen busily engaged in running up a sail that in default of the rudder might alter the ship's course. But it was too late; she struck the rocks heavily, crushing in her bows and the next wave lifted her bodily and left her there fixed on the rocks a hopeless wreck. Spencer closed his telescope, and bidding the villagers around him light a fire on the cliff that might serve as a beacon, he hurried down the steep descent to the point where the life-boat was moored. The daring men were soon seated and pulling hard for the wreck. It was a service of danger so imminent that hearts less gallant than theirs would have quailed before it. Their boat, fleet and strongly built as she was, needed skilful management, or she would more than once have been engulfed in that boisterous sea. It was nearly an hour before they were alongside the wreck, and Spencer standing up in the boat, gave a great shout scarcely audible above the roaring of wind and waves to those on board. It was heard, and a rope was quickly passed connecting the ship with the boat.

"Save the women and children first," was the word of command. The boat soon had as many on board as it was safe to carry, and with a promise of speedy return the boat was speeding toward the shore. All night long, guided by the beacon on the cliff and the lights on the vessel, the devoted men went to and fro carrying the shipwrecked people to the beach, where they were cared for by the hospitable villagers. The sun was just rising, as weary and exhausted the life-boat's crew made their last trip, bearing the last of the crew of the vessel.

Charles Spencer's Return from the Lifeboat Service.

No words could express the gratitude of the rescued people. They well knew that they owed the preservation of their lives to the brave men who had toiled all night at the peril of their lives to save them. The vessel was fast breaking to pieces, and but a glance was needed to show what must have been the fate of all on board, had there been no one to carry succor to them.

Having seen that all the rescued people were bestowed in places were they would be cared for and their wants supplied, Charles Spencer, whose skill and unwearied exertion had been mainly instrumental in saving so many lives, set out for home.

The man was physically exhausted, but in his heart there were glowing the warm words of gratitude which had been poured in his ears. He stepped briskly along the circuitous path that led around the base of the cliff, his weakness and weariness forgotten in the joy of a good deed done and a service rendered in the cause of humanity. He looked across the bay toward the little headland where his cottage was built, and wondered at the calm which had fallen on the sea. The storm, which the night before had lashed the sea into fury, had blown itself out, and the sea lay smooth as a mirror reflecting the rays of the sun.

As he looked he was surprised to see several people around his door, and for a moment was alarmed, dreading that some untoward event had occurred in his absence. Then it suddenly crossed his mind that to his loved ones at home his absence the whole night through was unexplained. They must have wondered what had become of him, and why he had gone out in the storm and had not returned. But now he was seen; some one had carried the news of his coming to the anxious hearts within his dwelling, for there at the gate was his wife with their children at her side waiting to give him welcome.

The next day was Sunday, and it was a day long remembered in the village. The whole of the crew and passengers of the shipwrecked vessel attended at the village church to offer thanks to God for their deliverance. It was a sight not easily forgotten. Those who but a few hours before were face to face with death now in humble thankfulness praised God for renewed life. Nor did the preacher miss the opportunity of showing them how a greater deliverance still was wrought for them through Jesus, the Captain of salvation. Perilous as their situation had been, it was but a slight peril compared with that of the world when Jesus gave His life to ransom it. With tender and earnest words this truth was impressed upon them, and they were urged to accept the offered rescue as they had gladly availed themselves of that of the life-boat. To many there that day was the beginning of a new life which would never end.

TRUE, THOUGH TRIED.

A Tale of the Seventeenth Century.

By Marie Hall.

THE WHITE ROSE.

[NO period in the comparatively modern history of the world is more deeply interesting to the Christian student than that of the seventeenth century. It was then that the Mayflower with its freight of Godly men and women despairing of religious liberty in the old world, set out to seek it in the new. While they were enduring sickness, suffering and hardship here their friends across the sea whom they had left behind were passing through a bitter experience. It seemed as if the powers of darkness had gained fresh energy and strength, and that pure and undefiled religion would be persecuted out of existence. In England especially the conflict was waged with bitter malignity. James II., a Roman Catholic king, of a narrow mind, obstinate, wicked, and contemptible in all his ways, sat upon the throne. He was surrounded by men of his own faith who led him as they would. The great offices of state were confided in defiance of law to apostates and men who, having no religion, were eager to purchase the king's favor by professing Romanism, while to be a Christian and a Protestant was a certain way to provoke the remorseless hatred of king and court. It is to the events of that time this story relates.]

THE church clock in the little town of Deerham had just struck five, when a door in a narrow street opened, and a cloaked and hooded figure stepped out into the afternoon sunshine. The wearer of the cloak and hood looked cautiously up and down the street, then, apparently reassured, the hood was pushed back, and a maiden's face was exposed to view. The day had been very sultry; not a leaf stirred on the chestnut trees that grew down one side of the road, under whose shade the maiden seemed glad to retreat. She soon turned into a wide open square, with a market cross in the centre; and while she traverses the square, and stops to talk to that old woman in a white muslin cap, we will introduce her to the reader.

The maiden's name was Margaret Desborough, or, as the townfolk called her, "The White Rose of Deerham," from the fairness of her hair and complexion. She was an orphan, and lived with her uncle and aunt, Sir Gilbert and Dame Evans, who were childless; but she was not a favorite with them for, before she became an inmate of their home, she had been brought up strictly as a Puritan; and Margaret did not change her religion when necessity drove her to her uncle's house. This adherence to an obnoxious faith was a constant source of annoyance to Sir Gilbert and his wife. He was all but a Catholic himself; his loyalty was such that he would have thought it right to imitate his sovereign, even if that personage had been pleased to revive the worship of the sun and moon.

No doubt, if Margaret had meekly laid aside her Puritanical notions and dress, she would have been the pride of Sir Gilbert's house, for although he was stern, there were soft places in his heart; but he could not brook opposition, especially from a younger member of his house, and one dependent on him. Margaret had respectfully yet firmly refused to adopt the gay style of dress then in fashion, and no argument could convince her that the sect to which she belonged were only fit for the madhouse or the pillory.

Being naturally of a serious cast of mind, these domestic disputes deepened the gravity and pensiveness of Margaret's character. The times were troublous, too; some of the dearest friends of her childhood had suffered, and were then suffering persecution and imprisonment for the faith they loved. Charles the Second's licentious reign had been a time of sorrow and sad forbodings to all thoughtful and religious people; and now James's administration did not promise the restoration of peace, purity, or order.

A little band of Puritans met together secretly in Deerham, often with trembling, lest they should be interrupted in their illegal devotions, and the chief among them arrested. It was from one of these small gatherings that Margaret had just returned, on the sunny afternoon to which we have referred.

By this time she has crossed the square, and passed into the principal street of the town. A few steps further she met a middle-aged man, whose gaudy dress suggested the idea that the wearer had more money than taste. Some might have called him handsome, at the first glance; but a further study of his features left an unpleasant impression on the mind, and only those who valued wealth cared for the acquaintance of Captain Butler. This man made a movement as if he intended to stop and speak; but Margaret drew her hood hastily over her face, and hurried by, with a haughty courtesy. She walked on so quickly, that on turning the corner of the street she ran against some one, and looking up to apologize, she stopped and held out her hand. The young man with whom she had come in collision took her hand, and smiled at the maiden's confusion, as she exclaimed:

"I really ask your pardon, Master Pelham."

"Nay, I think the apology should be mutual," said he. "Have you been to the meeting?"

"Yes," replied Margaret. "But when did you return from London? I did not expect to see you back so soon."

"Oh, I only got here this noon; my business was soon settled. There are strange things reported, and I fear ill times are at hand," said the young man, shaking his head.

The color that had come into Margaret's cheek faded, not from any personal fear—to that the little Puritan was a stranger, but some she loved would be in danger, and for them her heart sank and trembled. However, she hopefully answered:

"The storm may pass over without breaking; should it come, I pray that our faith fail not."

"Amen," responded Master Pelham; and with a reverential adieu, he took his way toward the market, and Margaret continued her walk until the outskirts of the town were reached. Sir Gilbert lived in a red-brick house, built in the Elizabethan style, of which we still see well-preserved specimens. It was a handsome dwelling, surrounded by extensive gardens, somewhat stiff and prim, but the admiration of all Deerham.

Down the broad walk, shaded by fine old trees, the baronet and his lady slowly paced on the evening of this same sultry day, and thither the cool breezes tempted Margaret. She did not join her relatives, but lingered about, looking at the flowers, and gathering a moss-rosebud to put in the bosom of her sober but becoming gown.

"Hey, Margaret!" cried Sir Gilbert, espying his niece; "come here—I want to say a word to you."

"Bless me!" said her aunt, looking at the maiden, as she joined them; "if you only knew how much a few ornaments improved a young woman, you would not despise them as you do."

"I never did despise flowers, aunt," said Margaret, quietly.

"Well, well, they are cheap and plentiful enough here," said Sir Gilbert, impatiently. "But I wanted to tell you that Captain Butler has been here this afternoon, and complains of your haughty behavior to him. Now this I will not allow toward any guest of mine, much less to a man of Captain Butler's position and wealth. Besides, I have reasons why I wish you to treat him with especial courtesy."

"May I ask what those reasons are, sir?" said Margaret, half guessing what the answer would be.

"Well, I decline to state my reasons at present; only I must request that you will alter your behavior to that gentleman," said the baronet, pompously.

"But, uncle, I do not like Captain Butler; his manners are exceedingly disagreeable and presumptuous," persisted his niece, in a firm but gentle tone.

"Presumptuous, indeed! And, pray, my girl, who are you, that you should scorn Captain Butler?"

"I am Sir Gilbert Evans's niece, sir."

"Ah, true, true," said he. She had touched his family pride. "Still, he is not a man to be held in disdain; he is very wealthy, and he has a preference for you, Margaret."

"But he is vulgar and ignorant, uncle," said the girl. "However, as long as he treats me with respect, I shall be civil to him; but if he forgets his position and mine, I cannot promise to sweeten my words. You cannot expect me to do otherwise, I am sure, sir."

Sir Gilbert did not reply; in his secret heart he admired his niece's spirit. She had spoken as he would have wished a daughter of his own to speak, but yet he was irritated; his prejudices would not let him attribute any other than ill motives to Margaret for her present independent behavior.

"If you have no more to say to your niece, Gilbert," said the dame, after a pause, while they paced up and down the broad walk, "she had better go in to her embroidery; there is still an hour of daylight left."

Margaret was glad to quit their company, and be alone; and seated at her delicate work, she recalled the conversation. It was very plain to her what the drift of it all meant, and she foresaw further trouble and vexation. Again she longed to be free, even to earn her own subsistence, and earn but a scanty meal in quietness. Often had she expressed a wish to support herself, but her uncle would not listen to such a thing; while he continually reminded her of her obligations, and called the slightest opposition to his will the sign of an ungrateful heart. And now this fresh source of annoyance had arisen by the ill-bred, coarse-minded captain taking a violent fancy to the strict little Puritan.

Sir Gilbert was rather discomposed by the high tone with which his niece had met his remonstrance; nevertheless, he had not the remotest idea of giving up the object in view; in fact, he had already promised Captain Butler that, sooner or later, his niece should give her consent to a union with him. He only required time, he said, to bring the refractory spirit to submission; but of the final result he had not a single doubt. After this evening's experience, he laid himself out for a rather long siege.

"You know she must yield in the end, wife; so it is no use her putting on such airs. But all women make a fuss at first," said Sir Gilbert, adding:

"Captain Butler asked me to-day if I would let him have that miniature picture which lies in my cabinet; he caught sight of it in some way. He thought it was a likeness of Margaret herself. I told him it was her mother, and that I did not like to part with it. She was my only sister, dame, after all, although she did fall into some strange errors; but that was all Desborough's fault. Well, I told the captain he could not have it. Then he asked if I would get a large picture taken of her, for which, of course, he would pay, and from it he could have a miniature copied. I know Margaret would not consent, if she knew, but I shall not tell her anything more than is necessary to secure a likeness. He is a foolish fellow to spend so much money for a trifle, but his heart is set upon her, and if we can only manage it, she may turn out a sensible matron yet. Butler will have none of her meetings and praying folks. He can forbid what he likes, and I shall be free from my promise."

Next morning, Margaret was astonished at hearing it announced that her portrait was to be taken, and that that very day arrangements were to be made for an artist from a neighboring town to take up his residence at Sir Gilbert's. She puzzled over the strange news all the day, but could find no solution of the riddle. In the gallery of Deerham Hall hung the portraits of her ancestors for many generations back. Lately, Sir Gilbert and his wife had been added to the collection, and now Margaret was to take her place among them.

Myers, the painter, arrived, and arranged his easel at the end of the gallery. He was slightly deformed, but his fine head and intellectual features partly atoned for the ill-shape of his body; and it was soon evident that he knew and loved his profession.

In due time the painting was finished and taken away (ostensibly) to be framed; but before it was sent back to Deerham Hall two copies of it had been taken. The weeks rolled on heavily, each one bringing fresh troubles to the maiden, whose greatest trial was the prosecuting attentions of the captain. One evening he found her in the long walk, and was by her side before she had time to escape. There was a triumphant gleam in the soldier's eye, and an especial insolence in his manner, that roused Margaret's pride.

"I have something to show you," said he, producing a handsome leather case, of foreign workmanship, but keeping it still closed. "I have something to show you; it is the miniature of the fairest woman in England, and my ambition will only be satisfied when I possess the original."

Margaret's heart gave a leap. Perhaps he had seen the uselessness of his suit, and was now trying to pique her, by bestowing his favors on another. But her relief was of short duration. Her tormentor opened the case deliberately, furtively watching her face the while; and there, set in a rim of gold, lay an admirable portrait of herself! Words cannot describe the astonishment and indignation depicted on the maiden's face at the sight; nor can what followed be repeated, save that, when the soldier left her presence he felt that he was utterly and hopelessly defeated. Even his vanity could not deceive him, by suggesting the faintest chance of a different reception from the lady at another time; his former liking changed into hatred; and his ungenerous spirit longed for revenge—for some means of humbling her pride.

Sir Gilbert heard, next day, from the discomfited suitor, the result of his enterprise. In vain the baronet urged that Margaret was young, and might change her mind, or be brought to reason. The captain was sullen, and said:

"I am not going to make a fool of myself again," adding some maledictions on women in general.

Returning home, Sir Gilbert told his wife of the failure of their plans. Margaret was summoned; and as the captain himself had retired from the field, persuasion was exchanged for reproaches. The poor girl left their presence with a clear conscience, but a heavy heart; and gladly hailed the hour that called her to join the little company who met for prayer and instruction in God's Word. The week-day service was held from three to five o'clock. What a haven of rest seemed that quiet room to Margaret! It was not very large, having formerly been a dining-hall; but the present residents of the house had set apart this room for worship, and the utmost secrecy was observed in their gatherings.

The service had not yet begun. One by one the little congregation dropped in, until Master Pelham, the pastor, whom we have met before, took his place at a desk at the upper end of the room, and offered up a prayer. The maiden's head and heart were bowed, and her tears flowed afresh, as she followed the minister's petition which concluded thus:

"There is none else under heaven who can comfort us, but Thou, only, O Lord our God, the heavenly Physician of souls, who strikest and healest. We long after the joy of peace. If Thou give peace, if Thou pour into our hearts holy joy, the souls of Thy servants shall be full of melody, and shall become devout in Thy praise."

Lifted up by the good man's closing words, Margaret rose from her knees, calmed, and reconciled to her lot, ready to listen with undistracted mind to the short, simple sermon that followed, on the words, "In the world ye shall have tribulation." The pastor had observant eyes for his little flock. He marked the traces of tears, and the hunted look of the most timid, and his instructions were mingled with many words of tenderest sympathy and encouragement.

The service over, Margaret hurried home. Guests were expected that afternoon, coming straight from London. Perhaps they might bring news; perhaps the names of some she loved might be mentioned.

The entrance gate was open, and a lumbering old vehicle, covered with dust, and followed by two or three outriders equally travel-stained, was passing up the avenue, when the maiden reached Sir Gilbert's little park; and in the bustle of this arrival she made her way to her own chamber, unobserved. Rebecca, the waiting-maid, quickly answered her mistress's summons.

"Be as nimble as you can, my girl. I would see this company soon, and hear the first tidings from the city."

ANANIAS AND SAPPHIRA.

S.S. Lesson for Feb. 25. Acts 6: 11-16. Golden Text, Prov. 12: 22. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

No Poverty in the Early Church—A Test of Consecration—All on the Altar—No Criticism of Methods—The Believer as God's Steward—The Enemy in the Church—Ananias Providing for a Time of Need—Not An Uncommon Case—A Foreign Element—Ananias Desiring to Appear Other Than He Was—The Revelation to Peter—Sapphira's Participation in Sin and Punishment—The Effect on the Church—Healing and Revival Simultaneous.

THERE was no poverty in the primitive church. We read, "Neither was there any among them that lacked; for as many as were possessors of lands or houses, sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them at the apostles' feet; and distribution was made to every man according as he had need." This was a practical renunciation of all that they had, this was no mere doctrine, no empty profession. Those things which were given to the Lord were turned into money, and distributed to the needy members of their community.

Many children of God deceive themselves and fancy that they count all they have to be the Lord's, who would be most unwilling to part with their carriage, their family jewels, the house of their ancestors, the furniture which was their father's before them, the business which they have got together by years of toil, they would be unwilling to sell up all and go out to India or China as missionaries. Now it is not true that we have given up all, if we are unwilling to part with any or with the whole of our possessions to extend the kingdom of God. What use are our houses except in the salvation of men? What use is our money except it is put out at interest for God in the support of His cause? It is an untrue thing to pretend that all is on the altar, so long as we are keeping back anything because of what men expect of us for anything, position, comfort, convenience, or aught else.

We cannot judge one another as to the way in which all we have may be used for God, whether it shall be sold and the money given to the Lord, or whether God may continue to retain us as His stewards of it. If we are and He permits us to suffer loss, then the fact that all is the Lord's puts it out of our power to complain; shall He not do what He will with His own? There is something most painful in the idea of a rich man of God being master of his possessions, and patronizing the work of God by giving his hundreds or thousands. If he takes his right place, he will not feel that he can dispose of a cent; he will be like the Lord's cashier, a simple servant who shrinks from any imputation of generosity, just as a man full of the Holy Ghost shrinks involuntarily from any imputation to him of power or wisdom, and says, "It was the Lord."

Among the first who sold land and gave all the proceeds to the Lord was Barnabas (the son of consolation) afterward so blessed a witness for the Master, and many followed his example, so that it became the ordinary thing for members of the church to cease to be proprietors. They took the position of the Levites of old, "Wherefore Levi hath no part nor inheritance with his brethren, the Lord is his inheritance, according as the Lord thy God promised him" (Deut. 10: 9).

But even in this blessed company of early Christians where the air of heaven was so pure, and where Jesus only seemed to reign, the enemy of souls crept in. There was one man who of living up to the glorious standard of Christian life which obtained then in the church, and who yet was not prepared to make a complete sacrifice. He wanted to have something to fall back upon in case he came to need; he did not entirely trust his case with God. So "Ananias with Sapphira his wife, sold a possession, and kept back part of the price, his wife also being privy to it and brought a certain part, and laid it at the apostles' feet." Would that this were an uncommon case! it was so then, when the tone of Christianity was so high, when every believer was filled with the Holy Ghost, when self could not raise its head, and all the members of the body of Christ worked together as parts of one whole; when jealousy and self-seeking were unknown and impossible in such an atmosphere. These men were in the fullest sense seeking first the kingdom of heaven, knowing of a truth that all things should be called unto them (Matt. 6: 33); they took the Lord for their Shepherd, and they knew that they should not want (Psalm 23: 1). Thus the duplicity and unbelief, not to speak of the self-seeking of Ananias, brought in a new and foreign element. Alas! in our day the Ananias element predominates. Men and women sing, "My body, soul and spirit, Jesus I give to Thee," and yet we see them living to themselves; they sing, "Were the whole realm of nature mine, that were a present far too small," and yet the offering which they make to God is the merest fraction of their possessions.

Reader, how much do you give to the Lord? Have you ever taken the position of being the Lord's property yourself, and therefore all that you have? Then how much is it consistent for you to appropriate to the Lord? Is your business the Lord's? do you conduct it for Him or for the making of a name and a position for yourself? Do you train your children for the Lord, and care that their education shall be such as shall most serve the purpose of your God? Are your household arrangements such that they are elastic when the work of God calls for a change of meal times, etc.? Is God first in the house? Is He considered above all others? Is your position in society the Lord's to be used or neglected just as it serves God's purpose? Do you make a practice of being faithful to those in your own position in life, letting them clearly see that God is first with you, caring nothing for the contempt in which they hold you? Is your money the Lord's, so that you practise the strictest economy in board, lodging, clothing, and travelling, that you may have all the rest for Jesus? If not, are you not keeping back "part of the price"?

The fearful sin of Ananias lay in his attempt to take the place of one who had been moved by the Holy Ghost to renounce all that he had, and who had responded to the call, he wanted it to be believed by the apostles and believers in general that he was possessed by a devotion which consumed him, when all the time he was making plans to help himself. And God would be

NO PARTY TO SUCH A TRANSACTION.

No sooner did Ananias bring his offering, and lay it at the apostle's feet, than Peter seeing with the eyes of God, read his heart, and said, "Ananias, why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost, and to keep back part of the price of the land? Whiles it remained, was it not thine own? and after it was sold, was it not in thine own power"? God had not forced him either to sell it or to give it, it was his own act, he might have withheld it, owning that he had not faith enough to follow in the track of others. But he wanted to serve himself and get the credit for serving God. "Why hast thou conceived this thing in thine heart? thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God." Little did Ananias think that the Searcher of hearts had communicated his secret to Peter. But the Holy Ghost is not to be trifled with, and so mighty was the power in His words by Peter that the physical life of Ananias gave way before them, and he fell dead at the apostle's feet. "And the young men arose, covered him up, and carried him out and buried him."

Only three hours elapsed when Sapphira, not knowing what was done, came in, and Peter put the question to her, "Tell me whether ye sold the land for so much"? Her answer was quick and ready, "Yea, for so much." Oh, had she known that which had just occurred, how different would have been her answer! Poor sinful woman, she was all unprepared for the awful words which followed, "How is it that ye have agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord? Behold the feet of them which have buried thy husband are at the door, and shall carry thee out." Not a moment for repentance, not an instant for getting right when she was wrong. God hates lying at all times and in all circumstances. "Lying lips are," at all times, unto the Lord." But in the special circumstances in which this spoken and acted lie took place, when these two, man and wife, had to run counter to the whole tone of the church, while assuming to be one with them, such sin became doubly heinous. In measure as God gives us light upon holiness of heart and life, sin, and especially anything in the form of untruth, becomes impossible. The instinct of the life of God is openness and thoroughness. When we read the description of the new Jerusalem we find that "there shall enter into it nothing that defileth, neither anything that worketh abomination or maketh a lie" (Rev. 21: 27).

"AN ABOMINATION

of this sudden and awful judgment was most blessed and salutary upon the church. "Great fear came upon the church and upon as many as heard these things." Man learned that the God of truth tolerated neither lies nor liars. The prayer of the apostles that such wonders may be done in the name of the holy child Jesus, was manifestly answered, "by the hands of the apostles were many signs and wonders wrought among the people." In addition to this, half-hearted believers were kept at a distance; we read, "And of the rest durst no man join himself to them; but the people magnified them." Would that it were so now! Would that the tone of the children of God stood so high that false professors and unconsecrated believers would fear to join a church where Holy Ghost discipline was so strict! But this did not hinder the work from going on. This uncompromising stand against sin brought forward those honest and good hearts who longed to escape sin; there was a great revival. Believers were the more added to the Lord, multitudes both of men and women. And as always has been and always will be the case when the Holy Ghost has His way, and where the unbelief of Christians does not hinder, the work of healing went on simultaneously, "Insomuch that they brought forth the sick into the streets, and laid them on beds and couches, that at the least the shadow of Peter passing by might overshadow some of them. There came also a multitude out of the cities round about unto Jerusalem, bringing sick folks, and them which were vexed with unclean spirits; and they were healed, every one."

Why should not such times return? God is unchanged, the Holy Ghost is the same; God make Christians the same! Oh, that the Ananias spirit may die out of the church! Oh, that the one heart and one soul spirit, the true spirit of Jesus Christ, may revive among and inspire us. That we may be powerful we must be holy, we must be true, we must be like God. "The Lord is at hand" waiting for a prepared Bride, hundreds of thousands of souls go down continually into perdition, not because the Gospel is unpreached, but because it has not the power of a Christ life in its votaries to back up the preaching. O God, at any cost make us holy, strip us of all that, we may be like Thee, and serve Thy purpose in our day and generation!

The Date of the Coronation of the Czar of Russia is fixed for May 27th. The announcement is made by the Czar in a manifesto addressed to all Russian subjects. A ukase orders the attendance at Moscow, on the occasion of the coronation, of all the marshals, the nobility, the prefects of the provincial capitals, except those of Siberia, whose attendance is excused on account of distance, and the presidents of the rural and urban administrations. The Minister of the Household assisted by a commission is charged with the duty of making the necessary preparations. A newspaper correspondent telegraphs a summary of the preparations for the ceremony. He states that tailors are busy making up uniforms, and the Court jewelers have been overwhelmed with orders for crosses and stars to be distributed to the Czar's loyal subjects. The throne is being built in sections in St. Petersburg and Moscow, under the direction of General Filimonoff. The framework consists of dark oak, elaborately carved in antique Slavonic patterns, and the hangings are of crimson velvet, embroidered and fringed with gold. The dais, on which will be placed the chairs of the Emperor and Empress, is approached by three steps and is surmounted by a canopy supported by four columns about ten feet in height. The canopy bears the imperial eagle, and is ornamented with a kind of scroll work exhibiting the fifty-six coats of arms of the governments of Russia. Meantime the Nihilists are not idle. A despatch from Vienna to the London Telegraph says: "A solemn warning, printed on fine vellum, has reached the Czar and the members of the Russian Cabinet claiming universal suffrage, the right of the people to own land, freedom of conscience, of the press, and of public meeting. If these demands are not granted before the coronation of the Czar the Revolutionary Committee sending the warning threaten to revert to intimidation."

Prince Napoleon has been Released from prison. The tribunal before which he was arraigned quashed the indictment against him, and the Prince returned to his residence. He was in prison for three weeks and now for the first time in his life enjoys the sweets of a semi-popularity. Certain classes in Paris sympathize with him as a man who has suffered because he had the courage to tell the French Government and people some wholesome truths. It is stated that he will shortly visit England to confer with the Empress Eugenie. The Government evidently expected the decision of the Court in regard to Prince Napoleon, as it introduced an additional clause of the Press bill, making the issuing of placards inciting to the overthrow of the Republic punishable.

The French Government Appears to be Completely demoralized. M. Fallières, the Premier of a week, has expressed his intention to resign. His health is shattered, and it is evident that he has no influential following in the Legislature. M. Freycinet, the ex-Premier, has been invited by President Grèvy to form a cabinet, but has declined, being conscious that he does not possess the confidence of a majority in either chamber. In the emergency, M. Jules Ferry was then intrusted with the duty of constructing an administration, but he is believed to have refused the duty. M. Ferry is regarded with fear by the property owning classes, his political principles and affiliations being of the extreme type. Should he be induced to take office, there are likely to be sweeping changes inaugurated which will exasperate both the army and the priesthood, and may precipitate France into a revolution ending either in the restoration of the Bourbons or the re-establishment of the Empire.

The Carman who Drove the Assassins of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke to the spot in Phœnix Park, where the murder was committed, gave evidence on Saturday against the men charged with the commission of the crime. He was at first in the dock with the other prisoners, and while there he was positively identified by a little girl who saw him and spoke to him on the fatal night. When admitted to the witness-box as an informer, he acknowledged his share in the crime. He said that he was a member of the Assassination Society, and when he was admitted he had taken an oath to drive anywhere when required. He was ordered on May 6th to drive four men, of whom two are among the prisoners on trial, to Phœnix Park. There they met a cab in which were four other persons, of whom the witness identified two and the driver of the car, among the prisoners, and he testified that being instructed to be in readiness to drive away, he was close to the waiting group when the two victims approached; he saw them both fall, and afterward, the men he had driven jumped on his car and he drove away. Several witnesses were called who corroborated details in his evidence. The case against the accused is rendered very strong by the carman's evidence, and its gravity is evidently appreciated by the prisoners. That levity and carelessness they displayed at their previous examination left them when the carman took the witness-stand.

The Inquiry into the Cimbria Disaster has commenced in Hamburg. The captain of the Sultan being examined contradicted his former statement that he saw the port lights of the Cimbria first. The President of the Court cautioned him to read his sworn declaration. Captain Cuttill replied that if he had ever made such a statement it must have been through misapprehension of the question which elicited it. He said that by the violence of the collision the Sultan was turned head to westward. He dared not turn around again until he had repaired her damage, as the bulkhead, if her head was put to sea, would have been unable to stand the strain. Other officers of the Sultan stated that after the collision they heard the screams of women, but the fog was so dense that they saw nothing.

A Letter from Prince Bismarck to the American contributors to the fund for the relief of the sufferers by the recent floods has been received by the German consuls here. In it the Prince, in the name of the Emperor, thanks the contributors and says: "The Emperor has learned with keen interest from your report how general was the sympathy awakened among the German citizens in America for the sufferings of the residents of the inundated districts. He is much gratified to learn of the feeling of kinship which citizens of the German race abroad entertain for their countrymen in their old home, which corresponds with the friendly relations existing between Germany and America."

The Resignation of General Charles P. Stone or Stone Pacha, as he is called in Egypt, has caused general regret among the Egyptian people. The American general was entertained before leaving the Khedive's service at a banquet given by the members of the Egyptian Geographical Society, of which he was president. Two ex-Prime Ministers—Nubar and Riaz Pachas—were present, as well as over fifty other pachas, beys and officials of lesser magnitude. In accepting General Stone's resignation both the Khedive and the Premier—Cherif Pacha—addressed to him letters written in exceptionally complimentary terms. The real reason of General Stone's resignation is that he is convinced that Egypt—in spite of all England's protestations to the contrary—has become virtually a British province, and that all hope has now vanished of ever building up an independent Egypt under a successor of Mehemet Ali. General Stone during the recent troubles was faithful to the Khedive and gave no aid to Arabi.

The Cause of the False Prophet in Egypt Appears to have undergone reverses of a severe character. A letter published in the New York Herald from a pacha opposed to Es Senoussi, the prophet, says: "The situation in Kordofan is at present as follows: After the False Prophet attacked the city of Obeyad, where he was repulsed with a loss of over fifteen thousand men, he returned and laid siege to it. (Obeyad is the capital of Kordofan, is situated 250 miles south-west of Khartoum and 150 miles west of the White Nile.) As there were plenty of provisions in Obeyad to enable the garrison to hold out for several months Said Pacha, the governor of the city, did not deem it wise to risk an attack on the Mehdi and awaited the arrival of reinforcements from Khartoum. Reinforcements were sent, but they had very severe fighting on their way and lost a good number of men. These reinforcements finally reached Bara (a town thirty miles north of Obeyad), where they remained awaiting orders from Obeyad how to act in conjunction with the Obeyad garrison. And what since has been done is unknown to us. The last news that we have—although it remains to be officially confirmed—is that the False Prophet has given up the blockade of Obeyad and has gone to Birkeh, three days' march south of Obeyad, where he is awaiting reinforcements from the Bahr-el-Gazal and Darfour, and is in the mean time reorganizing his troops." The pacha describes the statements published in America from Dr. Schweinfurth as exaggerations.

The Barbarous Amusement of Pigeon Shooting matches has become unfashionable in England. The Princess of Wales, with the true womanliness that has made her the best beloved lady in the country, has for some time used her influence in opposition to the movement. She has now caused it to be made known in fashionable circles that she will attend no parties at which pigeon shooting forms an item in the programme. Several other ladies of eminence in society have followed her example. It will be a good thing if the cruel sport is banished in consequence from the entertainments of the aristocracy.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey having Concluded a brilliant and successful campaign at Dublin, where they were the means of leading a multitude of sinners to accept Christ as their Saviour, and devote themselves to His service, commenced labor in Birmingham on January 18th. Their meetings were held in Bingley Hall, which has a seating capacity of 9000, but notwithstanding its vast proportions it was continually filled to its utmost limits, and a considerable number of meetings in different districts of the town were held in furtherance of the general movement. Reports of good effected are published in the English journals. A remarkable feature of the movement was the cordiality with which ministers of all denominations joined in work and prayer for the success of the mission. Dr. R. W. Dale, the leading minister of the town, attended the meetings and testified in his own pulpit to the evident depth and sincerity of the results of the mission.

The Socialists of London are Preparing a Demonstration in favor of Mr. Bradlaugh, the atheist member of the British Parliament. It is stated that he intends going to the House of Commons accompanied by thousands of his sympathizers, and there offering to take the oath or affirm. The London News expresses the belief that the Ministry will introduce in the House of Commons a bill legalizing an affirmation by members who desire to affirm instead of taking the Parliamentary oath.

Dr. Benson, the New Archbishop of Canterbury, is of a Methodist stock. His grandfather was the late Rev. Joseph Benson, author of a commentary on the Bible, which still holds its place on old-fashioned Methodist bookshelves, and which testifies to the learning as well as to the piety of its author. Joseph Benson was one of those fine old Methodist preachers who sixty years ago, or thereabouts, commanded admiration and affection on account of their simple dignity of character and demeanor, their masculine force of intellect, and their extraordinary impressiveness as preachers of the Gospel.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

A STRANGER to the city of New York who, on Monday, February 11th, saw the great concourse of its most eminent citizens gathered in the Church of the Covenant must have wondered what stirring cause could have drawn together so many men widely differing in politics, profession, social status, and religious denomination. To almost every citizen in New York the cause of the gathering was well known. Scarcely any one among them being asked what it was, but would have answered in effect, if not in words, "Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?"

As a leader among men, a veritable prince in the true nobility of nature, princely in his mental gifts, in his sterling integrity, in his conscientious conduct and his unlimited benevolence, William E. Dodge has left behind him a name and fame that will never be forgotten by this generation of his fellow-countrymen. It was a grand testimony to the worth of the Christian merchant that on the day of his funeral clergymen of all denominations, judges, professors, lawyers, editors and millionnaire merchants assembled, desiring to express by their presence their regard and esteem for the dead Christian.

Beside those who attended in their personal capacity, there were a large number of deputations representing institutions and corporations who held in high honor the name of William E. Dodge. Among these were: the officers and many members of the Chamber of Commerce; a deputation from each of the following railroad companies: The Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, the New York, Lackawanna and Western, the Morris and Essex, the Oswego and Syracuse, the Utica, Chenango and Susquehanna Valley, the Cayuga and Susquehanna and the Syracuse, Binghamton and New York; the Lackawanna Iron and Coal Company, the Atlantic Mutual Marine and the Mutual Life Insurance Companies, the United States Trust Company, the Iron and Metal Exchange, the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, the American Exchange National Bank, the Union Theological Seminary, Lafayette and Williams Colleges, the Union League, Lotos and Union Clubs, the Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, the American Bible Society, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, the Sabbath Committee, the American Tract Society, the American Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, the National Temperance Society, the Phelps, Water Street and Cremorne Missions, the Christian Homes for Intemperate Men and Women, the New York Post Office Temperance Society, and the Ansonia Brass and Copper Company.

In that distinguished assemblage a solemn hush prevailed as Dr. S. Irenæus Prime rose, and after reading a brief portion of Scripture, held up which Mr. Dodge had been accustomed to use for several years. It contained some Biblical readings for every day in the year, and it was Mr. Dodge's custom every morning before going down to prayers, to read those selected for that day. The verses selected for the 9th of February, the day of his death, were as follows, and had doubtless been read by Mr. Dodge a moment before his death: "And I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors and their works do follow them." "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest." "For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand." "I have fought a good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith: Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day." "Those words," said Dr. Prime, "may be said to epitomize the life of our dead brother: he was full of fight for the right, and faith in his God."

Dr. Roswell Hitchcock, President Hopkins and Dr. Theodore Cuyler, who were all deeply affected, afterward addressed those present, dwelling on the characteristics which had made the man whom all mourned so eminent in the community. Prominent among them each speaker dwelt on the undaunted courage of the man. This courage we have all admired. It was a courage which enabled Mr. Dodge to stand up in opposition to the bulk of the people when his conscience prompted him, on the temperance question, the question of the observance of Lord's Day, and on other subjects on which he believed his principles as a Christian and a philanthropist were at stake. Foremost among merchants, four times elected President of the Chamber of Commerce, prominent among railroad magnates and a director of many companies, mixing day by day with all classes and conditions of men, he yet maintained untarnished his Christian character, was known as a Christian, and respected as such by those whose lives and principles differed most radically from his, he has gone to his grave honored by the whole community. All men, and especially all young men should study well the lessons of such a life.

HIS ANCESTRY

was English; as Dr. Hitchcock observed, "He was of gentle blood, refined and tempered through generations of outward comfort and of inward culture. The blood was English unmixed, Puritan English. The original American ancestor of the family was William Dodge, of Dorsetshire, in England, who came over to Salem in 1629, and was one of the founders of the Massachusetts Colony. William Earle Dodge was in the seventh generation of this descent. His father, David Low Dodge, who had been a successful merchant in Hartford, Conn., where William Earle was born September 4th, 1805, came that same year to New York, and established the firm of Higginson & Dodge. They had houses in Boston, New York, Baltimore, and New Orleans, and were the leading importers and jobbers of those days. The firm were large ship-owners, and lost heavily by the embargo, the action of Napoleon, and the war of 1812. Withdrawing from the firm, Mr. David Low Dodge retired for a time to Norwich, Conn., where he built one of the first cotton mills in New England.

"In 1818 he returned to New York, established the new firm of Ludlow & Dodge, and, in 1827, finally retired from business, devoting the rest of his life to literary and religious work, publishing several valuable books, and keeping himself well up in the theological controversies of the day. He was an elder in the old Wall Street Church, and, with Mr. Robert Lennox, father of the late James Lennox, formed the Building Committee of the new edifice in Wall Street. He was also connected with the Brick Church, and, on his recommendation, the Rev. Gardiner Spring, then a very young man, was called to be its first pastor. His wife, the mother of William Earle, was the daughter of the Rev. Aaron Cleveland, a learned minister, and the ancestor of many distinguished and leading men. Our friend was always grateful for his erudite and saintly parentage, and always honored it by word and deed."

When the Dodge family came to New York William was thirteen years old. He was at once placed as in a wholesale dry-goods store at No. 304 Pearl Street, near Peck Slip. Very recently the editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD traversed in his company the neighborhood in which those early years were spent, and listened with interest to his description of the scene as it was when, as a boy, he trod those streets sixty-five years ago.

His father lived at No. 98 William Street, where now it intersects Platt Street. It was part of his work as errand-boy to carry bundles up Broadway to Greenwich Village, which embraced what is now bounded by Seventh and Eighth Avenues and Fourth and Tenth Streets. The dry-goods district was confined almost entirely to Pearl Street, from Coenties to Peck Slip; the retail dry-goods shops were in upper Pearl and Chatham Streets, and Broad, Water and Front Streets contained the wholesale grocery houses. The population of the city was less than 120,000; the houses within the limits did not extend much beyond Canal Street, and John, Fulton, Beekman, Gold and Cliff Streets, where now the great printing houses, warehouses and factories stand, were then filled with private dwellings.

Mr. Dodge continued at work in various capacities, developing great energy, aptitude and skill as a salesman, and winning a large number of friends by qualities of good-nature and geniality, until he was twenty-one years old. Then, in May, 1827, he entered into as a dry-goods merchant at No. 213 Pearl Street. The firm name was Huntington & Dodge, his partner being a young man who had just been graduated from Yale College. This young man's father had been an employer of Mr. Dodge during most of the time the latter had worked in a subordinate capacity. He agreed to furnish a large share of the capital required for the undertaking, and promised to indorse the paper of the new firm to a reasonable extent. Thus fitted out the young men began business.

Mr. Dodge in after years thus related an incident which occurred at this period of his career. "A few weeks after we started, and when our stock of goods was small, three young men stepped into the store, each having two large tin trunks which he carried in his hands, aided by a large strap over the shoulders. I saw at once they were Connecticut peddlers, for I had often dealt with such when a clerk. They were attracted by some article in the window. After giving them its price, and while they set down their loads to rest and talk, I said pleasantly: 'I see you are, like myself, just starting in business. Now let me make you a proposition: There is plenty of room in our store; each of you take one of these pigeon-holes under the shelves, put your trunks there in place of carrying them around while you are picking up your goods, and just order all you buy to be sent here. We will take charge of your purchases, pack and ship them, and you can come here and examine your bills, write letters, and do as you like, whether you buy a dollar of us or not.' They were pleased with the offer, accepted it at once, and left in search of such things as they wanted.

"My young partner waited till they got out, and then with considerable excitement and wounded pride, said, 'Well, are those what you call customers?' I said, 'Yes; you know that tall oaks from little acorns grow. We shall see by and by what they will make.' Suffice it to say that for the six years I remained in the dry-goods business they were among my most attached customers. They were all respectable young men, not afraid of work, nor ashamed of small beginnings. They are all living. One has been president of a New England Bank for more than twenty years; his brother, years after, moved to one of the large towns of Ohio, went into business, and has grown to be the man of the place, associated with the railroads and public improvements of the State; the other, who was from a manufacturing town in Connecticut, has long been connected with the large mills of the place, a man unusually respected. These are examples of hundreds of our most successful and honored citizens, who have begun with little or nothing, but by industry, economy, and prudence have risen to the highest positions."

dicted events, "Take heed that no man deceive you," is of paramount importance. The current events of the day are bringing this particular question prominently to the notice of those students of prophecy who are endeavoring to discern the signs of the times in the light of Scripture; and in proportion to the greatness of the proof afforded that the attention thus given to the subject is promoting the glory of God, will the subtle devices of Satan be in operation, in order to draw away the mind of the inquirer from the brightness of God's truth, and delude it into the vain pursuit of the ignis fatuus emanating from the swamps of error.

Happily he has no power or influence over true faith, and he can only lead astray the sceptic and the unwary. The Holy Spirit of God, whose special work is to guide the children of God "into all truth" (John 16 : 13) will, when unresisted and not grieved, lead to a perfect harmony of interpretation. It is evident, therefore, that the lamentable divergence of opinion which so extensively prevails, as well in the outlines as in some of the details of unfulfilled prophecy, must necessarily be acting upon the natural disposition of mankind, either to rely upon human intellect, or when dissatisfied with the results of that, to submit to the wavering and uncertain conclusions of tradition or the despotic propagandism of Church authority. When the mind of the child of God is perfectly free from the influences of education and example, and from the prejudices thereby imbibed, and manifests a childlike willingness to receive, as on a tabula rasa, the promised teaching of the Holy Spirit, it will be found that the marvellous change which will eventually be witnessed and participated in by all the dwellers upon earth, will culminate in the assumption of visible power and authority over the kingdoms of the world by our Lord Jesus Christ, on the re-established throne of David. (Compare Acts 15 : 13–18; Luke 1 : 32; Psalm 2 : 8; and Isaiah 9 : 7.)

THE ORDERLY PROCESSION OF EVENTS.

The progressive events leading to this will occur in systematic and perfect order, as revealed by the Holy Ghost in the Word of God, and it is the privilege as well as the duty of the believer to investigate them. The Scriptural position of the Church during this long-protracted period, in which the events are being accomplished, and which will terminate in the "times of restitution of all things," according to the combined testimony of all the holy prophets, must be ascertained and duly appreciated; and the distinction drawn between the Church and the restored nations of Judah and Israel, as well as between the position they hold toward each other previous to their reunion. These several points are all clearly defined in Scripture. It will be seen that when the Messiah came to "restore again the kingdom to Israel" (Acts 1 : 6), He was interrupted in His purpose, and prevented from accomplishing it by His rejection and crucifixion.

THE FORMATION OF THE CHURCH.

This truth may be gathered from the solemn and the pathetic exclamation of the Lord Jesus Christ, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not. Behold your house is left unto you desolate." During the period of this desolation, comprising as it does the greater portion of the "times of the Gentiles," the formation of the Church takes place. This formation on the first superficial impression has somewhat the appearance of an arrière pensée, but a deeper view of it reveals the astonishing fact that the Church was formed in the mind of God before the foundation of the world.

It will also be seen that in this formation of the Church, the distinction between Jew and Gentile, called the "middle wall of partition," is broken down, but this great truth, termed the "hidden mystery," was not revealed till after the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the Church, and was not put into actual practice till some time after that descent, when it was proclaimed to the jealous Jews by the apostle Paul, after his celebrated sermon at Antioch, when he said, "Lo, we turn to the Gentiles." (Acts 13 : 46.)

Ever since then the formation of the Church has been gradually going on amid the opposition of open hostility and persecution, as well as of the deceitful imitations of truth, in the propagation of what is declared to be "another Gospel which is not another," and also the unscriptural combinations of multifarious human arrangements, which are known (and in some instances acknowledged) as sects, and which are suited more or less to the worldly mind, but unwarranted by the Word of God, and are in glaring contrast to the Christianity inculcated and practised by Christ and His Apostles.

THE TRUE SEPARATION OF THE CHURCH.

The full appreciation of this eclectic and exclusive standing of the Church, this real "coming out and being separate," will materially assist the members of Christ's Church in dissecting the numerous errors that are abroad, and in bringing every pretentious doctrine "to the law and to the testimony." Among other errors may be mentioned a strange doctrine that the beautiful figurative description of the Church as the "Bride of the Lamb," applies exclusively to the restored Jewish nation, on account of the typical expressions of betrothal which had been addressed to them by the prophets, especially by Hosea to Israel. But if this be a correct interpretation, the personality of the Church, with all her varied attainments, will be completely lost, and by an imaginary metempsychosis, her identity and idiosyncrasy will be merged into that of her Lord and Master, by a misinterpretation of the statement of her oneness with Christ.

HER ONLY TRUE AND SAFE POSITION.

With regard to the order of events ushering in the establishment of the predicted kingdom, the Church was warned against any undue interference with them, when the Lord corrected Peter's anxiety about John, and said, "Follow thou Me." (John 21 : 22.) The only true and safe position of the Church, therefore, is to follow Christ, and testify of Him irrespective of events, and "Wait for His coming from heaven," (1 Thess. 1 : 10); at the same time everything that is revealed in God's Word is open to the investigation of the members of Christ's Church, and although they may not be personally mixed up in many of these coming events, still it is not unreasonable to suppose that they will take a special interest in them, now that they have been admitted into the family of God, by the exercise of imparted faith (Eph. 2 : 8), corrected by chastenings, strengthened by victorious conflicts, changed and translated to heaven, and brought into a state of glory.

APPEARANCE OF FALSE CHRISTS.

We are told how desirous the angels in heaven are of looking into the things relating to Christ that are being enacted upon earth, (1 Peter 1 : 12.) The warning given against the appearance of false Christs at the time of the end, is significantly brought into remembrance by the remarkable expectation now prevailing among the Mohammedan population of the near approach of their Mahdy, or imaginary Messiah, who may probably appear in the form of one of Satan's Antichrists; and, in fact, it would seem that there is existing throughout the nations of the world an undefined expectation of some unprecedented and universal change being near at hand. While the Jews are "seeking after signs and the Greeks wisdom," the obedient believer follows "Jesus Christ and Him crucified," and while duly prepared for His summons, he may observe with interest the buddings and leafing of the prophetical fig-tree, and confidently rejoice that they are indications of the completion of his redemption.

WARS, EARTHQUAKES, ETC.

Some of the foretold events of the last days, such as wars and rumors of wars, and earthquakes, have occurred more or less frequently and intensely throughout the dispensation, but other events are clearly predicted to occur immediately before the "end comes," and with regard to these, both Jew and Christian are in danger of being deceived. Thus the Jew may suppose that the terrible judgments denounced against Jerusalem all took place at the siege of Titus; and the Christian may be led into the belief that there will be no further manifestation of a personal Antichrist, because some of his characteristics were indicated in the Popes of Rome. Such words are on a par with those of old who declared that the resurrection was passed already.

TURKEY AND THE JEWS.

Two very striking penultimate events are now in active progress—viz., the diminution of the power and influence of Turkey, and the return of the Jews to Palestine. The former is figuratively pointed out as the "drying up of the river Euphrates," (Rev. 16 : 12), and as the termination of the "second woe." (Rev. 11 : 14.) The recent war in Egypt will in all probability be overruled for weakening Turkey. When Turkish power is clean done away with, or held in harmless abeyance, the way will be cleared for the Jewish occupation of Palestine. It is very important to bear in mind that the return of Israel, or the Ten Tribes, will be a distinct event; and this clearly enunciated fact (see Isaiah 66 : 19, 20) sets at rest the eccentric doctrine, taken up by many, in the restless vagaries in which a section of society is indulging, that the British nation is identical with lost Israel. This separate return of Israel is in accordance with the fact that Israel, as a nation, is not implicated in the crucifixion of Christ, and consequently will not, in the righteous judgments of God, be partakers of the retributive punishment that will be inflicted on the Jews, on whom still rests the blood of Christ by hereditary imprecation. (Matt. 27.)

REBUILDING OF JERUSALEM.

After Judah is gathered, which will be in unbelief, Jerusalem with its temple will be rebuilt, and the position of the Jews among the other nations of the world will become of such political importance, that all nations, and notably Russia, will be gathered against them. (Zech. 14 : 2; Ezek. 39.) The covenant made with the infidel Antichrist will be broken, and terrible events will occur, constituting the last great tribulation, or time of Jacob's trouble. Contemporaneously with these events will be the abstraction from the Gentiles of the misused power divinely given, first to Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. 2 : 37), and afterward to Cyrus (2 Chron. 36 : 23), which is figuratively foretold in the famous dream of Nebuchadnezzar, interpreted by Daniel, in which is described the dashing to pieces of the composite image by the stone cut out without hands, and then filling the whole earth.

THE TEN KINGDOMS.

But in order that this prophecy shall be completely fulfilled, it will be necessary that the ten kingdoms, typified by the ten toes of the image in Daniel, should re-appear distinctly upon the scene, and this we know is in process of development. The concentration of these imminent judgments will be at Jerusalem. The Lord Jesus Christ, attended by His risen and translated Church, will "make His enemies His footstool" (Psalm 110 : 1), and the parabolic "wicked husbandmen" will be miserably destroyed. By the infliction of these judgments Judah will be miraculously delivered from her assailants, and will, like unbelieving Thomas, look upon Him whom they have pierced, and will then repent and believe. After these events, Israel will be gathered from her protracted banishment, and as the two staves "Beauty and Bands" were broken, (Zech. 11 : 14), and afterward joined together, (Ezek. 37 : 20, 21), so Judah and Israel will be united and become the chief nation on the earth. Then the promise to Peter shall be fulfilled: "In the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Discussion of the Tariff Bills Occupied the attention of our legislators in both Houses of Congress again last week. There was conspicuous in both a spirit which the people will not fail to notice, and practically deal with at the proper time. That is the spirit of unmitigated selfishness and subservience to the great monopolies. There is no well-grounded assurance that either of the bills before Congress would afford relief to the heavily taxed people. No one is able to understand the probable result of the changes made, and even experts are divided in opinion as to whether those changes will make the law more or less onerous than at present. Such pitiful schemes are beneath contempt, and the most intelligent and patriotic citizens freely express their hope that neither bill will pass. There has been no broad enlightened effort made to relieve the nation of its burden. Statistics show that last year every man, woman and child in the United States was forced to pay on an average seven dollars under the tariff and internal revenue laws. This too, be it remembered, not to meet the necessities of the government, not to defray extraordinary expenses, but to provide a gigantic surplus for Congressmen to use in such ways as the River and Harbor Bill. The promise of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that a bill should be introduced which would reduce the revenue by seventy-five million dollars has not been kept; and contempt has been shown to the President's recommendation that all the internal taxes except those on distilled spirits should be repealed, and large reductions made from the customs revenue, so as to equalize the public burden among all classes and occupations, and bring it into closer harmony with the present needs of industry, and a simplification effected of the complex and inconsistent schedule of duties upon certain manufactures, particularly those of cotton, iron and steel, and a substantial reduction of duties upon those articles and upon sugar, molasses, silk, wool and woollen goods. The people have taken care that many members of the Forty-seventh Congress shall not sit in the Forty-eighth, and an opinion is becoming increasingly prevalent that not only was that step wise, but that it will have to be repeated before the grievances of the people are recognized and removed.

The Return of the Japanese Indemnity has at length been sanctioned by Congress. The Senate, on February 16th, agreed to the Conference Report. Mr. Morrill referring to the question of interest, made a speech in justification of the amendments to the House bill, adopted on his motion, and attempted to refute the charge that the United States obtained a large sum of money from Japan through false pretences. After reviewing in detail the outrages committed on Americans in Japan, Mr. Morrill said he had come to the conclusion that Japan was not entitled to a return of the original sum of the indemnity, unless we, in a spirit of forgiveness, choose to offer it. Japan having no satisfactory title even to the principle, all questions of interest must at once and forever vanish. Having once voted with the majority of the Senate to return to Japan $785,000, he would do so again, because by the agitation of the subject we had given Japan some reason to expect it from our abounding means and more abounding liberality, and not as a legal or moral right; but he would not vote for any larger sum. Though we have had the use of the money for twenty years, it was decided to return only the original sum.

The Rise of the Ohio River has Involved during the past week suffering that has no parallel in the recent history of the country. In Cincinnati the water on Thursday reached the unprecedented height of sixty-six feet, and the city was in a deplorable condition. Railroad communication was cut off; the gas and water companies were compelled to suspend work; eight square miles of the city were under water, and fifty thousand people homeless or living in the upper stories of their houses without food or fuel. Several lives were lost by the sinking of a freight depot, owing to the ground on which it rested having melted. It is feared too that the rise in the river was so sudden that many persons were drowned in their houses and in the streets before they could escape. From Louisville, Ky., from New Albany, Lafayette, Evansville, and Lawrenceburg, Ind., similar distress is reported. At New Albany alone 1200 houses were washed away. Large sums of money are being sent from all quarters to relieve the wants of the destitute, but the demand is necessarily enormous, and for a long time thousands of dollars will be needed daily to sustain life. The presidents of the exchanges in New York have opened subscription-lists for the relief fund, and the New York Herald has commenced a list of its own, with a contribution of five thousand dollars.

A Sensation in the Star Route Trials was produced on Thursday last by the surrender of Rerdell, the secretary of ex-Senator Dorsey. He was convicted, it will be remembered, by the jury at the previous trial, but as he was evidently the least culpable of the gang, his conviction was quashed by the judge. He has now withdrawn his plea of "not guilty," and pleading guilty threw himself on the mercy of the court. The evidence he gave rendered the case of the government important service. He stated that he had been sent out West by Dorsey, nearly a year before the latter left the Senate, instructed to build stations, houses and stables along the Bismarck and Tongue River route, with the understanding that only every other one was to be used before expedition was ordered. This was soon after the beginning of the contract term, showing apparently that there was a prior understanding with Brady that there should be expedition. On this trip he got petitions for increases under directions from Dorsey. When Rerdell took charge of Dorsey's correspondence, he found among the papers a number of affidavits in blank signed by J. W. Dorsey, the Senator's brother, and J. M. Peck. The parts left blank were those on which the allowances by the Department would be made, statements as to the number of men and horses used on a route, etc. Subsequently Dorsey wanted more affidavits. Rerdell wrote them and sent them to Peck, who lived in New Mexico, and J. W. Dorsey, who lived in Vermont, and they were returned signed. Rerdell told of one petition which was signed by the sub-contractor in blank and filled out by Senator Dorsey himself. Brady was conferred with respecting the ways and means of expediting this route. A paper in Dorsey's writing was produced, in which the name of William Smith was debited with considerable sums of money. William Smith, the witness said, was intended for Brady.

Ex-Governor Edwin D. Morgan's Death on Wednesday, February 14th, closes a very remarkable career. Commencing his life amid scenes of poverty, he worked his way by business sagacity, tact, and industry, to a position of wealth and influence. He was twice elected Governor of the State of New York, and represented the State for one term in the United States Senate. President Arthur invited him to succeed Mr. Windom as Secretary of the Treasury, and though his nomination was unanimously confirmed by the Senate, Mr. Morgan felt it his duty to decline the appointment. Among the public services rendered by the ex-Governor was the effort he made in 1849, when an assistant Alderman of New York, to battle with the epidemic of cholera which ravaged the city. Most of the prominent officials fled in alarm, but Mr. Morgan by his prudence and activity did much to check the spread of the plague. Mr. Morgan was a prominent member of the Brick Presbyterian Church, and his liberality in connection with that denomination was well known. He also gave generously to other institutions. He recently gave $100,000 toward building a library for the Union Theological Seminary. At his funeral on February 16th, the President and General Grant were among the pall bearers, and a large company of our most distinguished citizens attended to do honor to his memory. Ex-Governor Morgan was seventy-two years of age, having been born at Washington, Mass., on February 8th, 1811.

A Terrible Mining Disaster is Reported from Illinois. At the little town of Diamond near Braidwood is one of the Wilmington Coal Company's mines. On February 16th, while three hundred men were at work in the mine there was a great land-slide caused by the floods and the recent thaw. The land around the mine has been transformed into a large lake from one to three feet deep, and when the earth gave way the mine was almost instantly filled. Only the men in the upper workings succeeded in making their escape, and they only by wading through water up to their necks. Seventy-seven men are known to have been drowned, and the whole village is turned into a place of mourning.

An Attempt to Obtain a New Trial in the case on which the Prohibition Amendment was declared invalid is to be made. A despatch from Council Bluffs states that the prohibition amendment, supposed to have been settled some weeks ago by a decision of the Supreme Court adverse to its validity, has been opened by the filing of a petition for rehearing, to be had at a session of that court on March 19th.

A Rehearsal in Full Dress of the Passion Play was to have been held by M. Salmi Morse in New York on Saturday last. Mr. Morse since his failure to induce either Mayor Grace or Mayor Edson to grant a license has instituted legal proceedings to compel the latter official to allow the play to be performed. He is so confident of success that he has continued rehearsing his company, and last week issued a large number of invitations to the public to witness a full-dress rehearsal. About two hours before the time appointed he was served with a notice from police headquarters that the rehearsal would not be allowed to take place. Mr. Morse then announced the postponement of the rehearsal until he has obtained an injunction restraining the police. It may be hoped that he will fail to obtain such an instrument. Even a rehearsal of the piece would be an outrage.

The Use of Tobacco by the Boys in our Public schools has attained startling proportions. Mr. William Stephens, the Principal of a school in Philadelphia, has called the attention of the Board of Education to the subject, in which he says that, of the 50,000 pupils in the public schools of the city, a large proportion use tobacco in various forms, and that the habit has increased to an alarming extent since the cigarette was instituted. Mr. Stephens has prepared and had printed a short statement of the physical and mental disorders produced in children by tobacco, and has pasted it on the inside of the cover of every text-book used in his school.

A New Disinfectant is Recommended by an eminent sanitary authority. It is sulphate of copper or blue vitriol. It was used in a case in which the stoppage of a soil-pipe had caused an overflow, and a consequent saturation of floor-boards, that in time would probably have developed danger by nourishing and developing the germs of bacteria, bacilli, etc., which abound in the air, and are ready to increase and multiply wherever their unsavory food abounds. By simply mopping the floor with a solution of these blue crystals, and allowing it to soak well into the pores of the wood, they (the pores) cease to become a habitat for such microscopic abominations. The copper salt poisons the poisoners. This discovery is very valuable, and may prevent many deaths from typhoid. It is likely to be in much request, for most people understand the dangerous effects of an atmosphere loaded with these deadly germs, and will take prompt measures to prevent it. Would that they were as earnest in endeavoring to purify the moral atmosphere in which they and their children live (Jer. 51 : 9).

A Belated Wedding Fee was Received Recently by a clergyman at Brazil, Indiana. The Rev. T. C. Stewart's mail one morning lately included a letter from an unknown correspondent, who stated that many years before he had been married by Mr. Stewart. At the time the ceremony was solemnized, he was too poor to pay the customary fee to the clergyman, but the marriage had turned out an exceedingly happy one and the man, having prospered abundantly, now sent the clergyman a hundred-dollar bill as an acknowledgment of his services. The writer left it to be inferred that if the marriage had not been happy the clergyman would have received nothing. It would be a curious speculation how much money ministers would receive for celebrating the marriage service, if their remuneration was delayed a few years, and made contingent on the result of the union. There can, however, be no speculation about the result of the union between Christ and the soul—the spiritual bride. That is certain happiness, none ever regretted that union and no gift would be too costly as an expression of gratitude to the instrument employed in bringing it about (Philemon 19).

A Family Pet in a Philadelphia Home has developed into a scourge to the astonishment of those concerned. It appears that a little bull-dog had been brought home by one of the men, and had grown up harmlessly, until it was a very powerful animal, without showing any vicious propensity. On February 14th, however, the sister-in-law of the owner of the bull-dog went into the back-yard, and was shaking a towel when the animal jumped at her and seized her wrist. The woman strove to get free and screamed for assistance, but her cries seemed to excite the brute, who sprang upon her again and threw her to the ground and fought with all the ferocity of a tiger. It was not until a gentleman passing by heard the screams of the woman and struck the dog over the head with a heavy instrument, that he desisted. Then the woman was carried to the house and her wounds, which were very terrible, were dressed. As soon as the owner of the dog came home he had the brute killed, though it did not seem to be mad. The injured woman thinks he attempted to catch the towel and became excited by her screams and by her attempt to shake him off. It is not likely that in that family any more dangerous animals will be received and petted. The incident will also put others on their guard, but it is surprising that with regard to another enemy of domestic life, intoxicating liquor, the ravages it makes in one family do not operate as a warning to others (Prov. 23 : 32).

Training a Young Lady on the Principles of the stable is an experiment that has been tried in Washington. A young lady who retains her vivacity in spite of her regular attendance at receptions, dinners, germans, etc., was recently asked how it was done. She said, "Mamma is a fanatic on that subject. She is bound I shall not look passé at the end of this my second winter. Every night when I get home, no matter how tired I am, a warm bath is given me, after which I drink a bowl of bouillon, and am put to bed in the guest chamber, which is more quiet than my own. In the morning I am not called, but arise when I awake, which is not often before lunch time. It grows monotonous, I assure you, but if I go, I have to submit. I tell mamma she treats me as if I was a race-horse or a prize fighter." It does not need a close acquaintance with fashionable belles to be convinced that some such treatment is necessary to insure the desired result. But if the mothers consulted the highest interest of their daughters, they would withdraw them altogether from the fatiguing pleasures. In the service of God they would find that there is no need for any such restoratives. In that service they would renew their strength (Isa. 40 : 31).

Two Guests of the Same Name at a Hotel in Columbus, O., last week became involved in a dispute about their correspondence. H. G. Chamberlain registered at the hotel as being from Chicago. A short time after H. G. Chamberlain registered there again, this time from Dayton. Then the Chicago man called for the mail addressed to his name, and received four letters. Presently the Dayton man came up and wanted the mail for that name. The clerk began to think a trick was being played, and brought the two gentlemen face to face. The one who had received the correspondence was in perplexity, as two of the letters were totally unintelligible to him, being intended for the other man. It was discovered that both are travelling agents, neither had ever heard of the other, and both happened to arrive at Columbus and in the same hotel at the same time. The incident recalls the remark of an eminent Christian who, dwelling on the blessedness of the word "whosoever" in Rev. 22 : 17, said he was more thankful for the word than if his own name had been put there ; because he felt himself so great a sinner that he would have thought the offer was not for him, but for some other man of the same name. About the word "whosoever" there could be no mistake.

A Ten-Pin Alley was Destroyed in Answer to prayer some time ago, according to a statement recently made in The National Union, of Montgomery, Ala. That journal, in the course of an article, says : "The first stationed Methodist minister in Troy, Ala., was the Rev. Mr. Kelley, who had charge of the church there in 1857. There was in the town a ten-pin alley, which was a great nuisance to the religious and moral portion of the community, and the Rev. Mr. Kelley desired very much to have it abated. He was a very earnest man in prayer—so, one Sabbath morning, he prayed most fervently and devoutly that the Lord would send a wind and blow the ten-pin alley down. Wednesday afternoon following, a wind came and did blow down the house which contained the alley, and immediately ceased, doing no other damage. There has not been a ten-pin alley in the place since then. This is an actual fact, which came under the observation of the writer, and which will be verified by any of the citizens of the place who resided there then and still survive." The circumstance is regarded as very wonderful, but the rarity of such cases is due to the rarity of strong faith, which we are assured is honored by God now as in the former days (Matt. 17 : 20.)

GLADNESS FOR SADNESS.

A New Sermon, by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us, and the years wherein we have seen evil, etc."—Psalm 90 : 15-17.

The Black Bordered Psalm—Trouble as a Shepherd's Dog—The Psalmist's Petition—I. For Proportionate Gladness—Of the Same Origin—The Law of Equilibrium—The Thane's Parable—Troubles Carrying Silver Trumpets—Sorrow a Preparation for Joy—The Husk of Joy—II. For Peculiar Gladness—Fourfold—At the Sight of God's Work—At the Revelation of God—The Children—At Beauty Bestowed—At Work Established—The Wounded Chaplain at Gettysburg—Successful Work—Lasting Work.

To understand this psalm you must observe its black border. Remember the sorrows of Moses, the man of God, who saw a whole generation die in the wilderness, and was himself denied admission to the promised land. The man Moses was greatly afflicted ; I might almost call him, as far as his life in the wilderness was concerned, "A man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." He digged the desert till it became a cemetery, for he lived amid forty years of funerals. This Ninetieth Psalm is saturated with the griefs of by whom it could be truly said, "We are consumed by thine anger, and by thy wrath are we troubled."

We have in our own case as a church and people a double black border to surround our text this morning ; for death has despoiled us a second time. We were last Wednesday burying our honored deacon, William Higgs, and at the moment of our meeting for that solemn purpose another greatly esteemed deacon, William Mills,* was on a sudden stricken down with paralysis, to linger for a few hours and then to breathe out his soul unto God. I shall not trust myself to speak about him, for this double loss has to a great extent unnerved me ; but this I must say, that he was an experienced and mature Christian, and withal a quiet, diligent, loving, gracious servant of our common Master, whose care was the poor of the church, to whom he distributed our alms with discretion and tenderness.

It was pleasant to hear from him the story of his Christian experience. His was a calm and lowly walk. Of late, being weakly, he was much at home, and there the Psalms of David, and the Morning and Evening Portions were his comfort. He was always a source of strength to his pastor and his brethren, always of great service to the church, far more so than the mass of our people will ever know ; but of late he ripened and mellowed into an unusual sweetness and spirituality. My last interview with him gave me a high idea of his thorough composure, and his perfect preparedness to commune with the glorified host above. He is gone—gone happily and safely home. He had no pain or struggle, but gradually melted into life eternal.

To us who remain one sorrow has succeeded to another, to keep our wound bleeding and smarting. How well did Moses pray, "Return, O Lord, how long? and let it repent thee concerning thy servants." Oh, that our God would no more put His hand into as Herbert calls it, but now change His dispensation and revive the spirit of His contrite ones. On our part, as we are made to sympathize with the man of God in this psalm, so let us imitate his example. Like him in multiplied bereavements, let us be like him in grace and faith.

Observe, that the first word of this painful psalm is, "Lord, thou hast been our dwelling place" ; as if, touched by the rod, the sufferer remembered his Father. Will the hypocrite always call upon God? Nay, but when God dealeth roughly with him he will kick against the pricks. But the child of God when he is

* William Mills, Esq., for many years a beloved deacon of the church in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, was taken to his rest January 12th, 1883, at the age of sixty-two.

smitten turns to the hand that smote him, and cries, "Show me wherefore Thou contendest with me?" If foxes and wolves are prowling about, and appears, they fly hither and thither as far away as they can; but when the dog is sent after the sheep he fetches them back to the shepherd. Trouble drives away the carnal man from his pretended religion; but it gathers the true sheep together, and, being aroused and alarmed, they seek the Good Shepherd. The more of grief we feel the more of grace we need, and the nearer to our Comforter we come. Closer to God! is the cry of the troubled saint.

"Nearer, my God, to thee!
Nearer to thee!
E'en though it be a cross
That raiseth me;
Still all my cry shall be,
Nearer, my God, to thee!
Nearer to thee!"

Obseve also that this psalm is "a prayer of Moses;" the comfort of a child of God in the darkness is prayer. Adversity, blessed of the Holy Spirit, calls our attention to the promise; the promise quickens our faith; faith betakes itself to prayer; God hears and answers our cry. This is the chain of a tried soul's experience. Brethren, as we suffer the tribulation, as we know the promise, let us immediately exercise faith, and turn in prayer to God; for surely never did a man turn to God but the Lord also turned to him. If we are set a-praying we may depend upon it the Lord is set on blessing. Blessings are on the way from heaven—their shadow falls upon us even now. I desire at this time to stir you up to a joyful expectancy. These clouds mean rich, refreshing showers. These sharp frosts foretell heavy sheaves. The Lord by the divine Spirit make the words of our text to be our prayer this morning! May the Lord Jesus present our supplication to the Father.

The petition seems to me to be, first, for proportionate gladness: "Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us, and the years wherein we have seen evil." And, secondly, our prayer is for peculiar gladness, a gladness which is described in the sixteenth and seventeenth verses: "Let thy work appear unto thy servants, and thy glory unto their children. And let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us: and establish thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it."

I. First, then, beloved friends, our prayer this morning as a church and people should be for that our God who has filled one scale with grief would fill the other scale with grace till they balance each other. Inasmuch as He has poured out of His vial certain drops of wormwood, we pray Him to measure out the like quantity of the consolation of love, whereby our hearts shall be comforted. May our covenant God, who has chastened us heavily, now revive us graciously.

We begin here by noticing that evidently the prayer desires a gladness of the same origin as the sadness. The psalm plainly ascribes the sadness to the Lord: "Thou turnest man to destruction; and sayest, Return, ye children of men." "We are consumed by thine anger, and by thy wrath are we troubled." God is seen in bereavements; death comes distinctly at His command; second causes are left behind. Since we have a distinct idea that the sadness comes from God, our text expresses an equally distinct desire that the gladness may come from God.

The prayer is full of buoyant hope; for it does not merely say, "Comfort us; bear us up; keep our heads above water; prevent us from sinking in despair:" no; but "Make us glad." Reverse our state; lift us up from the depths to the heights. "Make us glad!" I hear the music of hope drowning the discord of fear; the songs of a joyous faith rising above the mournful dirges of grief.

The appeal is to the Lord alone. Moses entreats Jehovah Himself to kindle the lamps of joy within the tabernacles of Israel. It is healthy sadness which the Lord sends, and it is equally safe gladness which God gives. If we make ourselves merry we may be mere mimics of mirth; if outward goods make us merry we may be no better than the rich fool in the parable; but if our God makes us glad we may take our fill of delight, and fear no ill consequences. The wine of the Kingdom cheers, but never intoxicates; the bread of God strengthens, but never surfeits.

But now notice that a proportion is insisted upon: "Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us, and the years wherein we have seen evil." This is an original prayer, full of thought and hope. Truly also it is a philosophical prayer; one which is in accordance with the harmonies of nature, and consonant with all the ways of God. I have been told on the Scotch lakes that the depth of the lake is almost always the same as the height of the surrounding hills; and I think I have heard that the same is true of the great ocean; so that the greatest depth is probably the same as the greatest height. Doubtless, is manifest in a thousand ways. Take an instance in the adjustment of days and nights. A long night reigns over the north of Norway; in these wintry months they do not even see the sun; but mark and admire their summer; then the day banishes the night altogether, and you may read your Bible by the light of the midnight sun. Long wintry nights find compensation in a perpetual summer day. There is a balance about the conditions of the peoples of differing lands; each country has its drawbacks and its advantages. I believe it is so with the life of God's people; therein also the Lord maintains a balance.

The good Lord measures out the dark and the light in due proportions, and the result is life sad enough to be safe, and glad enough to be desirable. I do not believe that our mortal life is fitly set forth by when he said to the Saxon king, "Hast thou marked, O king, when thou art sitting in thy hall, and the fires are lit, and the lamps are burning, how the sparrow comes flying out of the thick darkness, passes through the window, glides into the bright and cheerful light, and then flits out again into the darkness? Such is our life—an interval of light amid a long darkness." It is not so. If a believer flits out of the light he glides into the light again; if we traverse a stretch of darkness we may expect an equal breadth of brightness. If to-day we sail a stormy main we may hope to-morrow that the sea will be as glass. We have our changes, but the preponderance of life is not to misery. Rainy days are many, and yet in the long run they are outnumbered by the seasons of fair weather. God makes us glad according to the days wherein He has afflicted us, and the years wherein we have seen evil.

Now, if it be so, that our gladness and our sadness are balanced, let us accept them by turns with gratitude. Let us notice, further, that sorrow is the herald of joy. Did I not tell you but a few Sabbath-days ago how I sat in health and strength and joy in the olive-gardens, and said to my friend:

"We should expect some danger nigh
When we perceive too much delight."

The apprehension was soon justified, as it has often been; but let us not forget the other side of this truth—we may expect some mercy nigh when we are bowed with heaviest grief. Among the ashes of sorrow we shall find live coals of joy. Grief is God's usher of the black rod, sent to intimate that in the majesty of His grace the Lord is drawing near to us. Troubles come clothed in black; but to the eye of faith they carry silver trumpets, and they proclaim the approach of great mercies. God is hastening in the richness of His favor to bless His children; sorrow is the outrider of joy.

A step further, and we have it thus,

SORROW PREPARES FOR JOY.

It might not be safe, dear brother, that you should enjoy worldly prosperity at the outset of life. Your adversities in business are meant to teach you the worthlessness of earthly things, so that when you have them you may not be tempted to make idols of them. I am persuaded that many men have been ruined by rising suddenly to fame and power; had they at first been abused and trodden down like mire in the streets, their spirits might have been hardened to endure that sharpest of all tests, namely, human honor; for "as the fining pot for silver, and the furnace for gold; so is a man to his praise." You are not ready yet, dear brethren, to bear the weight of an elevated superstructure; you must be dug out first, and a deep foundation must be laid to bear a lofty building. In the spiritual life God does not run us up with glittering virtues all of a sudden; but deep prostration of spirit and thorough humiliation prepare the under-courses; and then, afterward, stone upon stone, as with rows of jewels, we are built up to be a palace for the indwelling of God.

Once again, let me say to you, dear friends, there is such a connection between sorrow and joy that no saint ever has a sorrow but what it has a joy wrapped up in it. It is a rough oyster, but a pearl lies within those shells if you will but look for it. Do not think I mock at grief by saying that it is far from it, I would console grief by asserting solemnly that within the black envelope of affliction there is a precious love-token from God; be sure of that. We find the treasure of communion with Christ in the earthen vessel of sorrow. We ask to have fellowship with Jesus in His sufferings; and we cannot do so except we suffer. It is a joy to remember in our woe that by these things we are made like unto our Lord, and conformed unto His image. If there were only this comfort it might suffice to sweeten every suffering.

Once more, the day will come when all the sorrows of God's sending will be looked upon as joys. Hear ye this! By some strange alchemy, known only to "the King eternal, immortal, invisible," our sorrows shall be turned into joys. Ye see this in your own homes—I quote it because it is the Lord's own metaphor—a woman when she is in travail hath sorrow because her hour is come; but soon she remembereth no more her travail, for joy that a man is born into the world. Our troubles and travails are sharp, but they will all be forgotten in the joy that will come of them. Before we enter heaven we shall thank God for most of our sorrow; and when we are once in glory we shall thank Him for it all.

II. Bear with me while I come to the second part of my subject, which I desire to make eminently practical. The gladness desired is PECULIAR GLADNESS.

The Psalmist wishes for a fourfold gladness: the first is gladness at the sight of God's work.

Notice: "thy work." There is always something cheering in God's work. Have you never felt it so? I think you must have done so. When Mungo Park was cheered by that little bit of moss which he picked up in the wilderness, he was but comforted as many of us have been. The flowers of the garden, the wild beauties of the wood, the chance tufts by the roadside, are all God's work, and, therefore, breathe consolation to God's servants. A certain Persian nobleman found himself surrounded by soldiers, who sought to take him prisoner; he drew his sword and fought right valiantly, and might have escaped had not one of the company said, "The king has sent us to convey you to himself." He sheathed his sword at once. Yes, we can contend against what we call a misfortune; but when we learn that the Lord hath done it, our contest is ended, for we joy and rejoice in what the Lord doeth; or, if we cannot get the length of rejoicing in it, we acquiesce in His will. This is our song:

"I would not contend with thy will,
Whatever that will may decree;
But oh, may each trial I feel Unite me more fondly to thee."

The next consolation is also a very rich one—gladness at the revelation of God to our children; "and thy glory unto their children." If our God will but make His glory to be seen by our children, what more can we ask? "I have no greater joy than this, that my children walk in the truth." No better comfort can be found for bereaved mothers than to see their sons and daughters converted. There is a sorrow for those who have departed; but I could almost say, "Weep not for the dead, neither bewail them," for there is a sharper grief by far, and that is our anxiety for those who survive, and yet are dead unto God.

Did you ever see a chain-gang of convicts marching to their labor? I could wish never to see the sad scene again. Suppose that among those convicts there was a boy of yours! Ah me! Ah me! it were better for you that he had never been born. But think of those who are prisoners in the chains of sin. Is there a boy or girl of yours in such bonds? Oh, then, I am sure you will pray the Lord to rescue you from so sharp a trial, and to set your sons and daughters free from the fetters of iniquity. Pray ye each one fervently, "O Lord, let thy glory as their emancipator appear to my children, and then do what Thou wilt."

Did you ever visit a condemned cell? To peep through the gate and to see a man sitting there condemned to die is enough to make one faint. Suppose it were your boy! Suppose it were your husband! Suppose it were your brother! But listen: "He that believeth not is condemned already." Pardon us, dear unconverted relatives, if we say that we feel more sorrow for you living than we do for our gracious ones who are dead; for yours is a terrible plight, to be even now sitting in the condemned cell, doomed to be taken out to execution before long, unless infinite mercy shall grant a free pardon.

Did you hear of

wherein there were many guests, and they were in the upper story, and the flames had grasped the whole edifice, so that numbers perished? It must be dreadful to see persons at the upper windows of a burning house, and to be powerless to rescue them. But if your child were there, your boy, your girl, or if your husband or your wife were there, or even if any one you knew were there, your grief would have a double sting about it, and you would cry, "Lord, do what thou wilt with me, but do save those precious lives." Remember, then, that your ungodly friends are in a like condition, and what greater mercy can God bestow upon you than for Him to make His glory to be seen by your children in their eternal salvation?

Therefore I turn your thoughts to that prayer. May you breathe it now, and may the Lord, for Christ's sake, answer it right speedily—"Let thy glory appear unto our children."

The third consolation which Moses here describes is gladness at beauty bestowed—"Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us." Sorrow mars the countenance and clothes the body with sackcloth; but if the Lord will come to us and adorn us with His beauty, then the stains of mourning will speedily disappear. Brethren, what a beauty is this which the Lord giveth—"the beauty of the Lord our God!" This comeliness is the beauty of His grace; for our covenant God is the God of all grace. If the Lord makes us to know that we are His our faces shine. If He fills us with His life and love, then brightness flashes from the eyes, and there is a grace about every movement.

The last comfort that Moses speaks of is gladness at our own work being established—"Establish thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it." Do you notice the wonderful blending in the fifteenth and seventeenth verses; there it is, "Let thy work appear unto thy servant;" here it is "Let our work be established." Alas, I have heard divines rightly say that salvation is God's work, and then they have harshly added that, in our preaching of the Gosepl, we make it out to be our own work. Thus they speak hard things against us, and their speech is not after the Lord's mind. Others, again, make out this work to be so much man's work that God is forgotten. Neither of these is correct; we must blend the two; to build up the church and win souls for Jesus is first of all God's work, and then our work.

Our work is often a very effectual means of comfort to us.

ON THE BATTLE-FIELD OF GETTYSBURG

there had been a terrible fight, and among the wounded lay a certain chaplain of the name of Eastman, who had been seriously injured in the back by his horse falling upon him. The dark and dreary night came on, and as he lay there in intense pain, unable to rise, he heard a voice at a little distance cry, "O God!" His interest was excited, and he rolled himself over and over through pools of blood, and among the slain, till he reached the side of the dying man, and there lay, talking of Jesus and His free salvation. The man expired in hope, and just then two soldiers came and told Eastman that a captain was dying a little further down the field, and they must carry him there; so he was borne in anguish upon the work of mercy, and while the night wore on he spoke of Jesus to many dying men. Could he have had a surer relief from his pain? I think not. Why, it seems to me that to lie there on his back with nothing to do but moan and groan would have been horrible; but in all his pain and anguish to be carried about to proclaim mercy to dying men made the anguish of an injured back endurable! So is it when you miss a friend, or have lost property, or are heavy in spirit, you shall find your surest comfort in serving God with all your might.

The text prays for our work that it may succeed: "Establish thou the work of our hands." Oh, if God will but prosper us in our work for Him how happy we shall be! One day this week I had a great lift up out of deep distress when I was informed that a captain was here last Sunday morning, and was so impressed that he found the Saviour, and made the fact known at one of the noonday prayer-meetings, asking for himself that he might be kept faithful to his God. This is good. We do not always see our seed grow so quickly as that. It is wet weather just now, the damp of sorrow is on all things, and so the seed sown in tears is speedily reaped in joy. Is not this something to comfort us? Let us pray God to send us more of it, that by conversions our work may prosper.

Then we pray that our work may be lasting—that is the chief point. I look forward to the future of this church with prayerful, hopeful anxiety! I am not old, not very old at any rate; but I am not all that I was in my earlier days, and mistrust whispers that soon things will decline. The other day a certain great preacher said that after a preacher had been for a while in a place all the heroism, all the earnestness, all the fervor which characterizes new efforts would be gone, and the best thing would be to disband the church, and let them begin again under a new leader. That may look like a practical idea; but I do not quite see it; nor does it commend itself to me as sound and true. If a church is man's work it is dependent upon a man, and when he is gone the best thing we can do with it is to let it dissolve; but I desire to see built up on this spot, by God's hand, a church which will endure till the coming of the Lord.

I long that the truth which I have preached may be established in the earth. They say that Calvinism is at a great discount now; perhaps it is. Yet to me it seems that its free grace spirit is far more spread than ever, and is quietly saturating all true evangelical preaching. If it be so, that the doctrines of grace are now despised, we still hope that we shall live to see them brought to the front again, or, if not, we shall leave behind us such a testimony that in years to come the Gospel of the grace of God will be read by thousands.

God will comfort Zion, He will comfort all her waste places; but we must each one take pleasure in her stones, and favor the dust thereof. Close up your ranks. Leave no empty spaces. Let every man stand closer to his fellow; and then "Forward!" Forward to a fuller consecration and a braver faith in God. Forward to more grace and higher holiness; so shall we wipe away our tears, and praise the name of the Lord; and He will remember us, and by a plenitude of blessing make up to us all that we have lost. A blessing is coming! Be ready for it! Amen.

THREE LADY MISSIONARIES TO CHINA.

THE three ladies whose portraits appear on page 124 have gone to China to labor for Christ under the auspices of the China Inland Mission. The origin of this Mission and details of its work, which is carried on without any regular source of income, and in sole dependence for its support on the care of God, have been described in a previous number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (January 26th, 1882).

In explaining the need existing in China for female agency, the secretary of the Mission said at a meeting held to bid farewell to the three lady missionaries: "What about the women of China? In three of the western provinces there are seven ladies in connection with this mission now engaged in Christian work. They are the only foreign ladies in that part of China, the Chinese in that region having probably never seen a woman of any other nationality than their own. These three provinces contain a population of thirty-six millions, so that there are probably eighteen millions of women and girls, to whom these seven ladies have gone to tell of the love of God, in the gift of His Son—to 'tell it out among the heathen that the Lord is King.'

"Two of these ladies have been able to travel in safety to a distant station with only a Chinese escort, and they are now working happily. Our Mission has now stations in eleven provinces, and it is hoped that stations will be opened in other provinces this year. There are seventy-three missionaries in connection with this Mission, beside the three who are now going out. More than 1000 Chinese have been baptized, and many have passed away having received the Gospel message.

"The Mission is undenominational in the best sense of the word, and therefore it welcomes any one who is called to the work and is qualified for it, from whatever section of the Church they may come. How has the work been sustained? Simply by faith, for the missionaries go out without any promise of income, trusting in God for the supplies, which have, however, come through this society. God has honored this trust, and supplied their need."

then rose and said: "Just before our blessed Saviour left this earth, He said to His disciples, and herefore to us: 'Ye shall be witnesses unto Me, both in Jerusalem and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth.' He did not confine His witnesses to Jerusalem, but He says: 'Ye shall be My witnesses . . . to the uttermost parts of the earth.' We have heard this message from our Saviour, and we are about to respond to His command. We receive the commission from our God alone, although we are sent by this Mission. We would not go to China unless we felt the Lord needed us there. The people there are bowing down to idols—are giving idols their confidence, their thoughts, and their attention ; they are taking the place that our blessed Saviour ought to occupy, and it behoves all who love the Lord Jesus to witness against idolatry in every form and shape.

"But what are we to witness? 'That which we have seen and heard,' that we testify in Jesus Christ. Six years ago I was brought to a saving knowledge of Jesus Christ as my Saviour. It may interest you a little to know what led to that blessed knowledge. I was one day invited to attend a Wesleyan chapel, as there was a new minister to preach there. It was during that service that my heart was touched. Before that I do not remember having any serious thoughts at all, but then I thought, 'How far I am from God! what a distance I feel from Him! how shall I get near?' I do not remember anything that was said ; but my heart was touched ; my conscience was awakened ; I was alarmed and aroused, nor did I find rest till I found it in Jesus Christ.

"I have never had a shadow of doubt since that time. The sunshine of God's countenance has always been with me. It has not been darkness ; it has always been light in the Lord. I gave myself wholly to the Lord ; I could not do otherwise. The love of Christ constrained me to do this, and I feel His service to be one of unspeakable joy. With this spirit in my heart I am going to China—not in doubt, not in fear, not in trembling, although conscious of my own weakness ; I know on whom I have to lean, and am persuaded that He is able to keep me and all that I have committed unto Him."

said : "Dear friends, to-night I thank God for all the loving and merciful way He has led me. It is four years since God called me to the saving knowledge of His truth. Previous to that for many years I had been a communicant in the Episcopal Church, and a Sunday-school teacher ; but I had been seeking to establish my own righteousness, thinking to be saved by works as well as faith. But I bless God that He led me gently on, and I can thank Him to-night that these words of His came home in power to my soul, 'The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us'—cleanseth me—'from all sin.'

"When I was about fourteen years of age, I attended several missionary meetings in connection with the Episcopal Church, and my interest was aroused then. I can remember especially one time being touched by hearing of the persecutions of the Christians under the Queen of Madagascar, and prayed that some day God would send me out. I was then unconverted. Years went on, and the teaching in which I was engaged I thought to be my life work ; but God has not forgotten my prayers, and He was gently and in His own way preparing the way for my going out ; and now to-night I do thank Him with all my heart that He has called me, though so unworthy and so weak, to take this knowledge of Himself to the millions of China.

"And, dear friends, while you pray for us, while you uphold us in your prayers that we may be great blessings in China, will you not remember that every month a million die in that land who have never heard of Jesus. The women of China, so down-trodden, leading such unhappy lives, with no bright prospect in the future to cheer them, no thought of a bright home, a loving Father, and a kind Saviour—are not your hearts touched with pity?"

said : "Dear Christian friends, as I stand here to-night, I can say most truly that the Lord's goodness and mercy have followed me all the days of my life. I do not know where nor how I can look back, because I can feel the truth of that precious word, 'I have loved thee with an everlasting love ;' therefore I cannot begin and tell you, as it were, where and when the hour of my decision for Christ began. He first of all gave me a good father and mother—parents who loved Him, and tried to do their best to bring up their children to love and to honor Jesus.

"When I was thirteen years old I heard Mr. Griffith John speak of China, and the Chinese lay very heavy upon my heart. However, I felt rather afraid of going to China, because I thought the Lord would want those better educated than I was, and in every way more qualified for the missionary work, so that I hardly thought of having the privilege of ever going to China.

"Since that time I have had a great many strong desires to go as a missionary for Jesus Christ to the heathen, but I could not see my way clear, because I thought I was not worthy to have such a work given me ; but it has pleased God to call the weak things of this world to do His work, so that He alone may be glorified. About three years ago I heard a sermon on these words in Ezekiel, 'I will make them and the places round about My hill a blessing, and I will cause the shower to come down in his season ; there shall be showers of blessing,' and I could not but yield myself entirely to the guiding hand of God. If it were His will that I should go as a missionary I felt I was ready to go. My way was blocked up many times, and I thought it almost useless to think of it ; but I could not give up when I thought of the millions dying without the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, and thinking also of how Jesus Christ had commanded His disciples to go and preach His Word among all nations, Himself promising to be with them. When I remembered also that, though I was unfit for so high a calling, He was willing to give strength to those who work for Him, and that He was giving His Spirit also without measure, I could not but apply to the China Inland Mission.

"The Lord has now very kindly opened the way for me to go and tell among the millions of my sisters in China of how God loves them, and what manner of love the Father has bestowed on them and us in the gift of His only, His well-beloved Son. We are here to-night, dear friends, to ask you to remember us in your prayers—that we may be faithful servants of the Cross, and preach nothing among the Chinese but Christ and Him crucified, and tell it among the Chinese that 'the Lord is King.'"

WIDOW SELKIRK'S GUEST.

WIDOW SELKIRK sat in her trim little parlor knitting. Her work for the day was all "done up" an hour ago. The cottage was as clean and tidy as hands could make it, and she intended to have spent the summer afternoon and evening in her garden, but it began to rain heavily and she went into the parlor and sat down to knit. Her family Bible, out of which the good deacon, her husband, now lying in the village graveyard, used to read morning and evening, was propped up open before her on the table, and she read as she worked.

"I have been young and now am old, yet have I never seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging bread. He is ever merciful, and lendeth ; and his seed is blessed." That was the passage the widow was reading, and she could add her testimony to that of the Psalmist. Years ago it seemed as if she would have to beg her bread ; but God had cared for her, she was able to earn her bread, and her two sons were both good boys, growing up to manhood, and regularly sent her a portion of their wages from the city that she might enjoy the little luxuries she had been accustomed to in the deacon's lifetime. Then too she sometimes received a boarder, and so was able to add a little in that way to the store laid aside against a rainy day, and to give to others poorer than she. The boarders' parlor was empty just now, but it was never empty long, for her little cottage was a favorite resort for invalids who desired a quiet and cleanly retreat.

As the widow sat reading, she heard a step on the gravel, and then a knock at the door. She rose and opened it and, standing there in the rain, she saw a young stranger without umbrella and almost wet through. Pointing to the little card hanging in the window with which the widow used to advertise her vacant room, he said he would like to engage it.

The widow hesitated. It was not her habit to admit strangers under her roof. She was unprotected, and she liked to know something of the people who came to her for board, lest any evil-disposed man should take advantage of her hospitality and do her mischief. As she stood drawing her apron slowly through her fingers, an attitude those who knew her were aware indicated an inward debate, she passed in review the circumstances. The stranger looked sick and he was very wet, and he looked respectable, yet—

"I should be very glad," he said, "to find a shelter in your cottage. I need quiet badly, and this pitiless rain is soaking my clothes. I cannot give you references as no one knows me in these parts, but I will pay you the rent for two weeks in advance, and you will find me a very quiet tenant."

Widow Selkirk's heart melted before his importunity, and she accepted him as her tenant. He had no luggage, not even a parcel, and the widow urged him to go to bed while his clothes were dried. He accepted her advice thankfully, and was soon at rest in the little bed-room, and lay watching the rain as it beat against the window until he fell asleep. Two hours later he awoke refreshed, and found his clothes dried and lying beside his bed. He arose and dressed and descended to find a tea-table temptingly set out in the little room below.

"Is that a Bible you are reading?" he said later in the evening, as the widow sat at a table opposite him, where a shaded lamp was placed.a

"Yes," said the widow, "I always read chapter or two at night before I go to bed. It comforts me, and in my time I have had need of comfort."

"So have I," said the stranger, "and I have found it in the same place. Will you read a little to me? and we will pray together afterward."

The widow consented willingly enough, and rejoiced that the stranger she had admitted could appreciate the things of God which had sustained her in her affliction. It was evident from his prayer that he was a Christian, and one whose experience of the world had been hard.

The next morning when the stranger descended, the widow was struck by his emaciated countenance which she had not noticed the previous evening. The man was ill; that was clear, and she asked him if he did not feel sick. But he made light of it, said it was "only a cold resulting from his yesterday's exposure," "A little rest would make all right."

The Widow Hesitated to Receive a Stranger.

But the prophecy did not come true, and before night he consented to receive a visit from the village surgeon. That worthy pronounced the disease pneumonia, and said the patient would have a bad time. The stranger was not distressed by the news, but calling the widow to him after the doctor was gone, he placed in her hands his pocket-book, and told her to use its contents, about two hundred dollars, to pay all expenses.

He grew worse that night, and the next day, and on the following day the doctor said there was no hope of his life. Then the widow besought him to allow her to send for his friends.

"You are very good," he said, in a voice broken by gasps, "but I have no friends who could come. I am alone in the world. I should like to die and be buried in this peaceful place."

There was a tone of sadness and weariness in the words that went to the widow's heart. Without consulting him she sent for the clergyman who promptly responded to the call. After learning all she knew, the good man entered the sick room and introduced himself to the sufferer.

There was no need for religious consolation. The dying man was willing and ready to die. But the clergyman endeavored to learn something of his history, and that was difficult. The young man said briefly that he was too weak for that. He had no name, no father, no mother. A deserted infant, he had been cared for at a charitable institution, and had grown up in ignorance of his origin. His life for many years had been sinful, but God had in mercy visited him, and he had learned the way of salvation. Since then in poverty he had trusted in God, and after a time had prospered. But thrown out of work by a fire, and weak from over-exertion, he was making his way on foot to another city, when he passed through the village and found a refuge in Widow Selkirk's cottage. That was all he would tell, and then he would talk no more, save of the heaven to which he was going. To him the change would be a very happy one. "I am going home," he said. "I have never had a home. I shall see my Father in heaven. I have never known a father on earth. God has been very kind to me all my life. He has given me all I needed, and when the time came for me to die, He directed my steps to a peaceful spot where I may die with kind Christian hearts around me. Yes, when I was forsaken He took me up. It is all for the best. I am glad to go."

The next day he died rejoicing, eager to enter the abode his faith saw before him. By his direction the place in the village cemetery in which his body was laid is marked by a stone, on which was inscribed a stranger's testimony to God's faithfulness to His promise. "When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up" (Psa. 27 : 10).

TRUE, THOUGH TRIED.

A Tale of the Seventeenth Century.

By Marie Hall.

The Picture in the Chapel.

REBECCA was devotedly attached to her mistress, but this day it seemed as if the maid had lost her usual dexterity, and was engrossed with her own thoughts. She lingered over her mistress's toilet until Margaret grew impatient.

"Are you sick, or is anything troubling you?" she asked, in a kindly tone.

"Oh, no, my lady; I am well enough; but I heard something to-day that I think I ought to tell you."

But Margaret was now ready to descend, and telling her maid that she would hear her news another time, she soon joined her uncle's guests, and the subject passed from her mind.

It was late when she retired to rest, and it is probable she would not have thought again of the girl's strange behavior, had not Rebecca's unusual silence recalled the circumstance. Always ready to sympathize, Margaret kindly asked what had happened. The maid hesitated.

"I don't know that it will do any good to mention it; but still I thought you had best know."

"Why? Is it anything that concerns me, Rebecca?" asked Margaret, with a sinking heart.

"After all, it may be a mistake; but I don't think it can be. You know, Mistress Margaret, that Phœbe, the dairy-maid, is a Catholic, and goes to Lyndhurst every Sabbath afternoon, to see her priest, and say prayers to the Virgin. Well, this morning, as I was gathering some herbs for the cook, Phœbe was standing by the door of the kitchen garden, talking to Reuben, and said :

" 'What think you, Reuben? They have gotten a new altar-piece in the chapel of our blessed lady, and 'tis as like the picture of our young mistress that hangs in the gallery yonder as two peas.' "

" Is that the end of your story?" asked Margaret ; thinking that of course, the dairy-maid was under some mistake, but nevertheless disturbed in mind.

With divided attention, Sir Gilbert's niece assisted in doing the honors of the house during the following week, each day seeming longer than the last to the restless young entertainer. At length the company departed, and that very evening Margaret put her resolution into practice. Telling her aunt that she was going for a long walk, the maiden set off, to ascertain for herself how Phœbe had come to make such a statement. Lyndhurst was a village some three miles from Deerham, the property of a high family, who had lately become violent Catholics. This day chanced to be a special feast-day in honor of the Virgin ; and a large number of people, rich and poor, from the neighborhood around had gathered there for vespers. It was seven o'clock, and the bell was still tolling, when Margaret entered the park at Lyndhurst.

Margaret was by no means insensible to the power of beauty, whether of sight or sound ; but a feeling of intense sadness oppressed her as she followed the throng up the steps and across the marble floor into the little chapel of the Virgin. With her hood drawn over her face, the maiden stood in the shadow of a pillar, and thought herself unseen and unobserved ; but a pair of evil eyes recognized her in the park, followed her stealthily and wonderingly into the building, and were now watching her every movement.

The service began. A Latin hymn was sung, and then prayers, also in the Latin tongue, were said by a priest in gorgeous and cumbrous garments. The atmosphere grew heavy with the fumes of incense, as an acolyte swung the censer to and fro. The strangeness of her position, the fear of discovery, and the novelty of the scene, had driven from the simple Puritan's mind the real and only reason for her presence there. A deep sigh startled her : and bending forward, she saw a middle-aged woman on her knees. She seemed absorbed in devotion ; her hands were clasped, her head thrown back, and her eyes were fixed in worshipful adoration upon some object above the altar. Margaret's eyes involuntarily followed the direction of the woman's gaze, and there, now lit up by innumerable tapers, was a picture of herself.

With difficulty she suppressed a cry of indignation. There was no mistaking it. She rapidly glanced over every detail. One addition had been made, and Margaret's cheeks tingled as she noted it ; there was a circlet of glory round the head, that distinguished it from the portrait hanging in Sir Gilbert's gallery. She turned again to the woman ; and as that enraptured look again met her view, she sank on the ground beside the pillar in an agony of shame, horror, and self-abasement. Large, hot tears burst from her closed eyelids, and rolled down her cheeks, burning with holy indignation. Presently there was a rustle and movement among the little congregation ; a prayer was being offered to the Virgin, and priest and people were prostrating themselves before the altar. The prayer ended, and from a little band of singers a triumphant song of praise burst ; the censer was swung until the spicy vapors arose in misty clouds to the vaulted roof of the place. Margaret shuddered, and covering her ears, murmured :

" Let me not hear such blasphemy ! Father, forgive me for being a witness of this idolatry. Oh, pardon these poor misguided souls, and enlighten their darkness !" So prayed the Puritan girl, and for a moment she hated and loathed her own fair face. If she had been cursed and mocked openly, in her own person, she might have borne it ; but for her image to take the place of her crucified Redeemer's—under the name of the Virgin—it pierced her heart.

Again she lifted her head ; the service seemed over ; the priest was crossing himself before the altar ; and as the people slowly retired, one by one they also turned and bowed themselves. A sudden resolve made Margaret start from the ground. Yes, it must be done, come what would.

In the shadow of the pillar she stood, until the place seemed deserted by all. Glancing round, she did not, however, see a figure standing within the confessional. Trembling in every limb, but with steadfast face and unwavering determination, the maiden crossed the chapel to the foot of the altar. Most of the tapers had been extinguished ; but two or three wax lights, and the lamp that was kept perpetually burning, faintly lit up the scene. Beautiful wreaths of freshly gathered flowers lay there, and Margaret felt as if the innocent blossoms had been degraded. But there must be no delay—some one might return ; so, seizing a stool near at hand, she lightly stepped upon the altar, with one of the lighted tapers in her hand. Again she paused : but there, to dissipate any doubts, was Myers' name in full, and a very recent date. Margaret thought of the miniature Captain Butler had shown her, and the remembrance animated her courage.

The deed was soon done ; in a few seconds the altar-piece was ruined. Singed and defaced, no one could have guessed what had been painted there. The maiden regained the floor ; taper and stool were both replaced ; and two or three moments afterward she was once more in the free air, and walked on quickly, until she regained the highway. Then she leaned against the gate, exhausted with many contending emotions. Still she must not give way now, nor must she linger, for the sun was sinking fast ; and on she went, longing for the solitude of her own chamber, where she might calmly think over what she had done.

The figure of a man emerged from the door of the confessional. It was none other than Captain Butler himself, the man whose love she had rejected, and whose vanity she had wounded to the quick ; and now she was in his power, though as yet she did not know it.

Muttering oaths and execrations, the captain had sense and cunning enough to escape Margaret's notice, and to become a witness of her pious wrath.

" So that is what you crept in here for, my scornful lady. I shall have sweet revenge, yet. Ha ! ha !" and he chuckled as he examined the destruction effected. " You thought you were not seen. You should look into the corners, Margaret Desborough, before you destroy church property. We shall see how your pride will sustain you when the authorities know how ill you have treated their Virgin."

With a wicked leer on his face, Captain Butler went his way, undecided as to the next step he should take. But Margaret retired to her home to commit her way unto the Lord.

Alone in her chamber she sat anxious and perplexed. It was not fear of discovery that was haunting her, although a possibility of the deed being traced to herself had been already considered ; but it was the fear of doing wrong, and offending the Saviour she loved. When dangers threatened, her courage always rose high, but this dread blanched her cheek and laid her in the dust. Had she the right to destroy the property of another, under any circumstances? Would her act effect any good?

Finally, she resolved to go and tell her minister the whole matter, and hear what was his opinion. Then she knelt down to pray—and prayer with her was no mere form. Trials wring from us something more than vain repetitions, and Margaret's life had seen many dark days. To-night the shadows of coming evil weighed upon her, and she wrestled long and earnestly ; now in whispered pleadings, now with sobs more eloquent than words, and now with groans too deep for words or tears ; and at break of day the blessing came. Peace was distilled like dew into her heart, and Margaret slept.

But while the maiden slept, an enemy was awake and busy. Captain Butler, at first, was uncertain what use he should make of the secret he held. He thought of going to Margaret, telling her what he had witnessed, and promise silence on his part if she would consent to his terms ; for, notwithstanding his hatred, he still felt a desire to marry the maiden. Again, he considered that perhaps his plan might fail, and then no chance remained. It would be better to inform the magistrate of what had been done, bind him down to silence with regard to his informant, and reserve his own part for the time when he might figure in a more favorable light in Margaret's eyes.

Pleased with this scheme, the captain bent his steps toward Lyndhurst Hall, and in the library of this mansion found the priest who had officiated that evening at vespers. He was writing, and lifted a pair of cold, expressionless eyes to the captain as he entered. The soldier moved restlessly from one window to the other. He was always ill at ease in the presence of his priest, because of a peculiar air of mystery the confessor carried in his manners and countenance.

" Father," said the soldier, at length, playing with the hilt of his sword, "I want your ear for a little while."

The cold eyes looked up again, and the pen was laid aside. " Do you want to confess, my son?"

" Not my own sin," said the captain, half smiling ; " and you can hear me as well in this room as elsewhere, although I must ask you to go with me to the chapel afterward."

" Well, I am at your service, my son," said the priest ; and the captain clumsily detailed the events of that evening, going back, in the midst of his recital, to speak of his former acquaintance with the Puritan girl, not withholding blame and reproach from either her or Sir Gilbert. The priest listened patiently to the rambling account. When the soldier spoke of Margaret stepping on the altar, a gleam of fire shot up into his eyes, but it was gone instantaneously, and was unobserved by the narrator.

" And what are your wishes now?" asked the priest, when the captain had finished. The wily father would not commit himself until he knew all that was in his visitor's mind.

" Come to the chapel first, and see how the little heretic has treated your Virgin," said the soldier, annoyed at the father's calmness, when he anticipated a display of wrath and indignation.

To the chapel they went ; and if the priest did not storm with anger, and pour out anathemas upon the maiden's head, he did something more satisfactory ; and as the pair left the building both felt that they had done the best they could for their own cause—the priest for his church, and the captain for his own selfish ends.

The justice had an early visit next day, and his visitor's purse was considerably lighter when he left ; so the captain's revenge seemed in a fair way of being gratified.

With the same peace in her heart with which she had sunk into slumber, rose Margaret Desborough the following morning, and threw back her casement to let in the sunshine, the smell of the new-mown hay, and the fragrance of the flowers in the garden beneath. There was a cloudless sky ; songs of birds mingled with the voices of the mowers in the meadow beside the house ; and for long days afterward did these sights and sounds live in Margaret's memory.

She was startled by the voice of Rebecca, who appeared at the door of the courtyard, looking excited, and rather frightened.

" Master wants to speak to you, this very moment, Miss Margaret. Please go directly," she added, as Margaret looked at her, without moving.

"What is the matter, Rebecca?" asked she, shaking off the pigeons she had been feeding, and scattering the seed remaining in her basket on the ground.

"I cannot tell, but master was speaking to some men, and they told me to fetch you this instant."

(To be continued.)

PERSECUTION RENEWED.

S. S. Lesson for March 4, Acts 5 : 17–32. Golden Text, Matt. 5 : 10. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Persecution as a Right and a Privilege—Its Absence a Cause for Alarm—The Apostles in Prison—Their Offence a Benefaction—Their Deliverance—The Rulers Leagued against Them—Peter's Answer to the Council—God was Responsible—Jesus to Rule as well as Save—Gamaliel's Wise Counsel.

"BLESSED are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake, for their's is the kingdom of heaven." These are our Lord's own words, yet how many there are who take persecution from man through whom it comes instrumentally, instead of from God who permits it; and therefore esteem it rather as a wrong than as a blessed right belonging to the child of God and a high privilege. Few understand the words of Paul to the Philippians, "Unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer for His sake" (Phil. 1 : 29). And few understand his words to Timothy, "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution" (2 Tim. 3 : 12). Believers who have never lived near enough to God to provoke persecution, attribute the necessity for these words to the state of things in the times of the apostles, instead of taking home the solemn, searching lesson that all who are not living near enough to God, and far enough from the world to provoke persecution, are manifestly not living

"GODLY IN CHRIST JESUS."

It was just as soon as the tide of life and power rose high in the primitive church, just when "multitudes" were added to the Lord, and all the sick who were brought to the disciples were healed, that the powers that be took alarm. "The high priest rose up, and all they that were with him, (which is the sect of the Sadducees), and were filled with indignation, and laid their hands on the apostles, and put them in the common prison." What had they done? Only preached and healed. Had sin increased? Could they prove that those who were "added to the Lord" were the worse for it? Was it a sin to bring sick people in contact with their Lord by faith, so that He delivered them from their pains and from their uselessness? Had the conversions been effected by the priests, would they not have gloried in them? Had the healings been wrought through the instrumentality of some physician of those days, would he not have been looked upon as a benefactor of mankind? Yes, anything by which man can obtain praise is believed in and welcomed, but men are suspicious of any

RECOGNITION OF GOD.

How often do we hear men say that cases of healing by the Lord are pure imagination, and when facts are so strong that there can be no doubt that the diseased lungs have become sound, that the leg condemned to be amputated has become a healthy member, that the cancer has disappeared, that the helpless, suffering spine has become again the support, instead of the source of weakness and pain to the body—then they impute the power by which such works are wrought to mesmerism or anything else rather than speak as honestly as the magicians in Egypt and say, "This is the finger of God" (Ex. 8 : 19). Oh, how inconsistent is the world! If it be a sin to heal the sick, why then are not all successful doctors put into prison?

The apostles' term of imprisonment was not long. "The angel of the Lord by night opened the prison doors, and brought them forth, and said, Go, stand and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life." But so doing would they not act in open defiance of the authorities? Bless God! He was responsible. The authorities were acting in defiance of God. The apostles had made no resistance to them when they cast them into prison; their cause was the cause of God, and they could safely "commit the keeping of their souls" (Gr. "lives") "to Him in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator" (1 Pet. 4 : 19). Praise God! no prison locks can retain His children a moment longer than He permits; Jesus had guaranteed to His followers, "Nothing shall by any means hurt you" (Luke 10 : 19); how could those who believed His words have a moment's anxiety? They left the prison, passing as they went the keepers who knew not that God has a private latch-key to every door, and has sedatives of His own for any prison-keeper. The men of God lost no time, but went early in the morning into the temple and taught. Those who know what it is to win souls, to see them pass "from darkness to light and from the power of Satan to God," can well conceive with what joy the liberated disciples bore again their testimony for Jesus.

Others were at work as well as they, but on a far different mission. "The high-priest came, and they that were with him, and called the council together, and all the senate of the children of Israel:" church and state, rulers ecclesiastical and secular, combining against Jesus. Too often in our Protestant lands this thing has been repeated, all the world, including the worldly church in all denominations, rising up against any manifestation of the life of God. And these rulers thought that their combined authority and wisdom would easily dispose of the weak little company with which they had to deal. But they little knew the odds which were against them in estimating the opposition; they had

NOT TAKEN GOD INTO ACCOUNT.

They sent to the prison summoning the accused parties to appear before them. The officers, the police of those days, returned with an inexplicable story; "The prison truly found we shut with all safety, and the keepers standing without before the doors: but when we had opened, we found no man within." What was this? Was there a traitor in their own camp?

Before they had recovered from their surprise, the report reached them that their prisoners were not only at liberty, but absolutely and that not hidden away in some obscure place, but openly in the temple. They lost no time, but sent immediately to call them, not with violence, for they feared an uprising of the people in their defence, and that the officers should have been stoned. The apostles made no resistance, but stood unabashed before the council, "and the high priest asked them, saying, Did not we strictly command you that ye should not teach in this name? and, behold, ye have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine, and intend to bring this man's blood upon us." Alas! alas! the whole people of the Jews had already pronounced the fearful words, "His blood be on us, and on our children" (Matt. 27 : 25).

PETER'S RULE OF LIFE.

Peter and the other apostles, just filled with fresh confidence, fresh praise, fresh experience of the mighty power of God's delivering hand, were not likely to be awed by any company of men however august, standing as they did before God whose hand was stretched out in their behalf, these rulers looked so small and insignificant, they could not be mentioned or thought of in comparison with the present living God. They replied, "We ought to obey God rather than men." Oh, that believers understood how to obey, and how to stand in the right relation to God and to man; how to obey those placed in authority in every respect, except when their command is in distinct opposition to the written Word of God. Many there are who disobey husband, parent, master, minister, or teacher, whenever a command interferes with their own will, who yet make obedience to them an excuse for disobeying God, when obedience to Him would entail disobedience to them. "We ought to obey God rather than men," i.e., whenever it is a question between the authority of God and that of man, let God be obeyed at any cost. "The God of our fathers raised up Jesus, whom ye slew and hanged on a tree. Him hath God exalted with His right hand, to be for to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins." Was it not rather imprudent to go thus in the face of the senate? When men are charged with a message from God, and are filled with the Holy Ghost for the delivery of it, prudence can have no voice; God is responsible for all which He commands. They had been forbidden to say anything about the resurrection, but the very truth which alone could save the senators and priests of Israel from eternal ruin, was bound up with the resurrection of Christ. "If Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins" (1 Cor. 15 : 17). Reader, are you in every detail of life obeying God rather than men? In your family and social life, in your business, in your leisure time, and in your dress, in your friendships, and in your habits, do you set aside all influence of man, until you have fully discovered the will of God? Oh, if God convicts you that there is a fault in you, that fear of man has driven you from the straight line, from having the glory of your God as your one object, then take this message: the risen Jesus is "a Prince and a Saviour," let Him rule as well as save you, He gives repentance and forgiveness of sins.

The apostles did not merely make a statement of doctrine, they gave personal testimony, and so must every one do who would have power with others; it may rouse their anger or it may convict them, whenever it is real it will not be without effect. These rulers were "cut to the heart," but pride would not allow them to yield. Brought up to such a point, men must either yield or become persecutors, these men chose the latter, and in their mad rage "took counsel to slay them." But one man was there, Paul's tutor (Acts 22 : 3), "a Pharisee named Gamaliel, a doctor of the law, had in reputation among all the people, and commanded to put the apostles forth a little space." All had seemed to be against them, humanly speaking their cause was lost; but He who had opened the prison doors was still the Almighty God, His resources remained inexhaustible, and He so ordered that one of this very council who was planning to destroy the apostles' lives, should become of his own free will the counsel for their defence. And it was

A NOBLE DEFENCE.

"Ye men of Israel, take heed to yourselves what ye intend to do as touching these men;" and then after referring to two impostors who had come to nought, he continued, "And now I say unto you, Refrain from these men, and let them alone: for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought: but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even to fight against God." Surely Gamaliel was not far from the kingdom of God; it is not a usual thing for an unconverted man to place things thus in the light of God and to recognize His hand in them. The council agreed to him, but did not let the apostles go until they had beaten them, and repeated their command "that they should not speak in the name of Jesus."

"And they departed from the presence of the council," not with complaints that they had been hardly dealt with, not with trembling and fear for the future, they had counted the cost and accepted persecution as their precious privilege. They departed "rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for His name;" they knew how to "glory in tribulations" (Rom. 5 : 3), and to "count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations" (James 1 : 2). This was Christianity in its normal state. "And daily in the temple, and in every house (they preached and visited from house to house), they ceased not to teach and preach Jesus Christ." Lord, restore primitive Christianity!

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Speech of Queen Victoria was Read at the opening of the British Parliament on Thursday last. The only paragraphs of general interest relate to the affairs of Egypt and Ireland. The speech states that in the former country tranquillity has been restored, and that the "withdrawal of the British troops is proceeding as expeditiously as a prudent consideration of the circumstances admits. The reconstitution of the government of Egypt and the reorganization of its affairs under the Khedive have partly been accomplished." As to the future, the speech says, England's efforts will be directed "to secure full provision for the exigencies of order, for a just representation of the wants and wishes of the population, and for the observances of international obligations." With reference to Ireland the speech states that the improvement in its condition continues. "Agrarian crime has sensibly diminished, and law has been everywhere upheld." This roseate view of the state of Ireland will be met by a counter statement from Mr. Parnell, who promptly announced that he should oppose its endorsement by Parliament. The speech also intimated that a proposal to establish a court of Criminal Appeal which does not exist in Great Britain will be introduced during the session.

The President of the French Republic has again urged upon M. Freycinet the duty of forming a Cabinet. That statesman has endeavored to execute the task, but at the close of last week no announcement had been made of his success. Meanwhile the Legislature has debated the Expulsion Bill, dealing with the representatives of the families which have reigned over France. The Senate passed the bill in a modified form, suggested by M. Waddington. It provided that any prince found guilty of furthering pretensions endangering the State shall be banished, his trial to take place before a court of assizes or before the Senate sitting as a high court. That bill was, however, summarily rejected by the lower House, which adopted in its place a compromise suggested during the debate in the Senate by M. Barbey, rendering the princes liable to expulsion by the decree of the President of the Republic. That was rejected by the Senate, and a deadlock ensued. Some idea of the difficulties surrounding the Republic and the irreconcilable doctrines of the factions may be gained from the following set of resolutions passed unanimously at a public meeting in Paris: "1. The government is called upon to decree the immediate surrender to the nation of all the property, real and personal, now possessed by the thirty-three members of the Orleans family. 2. This act of preservation and justice is to be extended to the Bonaparte and Bourbon families. 3. The expropriation for the benefit of the nation of all the real and personal property of the Rothschild family."

The Trial of the Men Charged with Conspiracy to murder Irish officials was continued last week. To the surprise of the other prisoners James Carey, the Town Councillor of Dublin, one of the accused, volunteered to testify against his companions in the dock. His evidence was accepted by the government, and proved to be conclusive against the assassins of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke. The utmost indignation was manifested against Carey by the prisoners, who were exasperated at his shameless effort to clear himself at the expense of his colleagues. Carey described in detail the organization and proceedings of the Assassination Society, which was called "The Invincibles." The Dublin branch consisted of fifty picked men. They were under the command of a man whose name Carey professed he did not know, but who was called by his subordinates "Number One." That man had abundance of money at command, which Carey believed was supplied by the Land League to pay murderers. It was decided to "remove," Earl Cowper who was then Viceroy, Mr. Forster and Mr. Burke. Carey assisted in selecting men to commit the crimes. Plans were laid six times for the murder of Mr. Forster, and armed men lay in wait to kill him, but each time some apparently trivial circumstance thwarted them. Carey admitted that on the night of May 6th, 1882, he waved a white handkerchief as a signal for the attack on Lord F. Cavendish and Mr. Burke, and that it was at his suggestion that knives were used. He saw the stabbing done, and pointed out the men in the dock who actually perpetrated the deed. Carey was one of the four leaders of "The Invincibles," and had control of the funds and directed the operations of the society. One of the most important features of the miscreant's evidence is that so prominent a leader as he appears to have been should admit that the Land League supplied the Assassination Society with funds.

The Demonstration in Mr. Bradlaugh's Interest on the occasion of the opening of Parliament is ridiculed by the British press. About seven thousand men and boys, chiefly the latter, assembled in one of the London squares and protested against the exclusion of Mr. Bradlaugh from the House of Commons. Mr. Bradlaugh made a speech to the throng, and announced that if nothing was mentioned in the House of Commons by four o'clock in the afternoon about the bill allowing members to make affirmation who desired to do so, instead of taking the usual Parliamentary oath, he should then take his seat in the House. There was a large crowd outside of the Houses of Parliament, the gates of which were well guaded. The proceedings at the meeting occupied half an hour, and terminated with perfect order. When the House of Commons assembled a member of Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet stated that he would on an early day propose that members might take their seats by affirming instead of taking the oath. The proposal will be opposed by the Conservatives as before.

The Preparations for the Coronation of the Czar are described by a correspondent in Europe of The Sun. He states that Moscow is occupied by busy workmen, native and foreign, engaged in completing the arrangements for the ceremony. They are on a fabulous scale of magnificence. Eleven miles of tables are being constructed for the banquet on the plain, and eighty-five circular counters for the distribution to the moujiks of 900,000 pies. Rubinstein is to write a march and direct an orchestra of 1000 musicians and 8000 choristers. Sixteen enormous vats, to hold the free beer, are being built in the public places, and an English company is covering the Kremlin with electric lights. Meanwhile the anxiety about the Nihilists grows apace, and the latest report is that the German police have got possession of some of Hartmann's communications to Nihilists, giving instructions on the subject of the coronation.

Prince Jerome Napoleon has been Formally recognized by the ex-Empress of the French as the head of the Bonaparte family. The London Times publishes an authoritative statement regarding an interview which took place on February 13th between the ex-Empress Eugénie and Prince Jérôme Napoléon, which, it says, has cleared up some private misunderstandings existing between the ex-Empress and the Prince. The ex-Empress was not called upon to express any opinion of her kinsman's general policy, and could not, consistently with the line of policy adopted by her while sojourning in Great Britain, do more than assure her cousin of her best wishes for any constitutional action he may take toward bringing about a plebiscite.

The Progress of Jesuitism in England is Described by a correspondent of the London Record, in a lucid and interesting article, dated from Rome. He makes the following statements: "Those who are in a position to know the truth do not hesitate to say that the development of advanced Ritualism in England is the work of the Jesuits; that ever since the year 1841 they have insidiously but steadily worked to advance their cause, and with that subtle cleverness which has so distinguished them since the foundation of the Order, they have known how to choose the ground and the agents best adapted for their work. Their aim and end for years has been not only to make proselytes, but so to corrupt the Episcopal Church as to cause if not her absolute ruin, at least such schism as to weaken and shake her very foundations."

Messrs. Moody and Sankey's Mission in Birmingham, England, has been abundantly blessed. A local secular journal says: "Only a powerful attraction would serve to induce nearly 2000 people to leave the comfort of the fireside in order to attend a public gathering in such weather as prevailed. That such a number should have assembled at Messrs. Moody and Sankey's meetings in Bingley Hall, and that when less discomforting conditions prevailed, the audience should have numbered nearly 10,000, affords ample proof that, either in themselves or their methods, the American evangelists are the subject of widespread popular interest." It appears that on the occasion of Messrs. Moody and Sankey's former visit to Birmingham a list was compiled of those persons who connected their conversion with the mission then held, and their names were handed to the ministers of the various churches with which the converts elected to be associated. A large proportion are said to be still in fellowship with these churches, and it is therefore not surprising that Mr. Moody has among his supporters not a few clergymen of the Episcopal Church, and practically all the ministers of what are called the "Evangelical Nonconformist denominations."

In the German Reichstag an Account of the fund for the relief of the sufferers by the inundations was given on February 16th, by the President, who mentioned the amounts received from America and elsewhere. Herr Bernuth asked that the House express its thanks for these large donations. The request was greeted with loud applause, which the President said he regarded as an expression of the thanks of the House. The sum received from the United States was 588,100 marks ($140,026).

The Spezia Mission in Italy, a Picture of which appeared in a former number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has for some years had an evangelical station in the city of Pistoja (the ancient Pistoria), where the labors of Signor Tofani and his devoted family have not been in vain. The most remarkable known result in this work was the conversion of Signor Galassi, now the zealous young preacher at Spezia and Lerice. Signor Galassi has had occasion to visit his native Pistoja, and has conducted there, as at Prato, a series of Gospel services, which have been very largely attended. The Gospel has appeared a reality to many who have listened to the young preacher, remembering that a few years ago he cared for none of these things.

Volume V. of the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now ready, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1882 with complete index. Price $3 including postage. Ten per cent less to ministers and the trade.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), for February, may be obtained at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price six cents, postage paid.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

Gustave Doré's death on January 23d last, deprived the world of its most popular living artist. That he was the greatest artist connoisseurs deny, but the works of no other painter were so widely distributed, so popular with the masses as his. In every land his name is known, and in palace and cottage his pictures are treasured. Possibly, had he painted a small number of pictures, he might have attained a higher rank in his profession, but his productions could never have given greater pleasure to his unprofessional admirers. We have read time after time the wonderful narratives of the Bible, but before the canvases of Doré we realize, as we never did before, the depth of meaning they contain. It is the same with Milton's "Paradise Lost," with Dante's "Inferno" and other works that he illustrated. He had a strange, weird power of depicting the unseen and unearthly scenes, so that the meaning of the writers took visible shape and form under his hands. Many a reader of Milton has laid down the book to endeavor to conceive the wondrous scenes the poet describes, and has failed. Doré read, and his mind saw the scene in every detail, and his practised hand transferred it to canvas for the benefit of others less gifted.

Gustave Doré was born at Strasburg, on January 6th, 1832. He was thus only fifty-one years of age when he died, yet in that comparatively brief space of time he produced many of them of colossal size. He spent his childhood among the mountains of the Vosges, and the critics who trace the talent and characteristics that make up an artist to natural influences of race or residence, were always finding in certain weird effects of mountain scenery in Doré's works, and in his habitual use of sombre effects of forest and foliage, the result of his early life.

Until the age of fifteen his education was pursued at the College of Bourg, where the precocious boy did very little studying but a great deal of drawing, seeing, however, very little of contemporaneous art except in the shape of caricatures and illustrated periodicals. In the first he had a good master—Grandville—who, startled by the boy's precocious genius, urged his father to make an artist of him, and predicted his splendid success. His father, however, at first opposed the project, but in 1847, having to visit Paris, he took the boy with him. Gustave immediately on his arrival with a collection of his drawings as his only introduction, sought, with the confidence of youth, Phillipon, a noted art dealer and patron of artists. Phillipon was so struck by the untutored efforts of the boy that he strongly advised him to devote himself to art, a pursuit for which nature so evidently had intended him. As a proof that it was no idle flattery, Phillipon offered to purchase all the drawings that Doré might produce, and this unexpected kindness decided the boy's career in life. Even his family withdrew their opposition, and it was arranged that Doré should enter the Lycée Charlemagne for two years before devoting himself wholly to art. Under these conditions his father consented to his remaining in Paris. But his time at the Lycée was chiefly devoted to filling the margins of his histories with sketches and covering his exercise books with strange, weird drawings of angels and demons.

Phillipon was at that time commencing the publication of his satirical Journal pour Rire, and he encouraged Doré to draw for it. The boy was willing enough, and during the following three years so great was his industry that he made some three thousand drawings, mostly for the Journal pour Rire. The fame of the journal spread throughout France, the wit and satire of the sketches became the subject of conversation everywhere. The vices and follies of society, even the blunders of the government felt the lash of his genius and smarted under his ridicule. Doré was sought after, commissions were offered him freely on his own terms, and probably for the first time in the history of art the spectacle was witnessed of earning his bread. After leaving the Lycée, Doré added to the labors of this regular engagement the miscellaneous work of a young artist, illustrating ephemeral "albums" and exhibiting in 1848 some striking pen-and-ink sketches at the Salon. Not long afterward he turned his attention to oil-painting. He exhibited almost from the start—landscapes at first inspired by his early studies in the Vosges, or by his journey to the Alps. But they met with less favor than his sketches. Fresh, original, with brilliant handling of light and shade, and a wonderfully effective treatment of his material, certain radical defects, as a hardness of outline and a theatrical use of his atmospheric effects, were still strong enough to overbalance his evident merits.

Doré, however, worked on with all-absorbing industry. He had his mother come to Paris, and with her he lived. He loved her devotedly, and she returned his affection with all a mother's pride in her son's popularity added. Doré was often joked about his love for his mother by his Paris friends, who only too easily shook off the restraints of home. "Why do you not marry?" they asked him, to which he would reply, "What would you have? I am already twice married" (referring to his mother and his art). "Must a man be a Turk to prove that he is of a domestic turn?" He was faithful to that love to the last, and Mme. Doré on her side watched over him and his work tenderly for many years. Visitors, even with letters of introduction, had to pass the concierge, a maid-servant, and Mme. Doré, and satisfied the inquiries of all three, before they were allowed to see M. Doré himself.

Wealth flowed in upon him, but he never altered his style of life or abated his untiring industry. He was constantly to be seen on the boulevards of Paris dressed in the ordinary blouse worn by the working classes. Nor was this the result of any affectation, but the result of the honesty and simplicity of his life.

AN AMERICAN VISITOR

to his home thus describes him and his haunt: "Like his life his studio was simple and workman-like. It was a square room of large dimensions, lighted by a skylight and sufficiently lofty to accommodate the gigantic canvases whereon the artist worked out his vast conceptions. A movable platform adapted to be raised or lowered at pleasure occupied the centre of the room. On this Doré was wont to stand when at work on the colossal pictures that seemed to spring into being so readily beneath his skilful and rapid brush. A table laden with brushes of all dimensions, from the most delicate pencil to a huge, overgrown mushroom of hair. Another, strewed with books, papers, letters, visiting cards, and scraps of drawing, a few chairs and a sofa, made up the furniture. There were visible no bits of bric-à-brac, no pieces of old armor or antique furniture, no lay figures or lengths of colored drapery, the usual picturesque litter of an artist's studio; huge green curtains, intended to hide unfinished works hung from the walls; all else was bare and severe.

"This is his large studio in the Rue Bayard. It was, however, in the Rue St. Dominique Saint Germain that he was at home, and at his mother's. When you got to know him, he was very attractive, and though somewhat disposed to melancholy, liked to talk about his treasures, for the apartment was filled with all sorts of artistic objects and mementos. To these and to several small dogs he was much attached. He loved music and played on the piano, flute and guitar, as well as on the violin, and often had musical evenings which were very enjoyable, and where attractive and talented men of all classes were to be met. He was a handsome man, with a far-off, dreamy look in his eye; flowing hair, a mustache, and rather Germanic in type, as some have thought his art to be. One of his pronounced dislikes, however, was for the Germans, and his pathetic Salon picture, 'Alsace,' was his protest to the annexation. Work was his enjoyment and he was at it incessantly, whether on his trips to England and Scotland or in the quiet of his Paris studios. He was often at work at six and after nightfall."

The period of the Crimean War gave a new bent to his work and turned him to the peculiar class of illustration in which he has won his most extended reputation. He accompanied the French troops to the scene of action, his sketches appearing in the Musée Anglo-Français, issued by his boyhood's friend, Phillipon. An art connoisseur, writing in the New York World, gives the following chronological list of Doré's

SUBSEQUENT WORKS:

"He exhibited in 1855 the 'Battle of the Alma,' and two years later the 'Battle of Inkermann,' two enormously large battle-pieces, the latter of which gained a mention. In the first year of the war he published his first illustrated work—'Rabelais.' 'The Wandering Jew,' a folio of a dozen large plates, large even for this artist, followed, and has been placed by most critics at the head of his works. Balzac's 'Contes Drolatiques' and the 'Contes de Perrault,' which have had but little attention outside of France, came next. A tour through Spain in company with Hippolyte Taine produced their 'Voyage aux Pyrenees,' and later Doré's 'Don Quixote.' To his illustrations of Cervantes's work, Doré gave a local coloring which no previous interpreter had even faintly attempted, and their popularity has fixed once for all the conventional type of the hero. A Latin himself, Doré gave the immortal tale an altogether different interpretation from that of most English readers or draughtsmen, and on the whole a truer one. In delicacy and refinement of drawing the illustrations to this work stand alone, and some Hispano-Mauresque interiors are marvels of the skill with which this fine draughtsman could seize architectural details with the accuracy of a photograph.

"In 1861 Doré exhibited four paintings from subjects drawn from Dante's 'Inferno,' giving to the world at the same time his folio volume of illustrations of the same work, his interpretation of the 'Divine Comedy' being completed in 1868, with the publication of 'Purgatory' and 'Paradise.' During these seven intervening years Doré exhibited, with other pictures, 'Le Neophyte,' which with 'La Famille du Saltimbanque,' Hamerton regards as his best performance. In 1865-6 was published his illustrated Bible, in 1867 the 'Fables' of La Fontaine and in 1868 Tennyson's 'Idyls of the King.'

"The later works of Doré have been described so often and so minutely that a mere mention of the most notable among them will suffice. Of paintings may be named 'The Christian Martyrs,' 1874; 'Dante and Virgil Visiting the Seventh Circle,' and the 'House of Caiaphas,' 1875; 'Jesus Condemned,' 1876; 'The Entry of Christ into Jerusalem,' 1877; 'Ecce Homo,' and 'Moses before Pharaoh,' 1878; 'The Death of Orpheus,' 1879, etc., while among the illustrated works should be enumerated his 'Paradise Lost' and 'Rime of the Ancient Mariner,' the 'London,' for which Douglas Jerrold furnished the letter-press, a fine 'Orlando Furioso' and the illustrations for Baron Davillier's book on Spain. His 'Shakespeare' is left unfinished.

"Doré had also produced several works of sculpture, among them 'Death and Love' and 'Glory Stifling a Young Warrior,' with a colossal vase in bronze, on which was depicted the triumph of Bacchus, which was one of the sensations of the last International Exposition at Paris. He had recently undertaken the statue of Dumas père, in which the Muse of Reading sits rapt at the feet of the great story-teller. In 1861 Doré received the cross of the Legion of Honor, being promoted to the grade of officer in 1879. He had made a great fortune, and purchased not long ago a site for a splendid residence in the Parc Monceau, one of the most attractive spots in Paris."

In person, Doré was of medium stature, stoutly built, and with a fine head. He dressed carelessly and delighted, to use his own phrase, in "living the life of an Arab." His unresting mind and his frank temper made him a foe to all idle ceremonies or conventionalities. While a welcome guest at the great receptions, Dore was not fond of society, for the reason that it interfered with his art, preferring a quiet evening at home, conversation with his friends and music, to all fashionable gatherings.

ILLNESS AND DEATH.

Doré worked too hard, and continued his labors with too little relaxation to live long. His weary physical frame and his exhausted mind left him but little stamina to support the strain of illness. He was smitten and succumbed almost without a struggle. On Friday, January 19th, he attended a soiree, and in returning to his residence he caught cold. The next day inflammation of the throat set in and made rapid progress. The most eminent physicians in Paris were summoned to his bedside, but were unable to relieve his sufferings. He died on Tuesday, January 23d, at the age of fifty-one years.

WHAT THEN?

Who can answer! It is not for us to say what were the scenes into which that gifted soul entered when it left the body. Unhappily, there is no evidence that he experienced that change of heart which can alone fit the soul for entrance into heaven. It may be that there was such a change, but there is sad reason to fear otherwise.

The question has been asked, "What became of Noah's carpenters?" That he had assistance in building the ark is certain, but the Bible record shows that the men who labored year after year on the structure must have neglected to use it when the time of trouble came. So it may have been that this magnificent artist, whose genius was devoted to rendering more vivid and realistic the scenes and events of the Bible, and whose mind grasped so powerfully the sacred narratives, failed to apply them to his own safety. If so, the lot of the humblest, most obscure believer is preferable to that of the celebrated painter with all his wealth and fame. It is the most stupendous disaster of life to gain the whole world and lose the soul.

Among Doré's most remarkable illustrations is that of the PORTRAIT OF A DRUNKARD.

Doré had an artist's eye, even for those terribly repulsive creatures, the victims of drink, who are but too plentiful in our streets, and at sight of whom ordinary men shudder. One evening when in London, he was roaming near the Farringdon Market, when an appalling object, one mass of rags on a gaunt frame of bones, rose up before him, croaking, "I am a gentleman; I am a clergyman!" Doré was so much struck with the man's appearance, that he put him into a cab and took him to his hotel, where the hall-porter, as was only natural, evinced some surprise.

As Doré was fond of harmless fun, he said coolly, "Give your arm to this gentleman up the stairs, please; he is my uncle;" and when he had got his "uncle" up-stairs he drew a ghastly sketch of him preaching from a pulpit to a congregation of other drunkards. The picture might have served admirably as a companion to that of Cruikshank on "Drink."

DANIEL IN THE LIONS' DEN,

a copy of which is by special permission of the publishers reproduced on our front page, is another of his sublime conceptions. Our readers are well acquainted with the thrilling narrative in the sixth chapter of Daniel. The artist depicts the scene when the king came to the den, and "cried with a lamentable voice unto Daniel: and said, O Daniel, servant of the living God, is thy God, whom thou servest continually, able to deliver thee from the lions? Then said Daniel unto the king, O king, live forever. My God hath sent his angel, and hath shut the lions' mouths, that they have not hurt me: forasmuch as before him innocency was found in me; and also before thee, O king, have I done no hurt. Then was the king exceedingly glad for him, and commanded that they should take Daniel up out of the den. So Daniel was taken up out of the den, and no manner of hurt was found upon him, because he believed in his God."

THE LAST SUPPER

was another subject illustrated by Doré. A copy of this picture appears on page 140. It will be noticed with what rare skill the artist has succeeded in overcoming the difficulties of the subject, and has grouped the figures so that the spectator is able to note the contrast between the countenances of the apostles. The moment chosen was that surpassing in pathos and solemnity all other scenes in the history of the Son of man when "He took the cup, and gave thanks, and said, take this, and divide it among yourselves: For I say unto you, I will not drink of the fruit of the vine, until the kingdom of God shall come. And he took bread and gave thanks, and brake it and gave unto them, saying, This is my body which is given for you: this do in remembrance of me. Likewise also the cup after supper, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you. But, behold, the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table. And truly the son of man goeth, as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed!"

In the Doré Bible is another illustration of wonderful power and beauty. It is that of Christ's reproof to the Pharisees when they brought to him

THE WOMAN TAKEN IN ADULTERY.

A copy of that picture appears on page 141. That incident has carried the balm of comfort for near two thousand years into the broken heart of many a poor penitent. The Pharisees, like the Pharisees of our day boasting of their higher life, their holiness, and the impossibility of their falling under the power of sin were very bitter against any who fall before fierce temptation. The woman's grievous, flagrant sin shocked the souls of those who prayed publicly in the streets, and who, when they committed sin, did it secretly. They were like the two people now lying in jail in a city near New York who attended a holiness meeting, and reproved a woman for wearing some ornament on her dress, and afterward went home and committed such sins as appalled the community by their fiendish cruelty.

But we remember how the pure and holy Saviour dealt with the sinner and her accusers; not excusing or palliating her crime, but rebuking the hypocrites who denounced her. The narrative is in the eighth chapter of John. The artist seizes the moment when, after Jesus had written on the ground as though He had not heard the terrible charge, when they continued asking Him—the self-satisfied attitude of one man and the vindictive face and outstretched hand of another, are very expressive—Jesus "said unto them; He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her. And they which heard it being convicted by their own consciences went out one by one." They had the grace to obey their consciences, which their followers of our day have not. The day, however, is coming when those who have so worn the cloak of hypocrisy, and caused religion to be evil spoken of, will be confronted with the same glorious Being who, reading their hearts will not be deceived.

MR. SPURGEON AND GUSTAVE DORÉ.

In the course of his sermon on a recent Sunday morning, Mr. Spurgeon, alluding to the death of Gustave Doré said that he had made the acquaintance of the artist, and had frequently suggested subjects to him. If the gifted painter had survived, and he had another opportunity of conversing with him, he would have asked him to paint a picture representing what the model Christian should be. In the background of the picture there would have been the lion which Samson had previously slain with his own hands, and from whose carcass he had just taken the honey, while in the forefront would be Samson himself distributing honey to those round him, and thus presenting in a striking form the grand truth so often forgotten, that the Christian who is saved from death, should begin to feed the perishing around him, with the food which has satisfied his own soul.

Missionaries are Needed for China. An urgent and pressing appeal for missionaries, signed by seventy-seven missionaries, connected with the China Inland Mission has been issued. After referring to the famine which recently swept over North China, the writers say: "A more widespread and awful famine of the bread of life now exists to-day in every province in China. Souls on every hand are perishing for lack of knowledge; more than a thousand every hour are passing away into death and darkness. We, and many others, have been sent by God and by the churches to minister the bread of life to these perishing ones; but our number collectively is utterly inadequate to the crying needs around us. Provinces in China compare in area with kingdoms in Europe, and average between ten to twenty millions in population. One province has no missionary; one has only one; in each of two other provinces there are only one missionary and his wife resident; and none are sufficiently supplied with laborers. Can we leave matters thus without incurring the sin of blood-guiltiness?" A twofold appeal closes the letter: first, for earnest prayer; secondly, for fresh laborers. Forty-two additional men and twenty-eight women are urgently required, and could be advantageously stationed.

The Salvation Army in Switzerland is Making progress and attracting considerable attention. An Englishman thus writes of a meeting he attended at Geneva: "The meeting took place in the Salle de la Reformation, which holds some 4000 people. Miss Booth, after speaking, asked those who were desirous of pardon to stand up. A large number did so. One after another went forward and gave up all to God. I nearly jumped off my seat when I saw one of my fellow-students get up, go forward, fall on his knees, and pray for salvation. How I did pray for him; he was the last to find peace, but what glory when he found it! How glad we were; we even kissed each other. That young fellow thought before going there that he was really saved; it was when he found himself sifted by the Holy Ghost that he found out his position. Glory be to God that the Army has come to Switzerland."

A Revival in Several Colleges has Followed the Day of Prayer. The President of Maryville College, Tennessee, writes: "On the Day of Prayer for Colleges, some of our young men asked Christians to pray for them. A good work is going on, and we hope many more will consecrate themselves to Christ and His service. Students are coming to us in great numbers. We cannot accommodate more young men. We must have more room. Our chapel is now too small." The Secretary of Lincoln College, Oxford, Pa., says: "There is profound religious interest and inquiry among the students in the Lincoln University. It began early in the college year, and has continued unabated as well as its precious fruits. The pious students are more consistent, earnest, and active in their religious life. A daily prayer-meeting which was begun in the first week of the college year, is still held every evening. This meeting is large and full, attended by recent converts and inquirers as well as by the pious students who seek to bring in the few who still continue unmoved. Though conducted entirely by themselves, nothing occurs that would be regarded by us as unseemly or unprofitable."

ANANIAS AND SAPPHIRA.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, February 25, 1883.

"A certain man named Ananias, with Sapphira his wife, sold a possession . . . . and the young men came in, and found her dead, and carrying her forth, buried her by her husband."—ACTS 5 : 1–10.

A WELL-MATCHED pair, alike in ambition and in falsehood, Ananias and Sapphira. They wanted a reputation for great beneficence and they sold all their property, pretending to put the entire proceeds in the charity fund while they put much of it in their own pocket. There was no necessity that they give all their property away, but they wanted the reputation of so doing. Ananias first lied about it and dropped down dead. Then Sapphira lied about it and she dropped down dead. The two fatalities a warning to all ages of the danger of sacrificing the truth.

There are thousands of

WAYS OF TELLING A LIE.

A man's whole life may be a falsehood and yet never with his lips may he falsify once. There is a way of uttering falsehood by look, by manner as well as by lip. There are persons who are guilty of dishonesty of speech and then afterward say "may be"; call it a white lie, when no lie is that color. The whitest lie ever told was as black as perdition. There are those so given to dishonesty of speech that they do not know when they are lying.

With some it is an acquired sin, and with others it is a natural infirmity. There are those whom you will recognize as born liars. Their whole life, from cradle to grave, is filled up with vice of speech. Misrepresentation and prevarication are as natural to them as the infantile diseases, and are a sort of moral croup or spiritual scarlatina. Then there are those who in after life have opportunities of developing this evil, and they go from deception to deception, and from class to class, until they are regularly graduated liars.

At times the air in our cities is filled with falsehood, and lies cluster around the mechanic's hammer, blossom on the merchant's yardstick, and sometimes sit in the door of churches. They are called by some, fabrication, and they are called by some, fiction. You might call them subterfuge or deceit, or romance, or fable, or misrepresentation, or delusion; but as I know nothing to be gained by covering up a God-defying sin with a lexicographer's blanket, I shall call them in plainest vernacular, lies. They may be divided into agricultural, commercial, mechanical, social and ecclesiastical.

I. First of all, I speak of AGRICULTURAL FALSEHOODS.

There is something in the presence of natural objects that has a tendency to make one pure. The trees never issue false stock. The wheat fields are always honest. Rye and oats never move out in the night, not paying for the place they occupy. Corn shocks never make false assignment. Mountain brooks are always current. The gold of the wheat fields is never counterfeit. But while the tendency of agricultural life is to make one honest, honesty is not the characteristic of all who come to the city markets from the country districts. You hear the creaking of the dishonest farm-wagon in almost every street of our great cities, a farm wagon in which there is not one honest spoke or one truthful rivet from tongue to tail-board. Again and again has domestic economy in our great cities foundered on the farmer's firkin. When New York and Brooklyn and Cincinnati and Boston sit down and weep over their sins, Westchester and Long Island counties and all the country districts ought to sit down and weep over theirs.

The tendency in all rural districts is to suppose that sins and transgressions cluster in our great cities; but citizens and merchants long ago learned that it is not safe to calculate from the character of the apples on the top of the farmer's barrel what is the character of the apples all the way down toward the bottom. Many of our citizens and merchants have learned that it is always safe to see the farmer measure the barrel of beets. Milk cans are not always honest. There are those who in country life seem to think they have a right to overreach grain-dealers, merchants of all styles. They think it is more honorable to raise corn than to deal in corn.

The producer sometimes practically says to the merchant: "you get your money easily, anyhow." Does he get it easy? While the farmer sleeps, and conscious of the fact that his corn and rye are all the time progressing and adding to his fortune or his livelihood, the merchant tries to sleep while conscious of the fact that at that moment the ship may be driving on the rock, or a wave sweeping over the hurricane deck spoiling his goods, or the speculators may be plotting a monetary revolution, or the burglars may be at that moment at his money safe, or the fire may have kindled on the very block where his store stands.

Easy is it? Let those who get their living in the quiet farm and barn take the place of one of our city merchants and see whether it is so easy. It is hard enough to have the hands blistered with out-door work, but it is harder with mental anxieties to have the brain consumed. God help the merchants. And do not let those who live in country life come to the conclusion that all the dishonesties belong to city life.

II. I pass on to consider

COMMERCIAL LIES.

There are those who apologize for deviations from the right and for practical deception by saying it is commercial custom. In other words, a lie by multiplication becomes a virtue.

There are large fortunes gathered in which there is not one drop of the sweat of unrequited toil, and not one spark of bad temper flashes from the bronze bracket, and there is not one drop of needlewoman's heart's blood on the crimson plush; while there are other fortunes about which it may be said that on every door-knob and on every figure of the carpet, and on every wall there is the mark of dishonor. What if the hand wrung by toil and blistered until the skin comes off should be placed on the exquisite wall paper, leaving its mark of blood—four fingers and a thumb? or, if in the night the man should be aroused from his slumber again and again by his own conscience, getting himself up on elbow and crying out into the darkness, "Who is there?"

There are large fortunes upon which God's favor comes down, and it is just as honest and just as Christian to be affluent as it is to be poor. In many a house there is a blessing on every pictured wall and on every scroll, and on every traceried window, and the joy that flashes in the lights, and that showers in the music, and that dances in the quick feet of the children pattering through the hall has in it the favor of God and the approval of man. And there are thousands and tens of thousands of merchants who from the first day they sold a yard of cloth, or a firkin of butter, have maintained their integrity. They were born honest, they will live honest, and they will die honest.

But you and I know that there are in commercial life those who are guilty of great dishonesties of speech. A merchant says: "I am selling these goods at less than cost." Is he getting for those goods a price inferior to that which he paid for them? Then he has spoken the truth. Is he getting more? Then he lies. A merchant says: "I paid $25 for this article." Is that the price he paid for it? All right. But suppose he paid for it $23 instead of $25? Then he lies.

BOTH SIDES THE COUNTER.

But there are just as many falsehoods before the counter as there are behind the counter. A customer comes in and asks: "How much is this article?" "It is five dollars." "I can get that for four somewhere else." Can he get it for four somewhere else, or did he say that just for the purpose of getting it cheap by depreciating the value of the goods? If so, he lied. There are just as many falsehoods before the counter as there are behind the counter.

A man unrolls upon the counter a bale of handkerchiefs. The customer says: "Are these all silk?" "Yes." "No cotton in them?" "No cotton in them." Are those handkerchiefs all silk? Then the merchant told the truth. Is there any cotton in them? Then he lied. Moreover, he defrauds himself, for this customer coming in from Hempstead, or Yonkers, or Newark, will after a while find out that he has been defrauded, and the next time he comes to town and goes shopping, he will look up at that sign and say: "No, I won't go there; that's the place where I got those handkerchiefs." First, the merchant insulted God, and secondly, he picked his own pocket.

Who would take the responsibility of saying how many falsehoods were yesterday told by hardware men, and clothiers, and lumbermen, and tobacconists, and jewellers, and importers, and shippers, and dealers in furniture, and dealers in coal, and dealers in groceries? Lies about buckles, about saddles, about harness, about shoes, about hats, about coats, about shovels, about tongs, about forks, about chairs, about sofas, about horses, about lands, about everything. I arraign commercial falsehood as one of the crying sins of our time.

III. I pass on to speak of MECHANICAL FALSEHOODS.

Among the artisans are those upon whom we are dependent for the houses in which we live, the garments we wear, the cars in which we ride. The vast majority of them are, so far as I know them, men who speak the truth, and they are upright, and many of them are foremost in great philanthropies and in churches; but that they all do not belong to that class every one knows.

In times when there is a great demand for labor, it is not so easy for such men to keep their obligations, because they may miscalculate in regard to the weather, or they may not be able to get the help they anticipated in their enterprise. I am speaking now of those who promise to do that which they know they will not be able to do. They say they will come on Monday; they do not come until Wednesday. They say they will come Wednesday; they do not come until Saturday. They say they will have the job done in ten days; they do not get it done before thirty. And then when a man becomes irritated and will not stand it any longer, then they go and work for him a day or two and keep the job along; and then some one else gets irritated and outraged and they go and work for that man and get him pacified, and then they go somewhere else. I believe they call that

"NURSING THE JOB!"

Ah, my friends, how much dishonor such men would save their souls if they would promise to do only that which they know they can do. "Oh," they say, "it's of no importance; everybody expects to be deceived and disappointed." There is a voice of thunder sounding among the saws and the hammers and the shears saying: "All liars shall have their place in the lake that burns with fire and brimstone." So in all styles of work there are those who are not worthy of their work.

IV. I pass on to speak of SOCIAL LIES.

How much of society is insincere. You hardly know what to believe. They send their regards; you do not exactly know whether it is an expression of the heart, or an external civility. They ask you to come to their house; you hardly know whether they really want you to come. We are all accustomed to take a discount off of what we hear.

"Not at home" very often means too lazy to dress. I was reading this morning of a lady who said she had told her last fashionable lie. There was a knock at her door and she sent word down, "Not at home." That night her husband said to her: "Mrs. So-and-so is dead." "Is it possible?" she said. "Yes, and she died in great anguish of mind; she wanted to see you so very much; she had something very important to disclose to you in her last hour, and she sent three times to-day, but found you absent every time." Then this woman bethought herself that she had had a bargain with her neighbor that when the long-protracted sickness was about to come to an end, she would appear at her bedside and take the secret that was to be disclosed. And she had said she was "Not at home."

Social life is struck through with insincerity. They apologize for the fact that the furnace is out; they have not had any fire in it all winter. They apologize for the fare on their table; they never live any better. They decry their most luxuriant entertainment to win a shower of approval from you. They point at a picture on the walk as a work of one of the old masters. They say it is an heirloom in the family. It hung on the wall of a castle. A duke gave it to their grandfather! People that will lie about nothing else will lie about a picture. On small income we want the world to believe we are affluent, and society to-day is struck through with cheat and counterfeit and sham.

HOW FEW PEOPLE ARE NATURAL!

Frigidity sails around, iceberg grinding against iceberg. You must not laugh outright; that is vulgar. You must smile. You must not dash quickly across the room; that is vulgar. You must glide. Society is a round of bows and grins and grimaces and oh's and ah's and he, he, he's and simperings and namby pambyism, a whole world of which is not worth one good honest round of laughter. From such a hollow scene the tortured guest retires at the close of the evening, assuring the host that he has enjoyed himself. Society is become so contorted and deformed in this respect that a mountain cabin where the rustics gather at a quilting or an apple-paring has in it more good cheer than all the frescoed refrigerators of the metropolis.

V. I pass on to speak of

those which are told for the advancement or retarding of a church or sect. It is hardly worth your while to ask an extreme Calvinist what an Arminian believes. He will tell you an Arminian believes that man can save himself. An Arminian believes no such thing. It is hardly worth your while to ask an extreme Arminian what a Calvinist believes. He will tell you that a Calvinist believes that God made some men just to damn them. A Calvinist believes no such thing.

It is hardly worth your while to ask a Pedo-Baptist what a Baptist believes. He will tell you a Baptist believes that immersion is necessary for salvation. A Baptist does not believe any such thing. It is hardly worth your while to ask a man, who very much hates Presbyterians, what a Presbyterian believes. He will tell you that a Presbyterian believes that there are infants in hell a span long, and that very phraseology has come down from generation to generation in the Christian Church. There never was a Presbyterian who believed that. "Oh," you say, "I heard some Presbyterian minister twenty years ago say so." You did not. There never was a man who believed that, there never will be a man who will believe that. And yet from boyhood I have heard that particular slander against a Christian Church going down through the community.

Then how often it is that there are misrepresentations on the part of individual churches in regard to other churches—especially if a church comes to great prosperity. As long as a church is in poverty, and the singing is poor and all the surroundings are decrepit, and the congregation are so hardly bestead in life that their pastor goes with elbows out, then there will always be Christian people in churches who say, "what a pity, what a pity!" But let the day of prosperity come to a Christian Church, and let the music be triumphant, and let there be vast assemblages, and then there will be even ministers of the Gospel critical and denunciatory and full of misrepresentation and falsification, giving the impression to the outside world that they do not like the corn because it is not ground in their mill. Oh, my friends, let us in all departments of life stand back from deception.

"Oh," says some one, "the deception that I practice is so small it don't amount to anything." Ah, my friends, it does amount to a great deal. You say, "when I deceive it is only about a case of needles, or a box of buttons, or a row of pins." But the article may be so small you can put it in your vest pocket, but the sin is as big as the pyramids, and the echo of your dishonor will reverberate through the mountains of eternity. There is no such thing as a small sin. They are all vast and stupendous, because they will all have to come under inspection in the Day of Judgment.

You may boast yourself of having made a fine bargain, a sharp bargain. You may carry out what the Bible says in regard to that man who went in to make a purchase and depreciated the value of the goods, and then after he had got away boasted of the splendid bargain he had made. "It is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer; but when he is gone his way, then he boasteth." It may seem to the world a sharp bargain, but the recording angel wrote down in the ponderous tomes of eternity: "Mr. So-and-so, doing business on Fulton Street, or Atlantic Street, or Broadway, or Chestnut Street, or State Street, or Mrs. So-and-so, keeping house on the Heights, or on the Hill, or on Beacon Street, or on Rittenhouse Square, told one lie."

May God extirpate from society all the ecclesiastical lies, and all the social lies, and all the mechanical lies, and all the commercial lies, and all the agricultural lies, and make every man to speak the truth of his neighbor. My friends, let us make our life correspond to what we are. Let us banish all deception from our behavior. Let us remember that the time comes when God will demonstrate before an assembled universe just what we are. The secret will come out. We may hide it while we live, but we cannot hide it when we die.

To many life is

A MASQUERADE BALL.

As at such entertainment gentlemen and ladies appear in garb of kings or queens or mountain bandits, or clowns, and then at the close of the dance put off their disguise, so many all through life are in mask. The masquerade ball goes on, and gemmed hand clasps gemmed hand, and dancing feet respond to dancing feet, and gleaming brow bends to gleaming brow, and the masquerade ball goes on.

But after a while the languor comes to the feet and blurs the sight. Lights lower. Floor hollow with selpulchural echo. Music saddens into a wail. Lights lower. Now the masquerade is hardly seen. The fragrance is exchanged for the sickening odor of garlands that have lain a long while in the damp of sepulchres. Lights lower. Mists fill the room. The scarf drops from the shoulder of beauty, a shroud. Lights lower. Torn leaves and withered garlands now hardly cover up the ulcered feet. Stench of lamp wicks almost quenched. Choking dampness. Chilliness. Feet still. Hands folded. Eyes shut. Voice hushed. LIGHTS OUT!

REV. C. H. SPURGEON ON AMERICA.

MR. SPURGEON presided on Tuesday, February 6th, at a meeting held in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London, to hear a lecture by Mr. C. Spurgeon, the son of the pastor, who recently visited this country. In the course of his address, introducing his son, Mr. Spurgeon said, the friends had come together to listen to an account of a visit to the United States. Speaking for himself, he had never been to America, and he did not suppose he ever should visit that land. He read some time since in one of the newspapers that the reason why he did not go to the United States was because he was afraid of the sea. That, however, happened to be altogether incorrect, for he never had the least fear of the sea, and always enjoyed to be upon it.

He would tell them the reason why he did not pay America a visit, and it was simply because he could not leave his people. Whenever he did go away it was for the benefit of his health, his aim being to prepare himself by rest for future work. He could not go away to work, and he was sure, after the experience of his son, that any minister of the Gospel who went to America must work night and day, speaking to crowds as long as he had any speech. And he could not afford to do that, for he found it as much as one poor body could do to fill the Tabernacle and keep on from week to week preaching Christ.

At the same time, he had many kind frinds in the United States, and hundreds of Americans visited the Tabernacle during the summer months; not a few popping into the vestry to shake him by the hand, and in this way he came to know the best Christian people of America, just as he also knew the best Christian people of Great Britain. His prayer was that God might abundantly bless the United States. America must be a wonderful country to take in such a quantity of rascaldom as it does without being spoiled. It was a country any young man should go to who was not getting on well in England. In the United States a man could get a freehold farm for what he would have to pay as one year's rental for a similar plot on this side of the Atlantic. There could hardly be a wiser action for a young man than to go away from the crowded country to turn up the wilderness and make it blossom as the rose.

All Christian friends must take a deep interest in America. He thought there were some two million Baptist church members on the west side of the Atlantic; in fact, he believed they were the largest denomination in that land of big churches. The missionary operations of the American Baptists were carried out upon a grand scale, and, what was most important, Baptist ministers remained faithful to the old-fashioned Gospel. Mr. Spurgeon having brought his introductory remarks to a close, offered a fervent prayer for a blessing upon "the multitudes of America who speak the mother tongue;" and pleaded that the only contention between the two countries might be which should do most for the Master.

Prayers for the Success of Christian Work in the Indian school at Carlisle, Pa., are asked by Mrs. E. G. Platt. She states that last year after the Week of Prayer, seventy-five among the 289 pupils were reported as hopefully Christian. Seventy of the pupils have left during the year and gone to their homes, and in their places there are 168 new arrivals. Many of these have need to be instructed in the first principles of the gospel. Among the pupils returned to their homes are several of those who have been converted. Some of them are married and are trying to establish Christian homes among their pagan people, others teaching, and others working with their hands as ensamples to the idlers around them. But these are only a few among the thousands of their different tribes, and Mrs. Platt begs that Christians will pray that the good work may go on and prosper.

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

AT the usual weekly meeting, held at Bethshan, London, on Wednesday, January 31st, after singing and prayer,

Mrs. Baxter said it was important to be quite clear about God's will in any matter, if we would pray in faith. She then read and commented on Matt. 8 : 1–17, and said, "The leper seems to have been the only one of all the sick who came to Jesus for healing who had any doubts as to His willingness; the rest appear to have taken it for granted. The ready response to him as well as to the servant who was at a distance was 'I will.' The day's work is summed up in verses 16, 17: 'He healed all that were sick that it might be fulfilled;' 'Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses,' that the redemption work might be accomplished. When we see further, that the blood of Jesus not only atones for, but cleanses us from all sin, by His taking possession of us and living out His life in us, and we have yielded ourselves to be cleansed, then we can bid all doubts the enemy brings up against us, depart; we know it is His will to cleanse. It is just as true that 'He bare our sicknesses,' that we might not bear them. Our healing is dependent on His glorious finished work, not on our worthiness, or our prayers. Can He fail us? Does He fail us? Then why are not all sick people healed? Just for the same reason that so many souls are unsaved, and so many believers are unsanctified. The work is complete for all, but all do not put in their claim."

A CRIPPLED WOMAN HEALED.

Mrs. Baxter said: "I was in Grimsby last Sunday, and a large, stout woman came into my meeting on crutches, and got with difficulty into her seat; she had needed four persons to help her up the steps. At the close of the meeting she came forward for anointing, and afterward knelt down, the first time for eleven and a half years, to give thanks. We helped her up, and when offered her crutches, she said, 'I don't want these any more, I'm trusting Jesus,' and walked down the long hall alone without any support."

An elderly woman said: "I have known the Lord for twenty-eight years, but I knew there was something I had not reached. I knew God's love to me, but I wanted to have a Saviour always. I was suffering very acute pain in my knee, injured when I was thrown out of a gig many years ago, and the doctor said I should never use it again. I went one day to the old Bethshan to return thanks for my daughters, and said to myself, 'Shall I rise and ask prayer? O Jesus, say to my heart, "Believest thou that I am able?" and I will say "Yes." ' I knew I was healed, though I still felt pain, but I walked away with a firm step; and now I am quite healed. But this was not all; I wanted to praise Him as a perfect Healer. It might be said that what I had suffered from for years was only weakness; for sixteen years I have never enjoyed such good health as now, walking eight or nine miles on the leg they said I should never use again. One evening I fell down-stairs, and laid very ill all night, unable to think of my Healer. I was to be taken to the hospital in the morning, and then remembering my knee, I said 'Lord, I believe.' I got up with much suffering, knelt down on one knee, the other was too much injured, but I said,

'LORD, I MUST KNEEL ON BOTH KNEES,' and I did so, and rose and did the hardest day's work I ever did in my life, preparing for lodgers coming in, instead of going to the hospital. But the gladness that filled my soul I cannot possibly describe, and I never knew before."

Miss Green said: "A woman at Ressingland, given up by the doctor, came to my meeting, was anointed, and as she went home she was healed, and so filled with the spirit of God that she testified in the chapel. Many were blessed, and her husband was converted."

An elderly man said: "This case has come under my own observation. A neighbor of mine, Mrs. Keeble, was very ill. Healing by faith was brought before her, and I advised her, 'If you can get to Bethshan, go, that's your place.' She came and stayed one week, and is quite healed. Her husband says she is much better than when she left Bethshan."

SPINAL COMPLAINT CURED.

The landlord of some houses at Dalston said: "I collect my rents once a quarter. One of my houses is occupied by a widow with two sons and two daughters. One of those young women I always found lying on a sofa from spinal complaint. But I found her one day walking about the room, and asked, 'How is this?' She said, 'I thank God that He has healed me.' She had long wondered if it were right to make bodily ailments the subject of prayer; resolved to study her Bible, and concluded it was right. So she prayed to God if it were His will, to restore her, and immediately after she was cured, and has been able to walk about ever since."

LORD RADSTOCK'S TESTIMONY.

Lord Radstock said: "A lady who had been under fifteen doctors asked me to pray for her. We knelt but I could not, and said to her, 'I can't pray for you. Is there any hindrance? Is it all right between you and God's children? Is all bright between you and God?' 'There is a little mist between.' 'Let us see what it is.' We continued in prayer, and after a little time she said, 'I see, I have been charging others with bitterness, while I have felt bitter myself.' She became occupied with God's purifying her from this, and forgot about her body; but at the end of a week she was perfectly healed. Another case I know illustrates the same principle. A lady well-known in Christian work was condemned by two doctors as incurable from internal tumor. She sent for me and another Christian to pray over her, but she did not send for the Christians of the place. Again I felt no liberty in prayer. In the evening I went to a prayer-meeting, held by the Christians of the place, and requested prayer to be made for her, and this time we had liberty. She said, 'While you were down-stairs I grew better.' Now she is quite well."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE MOODY AND SANKEY MEETINGS IN EUROPE.

The Best Binding for a Bible.—At a Recent meeting Mr. Duncan related the two following anecdotes: "A good woman was shown a gorgeously-bound Bible. It was finished in the finest and richest manner. Smiling, she said, 'My Bible is far better bound than that.' 'What; you, a poor woman, have got a better finished Bible than this!' 'Yes,' she answered, 'for mine is bound up in the innermost folds of my heart.' "

A Tippler's Prayer.—"I Remember a Poor victim of drink telling a Christian woman how he had been struggling against the desire for it, and had prayed to God with the tears streaming down his face. The good woman turned round on him, saying, 'I'll tell you how it was your prayer was not answered.' 'How was it?' 'Because the desire for grace was not so strong as the craving for drink. If you really renounce the cup, your prayer will be heard.' There is a good truth here—safe and wholesome. What should we think of a man who deliberately thrust his head into the lion's mouth, or his hand into a den of rattlesnakes, and then pray God to keep him from being harmed! Prayer is a duty, undoubtedly, so also is the admonition to 'Flee from evil and pass by it.' "

A Hallelujah Meeting on a Troop ship.—Mr. Mathers, who acted as a Scripture-reader to the troops in Egypt, said: "We had a grand meeting on board the troop ship France at Ismailia. We commenced singing, and in a few minutes several hundred men gathered round us and we preached the Gospel of Christ for about an hour. We then thought the service was all over, but a soldier called out to me, 'Jamie, let's have a hallelujah meeting! it's perhaps the last time we shall have one together!' 'Amen,' I said. Then eight or nine men stood up and told us what the Lord had done for them. It is something very different standing up among a lot of soldiers, most of whom do not sympathize with and speak for the Master, from standing up in a meeting, where all are professed lovers of Christ. Sure enough, it was the last time we all met together, for many who were strong and healthy that day were soon laid beneath the sands of the pitiless desert."

A March with the Artillery.—"During the whole night previous to the assault on Tel-el-Kebir, we marched with the artillery. It was not the fatigue which told on the men, but the suspense. When we reached the trenches that the 'Black Watch' crossed, they seemed full of dying and dead men. There lay Sergeant Major McNeil, dying, and I had the privilege of giving him the last drop of water which he ever drank in this world. Just on the outside a dear man who belonged to Aberdeen was dying, with six dead men lying near him. After giving him a drop of water, I said in his ear, 'God loves you,' and the whispered reply was 'Yes—it—is—only—Jesus—can—do—me—any—good—now. Then his spirit fled from the mangled body to God, who, in His own good time will raise the body destroyed by the devilry of war, and make it a partaker of resurrection glory."

An Aged Sinner's Dying Cry.—Major Colquhoun said: "Last night a young man came to the church and requested that a worker might be sent to speak to a dying man. Two workers went, although it was very late. The message of salvation, through Christ, was faithfully delivered, and as an example of Christ's power to love, even at the last moment, the instance of the thief on the cross was given. With deep, deep emotion the old man cried out, 'Lord, remember me a sinner.' We do trust that God heard the cry from that penitent man and gave him peace, even though upon the very threshold of eternity. What an awful risk for any man to run!"

Converted Near the Jail.—The Rev. James Scott said: "At a recent meeting of our open-air workers in James Morrison Street Hall, one of the members of the band said, 'If encouragement is wanted, I will tell you the history of my conversion. One night when you were singing in Jail Square, I was passing by, and heard the hymn, "Have you been to Jesus for the cleansing power?" The brother who is conducting this meeting exclaimed at the finish, "Have you been to Jesus?" Some way or other these words fascinated me, and I followed you up to the Hall, and entered. I did not know what I was doing, or what I wanted, I got so confused; but that brother' (pointing to another worker) 'got me on a seat and pointed me to Christ. Since then, I have been working steadily for the Master.' "

A Tramp that Stole the Bedding.—Mr. Drys- dale said: "Some time ago an instance occurred which shows the overruling care of God in all His children's affairs. A farmer and his wife on the hills of Ayrshire were in the habit of providing a supper and a bed in the barn for any tramp who asked for it, until a number of dishonest people heard of their hospitality, and, not content with getting refreshment and shelter, actually stole the blankets and sheets. One morning the worthy couple decided that no more tramps should obtain shelter from them. The day was stormy outside, and inside, the farmer and his wife were as miserable as the day. Their kind hearts were oppressed with the hard decision they made in the morning. Night drew on, dark, cold, and stormy. As they sat at the fireside, a knock was heard at the door. The good man opened it and saw a poor being, drenched with rain and shivering with cold. Tremblingly he asked for a night's shelter. The farmer could not turn the man away, but he said to the tramp, 'We have never yet refused a bite and sup to any who asked for it, but we have been robbed of our bed-clothing till we have very little left. What guarantee have we that you won't rob us like the rest?' 'The Lord will be my guarantee,' said the man. 'You cannot have a better; come in.' They gave him a good supper, changed his wet rags for a suit of the farmer's, and made up a bed for him in the barn. Long before dawn their guest had flown with his bedding and the farmer's suit. He had not gone far when a heavy mist settled down on the hills and bewildered him, so that he wandered aimlessly about all day, until night, when he saw a light quite near. It put new vigor into his frame, and he hurried toward it. When he reached the door and knocked, it was opened by his host of the previous night, who saluted him with, 'Come in; I knew your guarrantor would send you back.'"

THE CHARACTERISTICS AND CONTRASTS OF THE COMING KINGDOM.

By Rev. William Maude.

IV.—THE KINGDOM OF LIGHT.

A Night of Darkness—The Knowledge Promised to Glorified Christians—Not Omniscience—A Suggestive Illustration—The Light of the Coming Kingdom—I. Physically—Isaiah's Emphatic Prophecy—Opinions of the Late Mr. Lister—1. The Purification of the Atmospheric Heaven—The Light of the Planet Mercury—2. A New Source of Light—Promises Referring to it—3. Additional Facilities—Production of Artificial Light — II. Intellectually — Present Knowledge to be Far Transcended—Dr. Watts's Suggestion—Professors in the Universities of the Coming Kingdom—III. Spiritually — The Earth Flooded with Light—The Contrast.

IN a former paper of this series I ventured to enumerate the four great wants of our sinning and sorrowing world as being respectively—peace, righteousness, power, and light. How and when the first three are to be met has already been set forth; and it only remains for me, in this the concluding article, to adduce the Scriptural proof that the kingdom of the heavens, which the multiplying and converging signs of the times so fully warrant us in believing is even now at hand, will also meet the fourth of the world's great wants as being emphatically The Kingdom of Light.

It is the habit of the Scriptures to speak of the whole period of the world's history, from the fall of man to the Second Advent of the Lord Jesus Christ, as one of night or darkness. The night fell, to speak metaphorically, when Adam and Eve were driven out of Paradise; and from that hour to the present it may, with saddest truth, be said, that "darkness has covered the earth, and gross darkness the people." A gracious lifting of this world-darkness took place, indeed, when Christ came into the world, so that the Apostle John could say to the Christians of his day, "The darkness is passing away, and the true light already shineth." (1 John 2:8, R. V.) But still, more widely and generally speaking, the darkness has continued to reign. Satan is still, with his infernal coadjutors, world-ruler of this present darkness (Eph. 6:12); believers are "delivered from the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son." (Col. 1:13.) What a commentary on the condition of the heathen world, even at this moment, are the words of the Psalmist! "The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty" (Ps. 74:20); though to the waiting saint are addressed the cheering, awakening words, "The night is far spent, the day is at hand; let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light."

THE INTELLECTUAL EQUIVALENT OF LIGHT

is, of course, knowledge; hence we find the Apostle Paul, in that sublime eulogium of love, which, apart from its inspiration, stands almost alone amid the master-pieces of human eloquence, writing thus: "Now we see in a mirror, darkly; but then face to face; now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I have been known." (1 Cor. 13:12, R. V.) Here, observe, we have the faculties of sight and knowledge regarded as equivalents; to see dimly, as we do now, is the same thing as understanding partially; and so, on the other hand, to see clearly, or face to face, is the same thing as having a complete and comprehensive knowledge. The apostle's language, while deeply instructive, is somewhat difficult of interpretation. In endeavoring to ascertain and express his actual meaning, I may safely begin by observing that at least one thing is plain; the apostle cannot possibly mean that even the glorified saint in heaven is hereafter to become possessed of that attribute of omniscience which is the exclusive prerogative of God—the Infinite One. What, then, does Paul design to teach us when he so distinctly says, "Then shall I know fully (so the Greek) even as I have been known fully"?

I think his meaning may best be understood by the aid of an illustration, which should, however, be a diagram. If we conceive of any object of sense, or subject of thought, as a circle drawn on a flat surface, and ourselves as intelligent eyes drawn on the same surface, beyond the circle but looking toward it; it is obvious that each of these eyes respectively will be able to see, not the entire circle, but only that segment thereof which is immediately opposite to it. Thus our present knowledge is always partial; we never see, so to speak, all round a thing. But let the eye be elevated above the circle, so as to look down upon it instead of sideways, and the whole circle will become visible; we shall see a thing—know a thing—fully, all round, even as God knows it; though between His range of vision and ours there may be more difference than there is between the circumference of the smallest coin and that of the sidereal heavens, and more intensity than there is in the noon-day sun as compared with its image reflected in a morning dew-drop.

THE LIGHT OF THE COMING KINGDOM.

In such wise then, at least as far as the inhabitants of the New Jerusalem are concerned, will the Coming Kingdom, for which we are taught continually to pray, saying, "Our Father, who art in heaven, Thy kingdom come," be the "Kingdom of Light." And think for a moment how much that is most blessed and consolatory is involved in this thought. Is not the partial, fragmentary character of all our knowledge not only one great cause of the thousand ills and hardships which mar our earthly life and hasten its termination, but also the bitter root whence, in a large measure, spring our manifold controversies even regarding spiritual things? So that even among those who love Him, His seamless robe of truth—the truth as it is revealed in Jesus—is rent asunder by angry hands, each party claiming that the fragment which they possess, and that alone, represents the whole. But in the Coming Kingdom it shall not be so; for then the "light" which is even now "sown for the righteous," shall attain its meridian splendor, and the glorious promise will be abundantly fulfilled, "In Thy light shall we see light."

But leaving this higher plane, and proceeding to consider this characteristic of the Coming Kingdom more widely and generally—for the light possessed by the glorified saints as the dwellers in the New Jerusalem will be one thing and that possessed by the saved nations still living in the flesh upon the earth quite another, at least, in measure; it may be said that it will be the Kingdom of Light in the three following respects: First, Physically; second, intellectually; third, spiritually.

I. Strange as it may at the first suggestion appear, it is nevertheless clearly revealed that one of the characteristics of Christ's Millennial kingdom will be a vast

INCREASE OF PHYSICAL LIGHT.

This we learn from Isaiah 30:26: "Moreover the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be sevenfold, as the light of seven days, in the day that the Lord bindeth up the breach of His people, and healeth the stroke of their wound." Of course it may be, and in point of fact is, said that "this is only figurative language, Oriental poetry," but on this point I am disposed to agree with the late Mr. Lister when he says, in his valuable Physico-Prophetical Essays, "I confess, I see no other alternative than to take these words literally. It is customary, we know, to regard the whole passage as 'an emblematical prediction of spiritual blessings'; and numbers are satisfied with that use of the expression, without considering how far it really meets the case, and without attending to the grave and formidable objections which are ready to present themselves against such a mode of treating the passage. What, for instance, are we to understand by the 'moon,' and what by the 'sun'? Of what are they symbols? It is necessary, if symbols, to give a distinct and separate meaning to each, or the passage is made ridiculous; yet none of our figurative interpreters, that I am acquainted with, attempt this, but content themselves in this, as in other similar cases, with culling one general idea from the verse, leaving its particular expressions unattended to, as if it were quite unnecessary to suppose that they were designed to have any specific meaning. But anything more derogatory to the Word of God cannot be conceived than such a course. No more fatal blow could be directed against its Divine authority and plenary inspiration.

"It is, indeed, customary among those who favor the figurative principle of prophetic interpretation to regard the Sun as an emblem of the Church, or the ecclesiastical power, and the Moon of the civil power; but even supposing this be correct as a rule (which I altogether doubt), or to hold true in some cases (which I also question), yet it can scarcely be made to apply here; for on this supposition, or theory, What is that 'light,' enjoyed at present by the civil power, symbolized by the moon, which is hereafter to be increased until it reaches the amount at present enjoyed by the Church?

"I feel that nothing approaching to a satisfactory answer can be given to this question; and I cannot but regard such a mode of treating the subject as highly objectionable. I hold, therefore, that we are compelled to take this passage literally. And why should we not do so? What is there involved in such a conclusion that should make us hesitate in adopting it? It is clear that, as in a multitude of other cases, so, in this, we are deterred from taking the obviously right course through imaginary difficulties, conjured up by our present limited experience, and consequently contracted views. I confess that it seems to be our obvious duty in the present case to take the prediction in a literal sense. Let this be done, and there is no difficulty in understanding it. It plainly declares that the amount of physical light hereafter will be vastly increased beyond what prevails at present."

Why, indeed, as Mr. Lister asks, should we not believe this as a literal fact of the future; especially when three sufficient causes of the predicted phenomenon readily suggest themselves, without involving the supposition of any arbitrary and special exercise of miraculous power? The three causes referred to are the following:

1. THE PURIFICATION OF THE ATMOSPHERIC HEAVEN

consequent on the expulsion of Satan and of his demoniac host as revealed in Rev. 12:7-12. For it is freely admitted by modern scientists that were the electrical and aqueous conditions of our atmosphere somewhat changed, the amount of light received by the earth from the sun might be very nearly that which is now received by the planet Mercury. In reference to which planet Sir John Herschel says, remarkably enough, "His light is about seven times greater than that of the earth." Now, doubtless, when Satan and his angels are cast down, the air will not only be purified of those malefic germs and vapors which at present so injuriously affect both man and beast, but the electrical conditions upon which the diminution of light by reason of clouds and storms so largely depends, will be beneficially modified, and hence our heavens will be suffused with an intenser yet softer light, to the advantage both of vegetation and of human life.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Nominations of Civil Service Commissioners were sent to the Senate on February 20th. The President nominated Mr. Dorman B. Eaton, of New York, Professor John M. Gregory, of Illinois, and Judge Leroy D. Thoman, of Ohio. The importance of the work to be intrusted to this commission has concentrated public attention on its composition, and there has been much speculation as to the names that would be sent in by President Arthur. The selections, as might be expected, do not give satisfaction in all quarters, but it is gratifying to notice that the most influential and persistent advocates of civil service reform approve the nominations. It is, however, evident that the work of the commission will be closely watched and criticised, and it will largely depend on the wisdom and prudence with which it acts whether the experiment now about to be tried in the lower ranks of the service will be extended to higher branches. Mr. Dorman B. Eaton is a native of Vermont, but settled in New York in 1850, when he commenced the practice of law in partnership with Judge Kent. He has taken considerable interest for many years in the reform of the civil service, and in 1877 visited England to study the methods employed there. His report was printed by order of Congress. Rev. John M. Gregory, the second nominee, is a native of New York. He is sixty-one years of age. He studied law for two years, but at the end of that time he decided to relinquish that pursuit, and studied for the ministry. He was chosen principal of a large school in Detroit, Mich., and in 1858 he was elected by the Republican party of Michigan State Superintendent of Public Instruction, and served in that office three terms. He also served three years as President of Kalamazoo College. For a long time he has been President of the Illinois State Industrial University, an institution which he organized, and which has grown to the first rank under his management. Mr. Leroy D. Thoman, the third nominee, is a Democrat. It is understood that the President invited Senator Pendleton, the originator of the bill, to suggest the name of a Democrat for the third place in the commission, and that it was on his recommendation that Judge Thoman was nominated. He is about thirty-two years of age, and is very popular in his State. Though a Democrat he carried a Republican county when nominated for the Probate judgeship, and several of his decisions in important cases have stood the test of the Supreme Court.

The Senate Passed its Tariff Bill on Tuesday, February 20th, by a vote of 42 to 19. Ten Democrats, among whom were Senators Bayard Brown, Davis (of West Virginia) and Mc Pherson, voted with the Republicans in favor of the bill. The first five sections of the bill deal with the Internal Revenue and repeal the taxes on capital and deposits of banks and bankers, the stamp tax on bank checks, drafts, orders, and vouchers, and the tax on matches, perfumery and patent medicines, and reduce the taxes on tobacco, cigars and cigarettes. One hundred and two pages of the act deal with the tariff, but it would be impossible to summarize their effects. The numerous changes made in the bill at the demand of the manufacturers first in committee of the whole, and afterward in the Senate, have left the question of its general results a problem even to experts, and have eliminated whatever semblance of consistency there was originally in the measure. English books were almost at the last moment taken out of the free list, and a duty of fifteen per cent imposed. Books in foreign languages the bill leaves on the free list. In its present condition there is no great anxiety either among Free Traders or Protectionists as to whether it passes the House or not.

A Fatal Panic in a School in New York resulted in the death of sixteen children last week. On Tuesday, February 20th, about three in the afternoon, some visitors called at a Roman Catholic school in Fourth Street, and the teacher who admitted them noticed that the passage was full of smoke. On opening the door of a closet to ascertain the cause of the smoke, flames burst forth, and the alarm of fire was instantly given. Seven hundred children were in the building, which had five floors, and its exits were narrow staircases on each side. When the alarm was given a panic ensued. The fire cut off escape from the set of staircases on the east side, and consequently a rush was made for those on the west. As the children poured out from the lower floors, those on the upper floors came rushing down upon them, and many were flung forward into the basement. Then a fierce struggle took place, in the midst of which the balustrade of the staircase gave way and the children fell headlong to the floor beneath. There they lay in a pile five feet high, those at the top but little hurt, but those underneath were fearfully crushed and mangled. The fire was easily extinguished. Had an orderly march out taken place, all might have escaped. Sixteen little girls, the youngest of whom was six, and the eldest twelve, died on the spot or during the day, and many others were seriously injured. The spectacle was heartrending.

Deplorable Accounts of Suffering Continue to arrive from the districts devastated by the floods. At Cincinnati the river continued to fall throughout the week, and on Friday the railroads resumed work. But the destruction the water has worked in public and private property cannot yet be estimated. People returning to their homes found their clothing and furniture spoiled, and there are many sad cases of utter destitution reported. Thousands of tons of coal and large supplies of provisions were distributed by the relief committees. From Louisville, Ky., the reports say the damage done to property is immense, and the alarm as to the immediate future is not unfounded. Outside the city the situation is still more distressing. Farms are under water, houses and barns have been swept away, crops have been destroyed, and implements damaged. Unless assistance is rendered, the gravest suffering is inevitable. The water is now falling gradually. Great fears are occasioned by the rise of the Mississippi which at Memphis, Tenn., had on Saturday marked thirty-four feet four inches, a rise of three inches during the previous twenty-four hours. A telegram from that city says: Below, everything remains intact. None of the newly-built levees have given signs of weakness, and there is every confidence felt in their being able to stand the test. Accounts from above are less hopeful. It is now a certainty that all that country to the west of the Mississippi River from New Madrid, Mo., to Helena, Ark., an area of 225 miles in length, having a width of an average of forty miles, will be completely inundated, and the damage will be as serious to that section of country as was the great flood of last year. Large sums are being raised for the sufferers, and sent for distribution to the relief committees.

The Arrest of Mr. Salmi Morse, the Projector of the Passion Play, took place on Saturday last. Mr. Morse attempted to hold a full dress rehearsal of his play in spite of the notification he received from the police the previous week that in the absence of a license it could not take place. A large audience assembled by invitation in the hall he has hired to witness the rehearsal, but the police were present in force, and when the curtain was rung up, and the first words of the play were uttered, Mr. Morse was arrested. He was conveyed to the police station and charged with a violation of the Theatrical Act. Speeches were made in the hall in protest against the arrest, but there was no performance.

Rev. Paul A. Chadbourne, D.D., LL.D., the President of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, died on Friday, February 23d. He was on his way to attend the funeral of his friend, ex-Governor Morgan, when he was suddenly seized with severe pain. He was taken to the house of his brother-in-law in New York where he lay for several days, enduring great agony, from which he succumbed on Friday morning. Dr. Chadbourne was sixty years of age. He graduated at Williams College, at which he subsequently held the Professorship of Chemistry and Natural History. In 1866 he accepted the Presidency of Wisconsin University, but his health failing he accepted the offer of the Presidency of Bowdoin, and afterward that of Williams. He remained there ten years, at the close of which—in 1880—he accepted the Presidency of the Massachusetts Agricultural College. Dr. Chadbourne was an intimate friend of President Garfield, whose acquaintance he formed while the latter was a student at Williams.

The Will of the Late Hon. William E. Dodge contains a number of bequests for charitable objects. Mr. Dodge maintained for many years a fund for the education of young men for the ministry, and that fund is continued, $50,000 being set apart for it. To the already long list of subscriptions for foreign missions is added a gift to the American Board of Commissioners of $50,000. The same amount is also given to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. A number of other societies are legatees; among them the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, the National Temperance Society and Publication House, of which Mr. Dodge was President for seventeen years; the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut, whose corner-stone Mr. Dodge laid in 1872, the Young Men's Christian Association, the American Tract Society, the Metropolitan Museum of Art, and the Museum of Natural History in Central Park. The remaining bequests go to Southern institutions. Lincoln University, the Hampton and Carlisle Institutes, and the University at Atlanta, Ga., will get considerable amounts. The entire sum given for benevolent objects is about $350,000.

The Hospital Saturday and Sunday Collections realized in 1882 a smaller amount than the previous year. The accounts have now been closed, and the amount reported by the Treasurer as received is $32,262.72. To this should be added about $1600, which was collected in one of the city churches, but through some informality has not been turned over to the general treasurer, making the total collection about $33,862.72, as against $42,535.45 for 1881, $44,371.97 for 1880, and $26,455.07 for 1879. The deficiency is the result of several exceptional causes operating together.

A Remarkable Story in Connection with the death of ex-Governor Jewell is related by the Times of Hartford, Conn. It is stated that on the Friday before his death Mr. Jewell awoke from a sleep and inquired what was the matter at the residence of the Hon. William E. Dodge. (Mr. Jewell's daughter had married one of Mr. Dodge's sons, and the two gentlemen were on intimate terms.) Mr. Jewell's family had just received a telegram announcing the sudden and unlooked-for death of Mr. Dodge; but it was deemed best not to let him know that any such thing had happened, and his question was therefore evaded. But he continued to insist that something serious had happened, and would not rest until a telegram was sent making inquiries. The telegram was sent, but knowing that the truth would agitate the sick man, the sender so framed it as to elicit an answer which would keep up the deception. The reply came and was handed to the ex-Governor, but it failed to satisfy him. He continued firm in his conviction that some calamity had occurred, and remained until the hour of his death, twenty-four hours later, as firm in that belief as if he had witnessed the death of his friend. It would seem that in his case, as in that of other dying men, the mental powers instead of sharing in the weakness and collapse of the body, received additional strength and vigor. The apostle Paul's beautiful description of death would lead us to expect such a phenomenon (2 Cor. 5 : 1–9).

A Search for a Lady in the Mountains is described in a California journal. She left her home to look for some cattle belonging to her husband which were but a short distance away. It was a cold, freezing day, raining and snowing alternately. The woman was slightly near-sighted, and the stormy weather assisted in confusing her, and she became bewildered, and instead of going home, as she thought, she took the opposite direction and soon was hopelessly lost. About noon her husband became alarmed at her prolonged absence and went in search of her, and at night, not getting any trace of her, aroused the neighbors, and soon a dozen sturdy mountaineers were searching the rough mountain sides and deep gorges of Mount Day. The party searched faithfully till late in the afternoon, when one after another dropped off and returned home. But there was one man in that crowd—an old mountaineer—who determined not to quit the search while a ray of hope remained of finding her alive, and he was successful. He followed her for five miles from home. When found she was just sinking into an insensible sleep, which would have known no waking. The old man took off his shoes and covered her feet, from which her own shoes had worn away, built a fire, and warmed and rubbed her into semi-consciousness, and carried her to her home. So the Great Shepherd searches for His lost sheep on the mountains of sin and unbelief, and brings them home rejoicing (Matt. 18 : 12–14).

A Thrilling Narrative is Told by a Party of sailors who arrived in New York on Saturday last in the Republic of the White Star Line. On Friday, February 16th, the captain of the Republic took them off the steamer Glamorgan, which left Liverpool for Boston eight days before. The rescued men state that the Glamorgan was struck by a heavy sea on February 14th. It came over in a solid body, piled many feet above the deck and swept aft. The foremast went by the board, with a crash, and dropped into the sea on the lee side, carrying shrouds and all with it. The hatches were torn off, and tons of water poured into the hold. Every boat was swept from the davits, and all the rail followed. Reaching the house amidships, the sea broke in the bulkeads, and swept overboard the cabin and all of the rooms on the port side. On the starboard side all the rooms forward were destroyed. The engine room was flooded and the fires put out. The waves swept the captain, one of his officers and several of the crew overboard, and they were all drowned. During the next two days the remainder of the crew managed to keep the steamer afloat, but the next day she commenced filling again, and was sinking when the Republic came to their rescue. The violence of the storm was so great that one of the rescuing party was drowned, and three of the Republic's boats were stove in, in the attempt to deliver the men from a watery grave. The spectacle of the sinking ship, with its battered hull and broken masts, its boats swept away, and its captain drowned, might serve as a type of this ruined world which Christ left Heaven to save. But there was no man on the Glamorgan that neglected the chance of escape (Heb. 2 : 3).

A Montana Stage Driver's Device Saved the life of a passenger recently. A local journal states that a woman was the only passenger in the stage except her baby, whom she wrapped in her fur cloak, leaving herself unprotected from the zero temperature. The driver saw that she was benumbed and would freeze to death unless roused to violent exercise. He dragged her from the coach and left her by the roadside. "Oh, my baby!" she cried. The driver cracked his whip. The stage flew over the snow with the woman running after. The race was kept up for nearly two miles, when the driver took the mother in again and wrapped his coat around her. He had warmed her blood and saved her life. When she felt herself dragged from the coach and separated from her child, she doubtless thought the stage driver very cruel; but now she knows that his apparent cruelty was the truest kindness. So, when our eyes are opened, shall we look back at certain dealings of Providence we are apt now to speak of as inscrutable (Romans 8 : 28).

A Revolver Produced at a Revival Service gave evidence of the faithfulness of the preacher, on the evening of February 23d, at Wytheville, Va. It appears that at one of the meetings held in connection with a revival near that city the minister expounded the Parable of "the Prodigal Son." When he began to preach about the evils of dissipation, a young man rose and said: "I will not stand those reflections on me," and, drawing a revolver, he declared that if the minister did not stop he would shoot him. A magistrate shouted "Order!" and several stalwart farmers started toward the young man, who made a desperate resistance and escaped. He was dissipated, and thought that the clergyman was alluding to him. If the young man had been sick and a physician had diagnosed his physcial disease as exactly as the preacher appears to have done his spiritual complaint, he would not have been angry, but would have been eager to accept the remedy prescribed. But it is now, as it was in the days of Christ, men will not come to Him that they might have life (Matt. 23 : 37).

The Fidelity of a Convict's Dogs Appears likely to gain their owner's release from prison. A Southern journal says that at Plymouth, N. C., there is in jail a man who, previous to his incarceration, devoted much of his time to hunting, and owned two dogs which were so strongly devoted to their master that they never left him, even during his trial, except when driven away. When the prisoner was finally locked up in his cell for his term, his two dogs took their position on the outside of the prison building, and have remained there day after day unmolested. This faithful devotion of the dogs has attracted such admiration from the people of Plymouth that a kennel has been built for them. At night they wander away for something to eat, but the coming day finds them at their post. An effort is being made to induce the Governor of the State to pardon the man, and it will probably be successful. We have heard of convicts being pardoned for the sake of their families, but this is probably the first time that the affection of animals has been used as a plea. Nevertheless, if the story of this touching fidelity melted the Governor's heart it would surprise no one, not even those who profess themselves unable to believe the doctrine of the Atonement. Yet what an infinitely better plea for forgiveness the Christian presents (Eph. 4 ; 32).

HANDS FULL OF HONEY.

A New Sermon, by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And Samson turned aside to see the carcass of the lion: and, behold, there was a swarm of bees and honey in the carcass of the lion. And he took thereof in his hands, and went on eating, and came to his father and mother, and he gave them, and they did eat: but he told not them that he had taken the honey out of the carcass of the lion."—JUDGES 14 : 8, 9.

A Remarkable Story—Samson Himself a Riddle—A Subject for a Painter—A Type of Jesus—I. The Believer's Life Has its Conflicts—They Begin Early—Are Often Terrible—Find Him Unprepared—The Victory Won by the Spirit—II. The Believer's Life Has its Sweets—Often Found on the Scene of Conflict—III. Led to Communicate the Sweets—Immediately—To Those Nearest Him—As Best He Could—With Modesty—An American Sunday School Address—Riddles Ending in Fighting.

IT was a singular circumstance that a man unarmed should have slain a lion in the prime of its vigor; and yet more strange that a swarm of bees should have taken possession of the dried carcass, and have filled it with their honey. In that country, what with beasts, birds, and insects, and the dry heat, a dead body is soon cleansed from all corruption, and the bones are clean and white; still the killing of the lion, and the finding of the honey, make up a remarkable story. These singular circumstances became afterward the subject of a riddle; but with that riddle we have no concern at this time. Samson himself is a riddle. He was not only a riddle-maker; but he was himself an enigma very difficult to explain; with his personal character I have at this time little or nothing to do.

We are not to-day resting at the house of "Gaius, mine host," where the pilgrims amused themselves with a dish of nuts after dinner; but we are on the march, and must attend to the more important matter of refreshing and inspiriting those who are in our company. Neither are we going to discuss difficulties; but as Samson took the honey without being stung, so would we gain instruction without debate. We have in these days so much to do, that we must make practical use of every incident that comes before us in the Word of God. My one design is to cheer the desponding and stir up all God's people to greater diligence in His service. I conceive that the text may legitimately be employed for this purpose. By the help of the Divine Spirit, even after this lapse of time, we may find honey in the lion.

The particular part of the incident which is recorded in these two verses appears to have been passed over by those who have written upon Samson's life; I suppose it appeared to be too inconsiderable. They are taken up with his festive riddle, but they omit the far more natural and commendable fact of his bringing forth the honey in his hands and presenting it to his father and mother. This is the little scene to which I direct your glances. It seems to me that the Israelitish hero with a slain lion in the background, standing out in the open road with his hands laden with masses of honeycomb and dripping with honey, which he holds out to his parents, makes a fine picture, worthy of the greatest artist.

A TYPE OF JESUS.

And what a type we have here of our Divine Lord and Master, Jesus, the conqueror of death and hell. He has destroyed the lion that roared upon us and upon Him. He has shouted "victory" over all our foes. "It is finished" was His note of triumph; and now He stands in the midst of His church with His hands full of sweetness and consolation, presenting them to those of whom He says, "these are my brother, and sister, and mother."

But, beloved, it is written, "As he is, so are we also in this world." All that are true Christians are, in a measure, like the Christ whose name they bear, and it is to His image that we are finally to be conformed. When He shall appear we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is; and meanwhile, in proportion as we see Him now, "we are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." The Samson type may well serve as the symbol of every Christian in the world. The believer has been helped by divine grace in his spiritual conflicts, and he has known "the victory which overcometh the world, even our faith." He has thus been made more than a conqueror through Him that loved us, and now he stands in the midst of his fellow-men inviting them to Jesus.

With the honey in his hands, which he continues still to feast upon, he displays the heavenly sweetness to all that are round about him, saying, "Oh, taste and see that the Lord is good; blessed is the man that trusteth in him." I have before now met with that popular artist, Gustave Doré, and suggested subjects to him. Had he survived among us, and had another opportunity occurred, I would have pressed him to execute a statue of Samson handing out the honey; strength distributing sweetness; and it might have served as a perpetual reminder of what a Christian should be—a Conqueror and a Comforter, slaying lions and distributing honey. The faithful servant of God wrestles with the powers of evil; but with far greater delight he speaks to his friends and companions, saying, "Eat ye that which is good, and let your souls delight themselves in sweetness." Set the statue before your mind's eye, and now let me speak about it.

Three touches may suffice. First, the believer's life has its conflicts; secondly, the believer's life has its sweets; and, thirdly, the believer's life leads him to communicate of those sweets to others. Here is room for profitable meditation.

I. First, then, the believer's

LIFE HAS ITS CONFLICTS.

To become a Christian is to enlist for a soldier. To become a believer is to enter upon a pilgrimage, and the road is often rough; the hills are steep, the valleys are dark, giants block the way, and robbers lurk in corners. The man who reckons that he can glide into heaven without a struggle has made a great mistake. No cross no crown; no sweat no sweet; no conflict no conquest. These conflicts, if we take the case of Samson as our symbol, begin early in the life of the believer. While Samson was a child, the Spirit of the Lord moved him in the camps of Dan—see the last verse of the thirteenth chapter; and as soon as he was on the verge of manhood, he must match himself with a lion.

Yes, and the young believer, who as yet has not wrestled with the powers of darkness, will not be long before he hears the roar of the lion, and finds himself in the presence of the great Adversary. Very soon we learn the value of the prayer, "Deliver us from the evil one!" Most of the Lord's servants have been men of war from their youth up. Without are fightings even when within there are no fears. This early combat with the savage beast was intended by God to let him know his strength when under the influence of the Spirit, and to train him for his future combats with Israel's enemies.

These conflicts, dear friends, may often be

VERY TERRIBLE.

By a young lion is not meant a whelp, but a lion in the fulness of its early strength; not yet slackened in its pace, or curbed in its fury by growing years. Fresh and furious, a young lion is the worst kind of beast that a man can meet with. Let us expect as followers of Christ to meet with strong temptations, fierce persecutions, and severe trials, which will lead to stern conflicts. A young believer will, on a sudden, have a doubt suggested to him of which he never heard before; and it will roar upon him like a young lion; neither will he see all at once how to dispose of it. Or he may be placed in singular circumstances where his duty seems to run counter to the tenderest instincts of his nature; here, too, the young lion will roar upon him. Or, one for whom he has an intense respect may treat him ill because he is a follower of Christ, and the affection and respect which he feels for this person may make his opposition the more grievous; in this also it is with him as when a lion roareth. Or, he may suffer a painful bereavement, or sustain a severe loss; or he may have a disease upon him, with consequent pains and depressions, and these may cast the shadow of death upon his spirit; so that again a young lion roars upon him.

These conflicts come early, and they are very terrible; and, moreover, they happen to us for them. Samson was not hunting for wild beasts; he was engaged on a much more tender business. He was walking in the vineyards of Timnath, thinking of anything but lions, and "behold," says the Scripture, "a young lion roared against him." It was a remarkable and startling occurrence. He had left his father and mother and was quite alone; no one was within call to aid him in meeting his furious assailant. Human sympathy is exceedingly precious, but there are points in our spiritual conflict in which we cannot expect to receive it. To each man there are passages in life too narrow for walking two abreast. Upon certain crags we must stand alone.

WHEN WE ARE LEAST PREPARED

As our constitutions differ, so our trials, which are suited to our constitutions, must differ also. Each individual has a secret with which no friend can intermeddle; for every life has its mystery and its hid treasure. Do not be ashamed, young Christian, if you meet with temptations which appear to you to be quite singular; we have each one thought the same of his trials. You imagine that no one suffers as you do, whereas no temptation hath happened unto you but such as is common to man, and God will with the temptation make a way of escape that you may be able to bear it. Yet for the time being you may have to enter into fellowship with your Lord when He trod the winepress alone, and of the people there was none with Him.

Is not this for your good? Is not this the way to strength? What kind of piety is that which is dependent upon the friendship of man? What sort of religion is that which cannot stand alone? Beloved, you will have to die alone, and you need therefore grace to cheer you in solitude. The dear wife can attend you weeping to the river's brink, but into the chill stream she cannot go with you; and if you have not a religion which will sustain you in the solitudes of life, of what avail will it be to you in the grim lonesomeness of death? Thus I reckon it to be a happy circumstance that you are called to solitary conflict that you may test your faith, and see of what stuff your hope is made.

Now, go one step further, for time forbids our lingering here. I invite you to remember that it was by the Spirit of God that

THE VICTORY WAS WON.

We read, "And the Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him, and he rent him as he would have rent a kid." Let the Holy Spirit help us in our trouble and we need neither company nor weapon; but without Him what can we do? Good Bishop Hall says, "If that roaring lion, that goes about continually seeking whom he may devour, find us alone among the vineyards of the Philistines, where is our hope? Not in our heels, he is swifter than we; not in our weapons, we are naturally unarmed; not in our hands, which are weak and languishing; but in the Spirit of God, by whom we can do all things. If God fight in us, who can resist us? There is a stronger lion in us than that against us."

Sometimes our conflict is with past sin. We doubtfully inquire, "How can it be forgiven?" The temptation vanishes before a sight of the dying Redeemer. Then inbred lust roars against us, and we overcome it through the blood of the Lamb, for "the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin." Sometimes a raging corruption, or a strong habit, wars upon us, and then we conquer by the might of the sanctifying Spirit of God, who is with us and shall be in us evermore. Or else it is the world which tempts, and our feet have almost gone; but we overcome the world through the victory of faith: and if Satan raises against us the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, all at once we are still delivered, for the Lord is a wall of fire round about us. Wherefore, with a lion-like spirit, meet lions which seek to devour you.

II. Now, then, we come to our second head, which is: the believer's

LIFE HAS ITS SWEETS.

We are not always killing lions, we are sometimes eating honey. Certain of us do both at a time; we kill lions and yet cease not to eat honey; and truly it has become so sweet a thing to enter into conflict for Christ's sake, that it is a joy to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. The same Lord who hath bidden us "quit yourselves like men; be strong," has also said, "Rejoice, in the Lord alway; and again I say, rejoice."

Of these joys there is plenty; for Samson found, as it were, a living spring of honey, since he discovered a swarm of bees. So abundant was the honey that he could take huge masses of the comb and carry it in his hands, and go away with it, bearing it to others. In the love of Christ, in pardoned sin, in acceptance in the Beloved, in resting in God, in perfectly acquiescing in His will, in the hope of heaven, there is such joy that none can measure it. We have such a living swarm of bees to make honey for us in the precious promises of God, that there is more delight in store than any of us can possibly realize. There is infinitely more of Christ beyond our comprehension than we have as yet been able to comprehend.

Dear friends, if you want to know what are the elements of our joy, I have already hinted at them, but I will for a moment enlarge thereon. Our joys are often found in the former places of our conflicts. We gather our honey out of the lions which have been slain for us or by us.

There is, first, our sin.

A HORRIBLE LION

that! But it is a dead lion, for grace has much more abounded over abounding sin. O brothers, I have never heard of any dainty in all the catalogue of human joys that could match a sense of pardoned sin. Full forgiveness! Free forgiveness! Eternal forgiveness! See, it sparkles like dew of heaven. To know that God has blotted out my sin is knowledge rich with unutterable bliss. My soul has begun to hear the songs of seraphim when it has heard that note, "I have blotted out thy sins like a cloud, and as a thick cloud thine iniquities." Here is choice honey for you!

The next dead lion is conquered desire. When a wish has arisen in the heart contrary to the mind of God, and you have said—"Down with you! I will pray you down. You used to master me; I fell into a habit and I was soon overcome by you; but I will not again yield to you. By God's grace I will conquer you"; I say, when at last you have obtained the victory such a sweet contentment perfumes your heart that you are filled with joy unspeakable; and you are devoutly grateful to have been helped of the Spirit of God to master your own spirit." Thus you have again eaten spiritual honey.

When you are able to feel in your own soul that you have overcome a strong temptation, the fiercer it was and the more terrible it was the louder has been your song and the more joyful your thanksgiving. To go to Mr. Bunyan: When Christian had passed through the Valley of the Shadow of Death during the night, and when he had come entirely out of it and the sun rose, you remember he looked back. He was long in taking that look, I warrant you. What thoughts he had while looking back. He could just discern that narrow track with the quagmire on one side and the deep ditch on the other; and he could see the shades out of which the hobgoblins hooted and the fiery eyes glanced forth. He looked back by sunlight and thought within himself, "Ah me! What goodness has been with me! I have gone through all that, and yet I am unharmed!" What a happy survey it was to him!

We find honey again from

namely, our troubles after we have been enabled to endure them. This is the metal of which our joy-bells are cast. Out of the brass of our trials we make the trumpets of our triumph. He is not the happy man who has seen no trouble; but "blessed is he that endureth temptation, for when he is tried he shall receive a crown of life that fadeth not away."

Death, too. Oh, the honey that is found in dead death. Death is indeed dead. We triumph over him, and are no more afraid of him than little children are of a dead lion. We pluck him by the beard, and say to him, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" We even look forward to the time of our departure with delight, when we shall leave this heavy clay and on spirit wings ascend unto our Father and our God. You see there is rich store of honey for God's people; and we do not hesitate to eat it. Let others say as they will, we are a happy people, happy in Christ, happy in the Holy Spirit, happy in God our Father. So that believers have their sweets.

III. But the third is the point I want to dwell upon: the believer's life leads him to COMMUNICATE THESE SWEETS.

As soon as we have tasted the honey of forgiven sin and perceived the bliss that God has laid up for His people in Christ Jesus, we feel it to be both our duty and our privilege to communicate the good news to others. Here let my ideal statue stand in our midst; the strong man, conqueror of the lion, holding forth his hands full of honey to his parents. We are to be modelled according to this fashion.

And, first, we do this immediately. The moment a man is converted, if he would let himself alone, his instincts would lead him to tell his fellows. I know that the moment I came out of that little chapel wherein I found the Saviour, I wanted to pour out my tale of joy. I could have cried with Cennick:

> "Now will I tell to sinners round;
> What a dear Saviour I have found;
> I'll point to thy redeeming blood,
> And say, 'Behold the way to God!'"

I longed to tell how happy my soul was, and what a deliverance I had obtained from the crushing burden of sin. I longed to see all others come and trust my Lord and live! I did not preach a sermon, but I think I could have told out all the Gospel at that first hour. Did not you, my friend, feel much the same? Did not your tongue long to be telling of what the Lord had done for you? Perhaps you are one of those proper and retiring people who are greatly gifted at holding their tongues; and therefore you left the feet of Jesus in silence, silence which angels wondered at. Is that why you have held your tongue ever since? Perhaps if you had begun to speak then you would have continued your testimony to this day.

I repeat my assertion that it is the instinct of every newborn soul to communicate the glad tidings which grace has proclaimed in his heart. Just as Samson had no sooner tasted of the honey than he carried a portion of it to his father and mother, so do we hasten to invite our neighbors to Christ. My dear young friend, as soon as ever you know the joy of the Lord, open your mouth in a quiet, humble way, and never allow yourself to be numbered with the deaf and dumb. Let no one stop you from unburdening your heart. Do not follow the bad example of those who have become dumb dogs because of their cowardice at the beginning.

The believer will do this first to him. Samson took the honey to his father and mother who were not far away. With each of us the most natural action would be to tell a brother or a sister or a fellow-workman, or a bosom friend. It will be a great joy to see them eating the honey which is so pleasant to our own palate. It is most natural in a parent at once to wish to tell his children of divine love—have you all done so?

TO THOSE WHO ARE NEAREST

The believer will do this as best he can. Samson, you see, brought the honey to his father and mother in a rough and ready style, going on eating it as he brought it. Perhaps you think, "If I am to speak to any person upon true religion, I should like to do it in poetry." Better do it in prose, for perhaps they will take more notice of your verse than of your subject. Give them the honey in your hands, and if there is no dish they cannot take notice of the dish.

But then Samson did another thing, and every true believer should do it too; he did not merely tell his parents about the honey, but he took them some of it. I do not read, "And he told his father and mother of the honey," but I read, "and he took thereof in his hands." Nothing is so powerful as an exhibition of grace itself to others. Do not talk about it, but carry it in your hands. "I cannot do that," says one. Yes, you can, by your life, your temper, your spirit, your whole bearing. If your hands serve God, if your heart serves God, if your face beams with joy in the service of God, you will carry grace wherever you go, and those who see you will perceive it. Let our lives be full of Christ and we shall preach Christ. A holy life is the best of sermons.

Take note, also, that Samson did this

WITH GREAT MODESTY.

We have plenty of people about nowadays who could not kill a mouse without publishing it in the Gospel Gazette; but Samson killed a lion and said nothing about it. He holds the honey in his hand for his father and mother—he shows them that; but we are specially informed that he told not his father or his mother that he had taken it out of the carcass of the lion. The Holy Spirit finds modesty so rare that He takes care to record it. In telling your own experience be wisely cautious. Say much of what the Lord has done for you, but say little of what you have done for the Lord. You need not make much effort to be brief on that point, for I am afraid that there is not much of it, if all were told. Do not utter a self-glorifying sentence. Let us put Christ to the front, and the joy and blessedness that comes of faith in Him; and as for ourselves, we need not speak a word except to lament our sins and shortcomings.

The sum of what I have to say is this—if we have tasted any joy in Christ, if we have known any consolation of the Spirit, if faith has been to us a real power, and if it has wrought in us peace and rest, let us communicate this blessed discovery to others. If you do not do so, mark you, you will have missed the very object for which God has blessed you. I heard the other day of which pleased me much. The teacher, speaking to the boys, said, "Boys, here's a watch, what is it for?" The children answered, "To tell the time." "Well," he said, "suppose my watch does not tell the time, what is it good for?" "Good for nothing, sir." Then he took out a pencil. "What is this pencil for?" "It is to write with, sir." "Suppose this pencil won't make a mark, what is it good for?" "Good for nothing, sir." Then he took out his pocket-knife. "Boys, what is this for?" They were American boys, and so they shouted, "to whittle with," that is to experiment on any substance that came in their way by cutting a notch in it. "But," said he, "suppose it will not cut, what is the knife good for?" "Good for nothing, sir." Then the teacher asked, "What is the chief end of man?" and they replied, "To glorify God." "But suppose a man does not glorify God, what is he good for?" "Good for nothing, sir."

That brings out my point most clearly; there are many professors of whom I will not say that they are good for nothing, but methinks if they do not soon stir themselves up to glorify God by proclaiming the sweetness of God's love it will go hard with them. Remember how Jesus said of the savorless salt "henceforth it is good for nothing." What were you converted for? What were you forgiven for? What were you renewed for? What have you been preserved on earth for but to tell to others the glad tidings of salvation and so to glorify God? Do, then, go out with your hands full of the honey of divine love and hold it out to others.

It will be much better for you to tell of the sweets of godliness than it will be to make riddles about the doctrine of it. Samson afterward made a riddle about his lion and the honey; and that riddle ended in fighting and bloodshed. We have known certain Christians spend their lives in making riddles about the honey and the lion, by asking tough doctrinal questions which even angels cannot answer:

"RIDDLE ME THIS,"

They say, and then it has ended in a fight, and brotherly love has been murdered in the fray. It is much better to bring your hands full of honey to those who are needy, and present it to them that they may eat of it, than it is to cavil and discuss.

By doing this you will be blessing men far more than Samson could bless his parents, for our honey is honey unto eternity, our sweets are sweets that last to heaven, and are best enjoyed there. Call upon others to taste and see that the Lord is good, and you shall have therein much joy. You shall increase your own pleasure by seeing the pleasure of the Lord prospering in your hand. What bliss awaits useful Christians when they enter into heaven, for they shall be met there by many who have gone before them whom they were the means of turning to Christ.

I do often inwardly sing when I perceive that I can scarce go into any town or village but what somebody hunts me up to say to me, "Under God I owe my salvation to your sermons or to your books." What will be the felicities of heaven when we shall meet those who were turned to righteousness by our holding forth the word of life! Our heaven will be seven heavens as we see them there. If you have done nothing but exhibit in your lives the precious results of grace you will have done well. If you have presented to your companions truths that were sweetness itself to you, and tried to say in broken accents "Oh, that you knew this peace!" it shall give you joy unspeakable to meet those in glory who were attracted to Christ by such a simple means.

COMING MONARCHY IN FRANCE.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

DANIEL'S prediction in chapter 7 : 24 that ten kings will be reigning over the Ten Kingdoms of Britain, France, Spain, Austria, Italy, etc., about eight or nine years before the End of this age, leads us to expect that a monarchical government will soon be established over France, and it is remarkable that politicians even now begin to see the probability of the present French Republic soon being succeeded by a monarchy.

The London Telegraph of January 24th says: "France is threatened with a grave crisis. There are signs of evil omen throwing a deep shadow over its immediate future. Gambetta died, just as the New Year chimes were sounding, some three weeks ago, and left a void which could not be filled by any contemporary Frenchman. Upon the tombstone of Gambetta, as it were, Prince Napoleon pasted up his inflated manifesto. The placards of Prince Napoleon, insignificant in themselves, have set political passions aflame again. The arrest of the Napoleonic bill-sticker has proved the signal for a wild and angry motion from the Radical Left to expel all the representatives of dynastic families from France. This motion has been not so much opposed as emulated by a proposition of the Government of a scarcely less stringent kind; so that the country is plunged into a frenzy of panic and rancor, amid which it is impossible to foresee what fatal steps may not be taken, unworthy of the free principles of the Republic and dangerous to its peaceful continuance.

"Thus a sudden trouble surprises France at a time when she most of all needed repose in order to combat the intestine evils which threaten her. Liberty is always being conspired against by license in that restless land. At Marseilles the Socialists are not even French enough to be polite to the ex-Empress, who has offered them a park and a palace. At Lyons the Red Republicans propose to restore the silk trade by returning Communists who recommended anarchy in place of Government, and propose by way of helping society to abolish the Deity. At Paris the Municipal Councillors urge on the Deputies to rash devices, and Radical clubs control the Councillors. They propose not only to expel the Princes, but fierce cries are heard denouncing not only the clericals, the officials, and all titled people, but calling for the expulsion of bankers and financialists. M. Clémenceau's Radical newspaper, by way of joining in the stupid and furious clamor for proscription, assails the house of Rothschild. 'We have not abolished the Bonapartes and the Bourbons,' it says, 'to sink under the control of great banks. The Rothschilds are powerful—too powerful, but they will be wise to wield their gold with much future caution.' All these mad exclamations react upon the financial and commercial situation, which if not serious is at least deranged, and the Exchange in Paris trembles and falls like the barometer, sensitive to a coming storm.

"If a Napoleonic restoration were so much as conceivable, it would have almost to commence with preparations for a ruinous war of revenge. Orleanists and Legitimists again, could pursue no other course than to promise no long-deferred struggle against Germany for Alsace and Lorraine. Yet there cannot be a doubt that the majority of Frenchmen detest and dread any such prospect of war. But the actual Government has not got the country properly in hand, and therefore lets itself drift too much along the current of sectional passion. Prince Napoleon has obtained already the sinister triumph of having forced the Government to propose an alteration of the law to fit his case. In his prison, he must, indeed, be heartily astonished at the success of his evil manifesto.

"It is difficult to foresee what may or may not arrive as the issue of these unexpected troubles. Nothing could be worse for France than a Ministerial crisis brought about in a moment of such turmoil both in Paris and the provinces, and amid the noise of such wild and foolish doctrines in the great cities. If the French Government should be defeated because its proposals do not appear sufficiently sweeping, the President of the Republic would have, it appears, to call to his councils Socialists such as Clémenceau and Floquet, and France under such a combination would suddenly assume the aspect of an alarming Power to more than one European Court. The apprehensions which have arisen among quiet and propertied people would then be intensified, and the Socialists would make demands upon the new Ministry more and more disquieting to all that is religious and orderly in the land. In this way there might really be created a strong Monarchical and Clerical reaction, just as already the strong steps taken by the Ministry have revived Bonapartism."

VINCENT VOSPER'S VALENTINE.

By the Rev. J. Grant Mills, M.A.

Vincent Vosper was a ship's chandler. His business brought him into daily contact with the captains and mates, and sailors of the merchant navy. Those who know anything about seaports know that a business of this kind has many and great temptations to drinking from early morning till late night. If the ship be boarded by the chandler, a part of the welcome he receives on board takes the form of spirits; or if the captain visits the chandler, then the latter must, no, not must, but does produce the drink which is dearest to the skipper's heart; or if they meet in the streets, there is something so very peculiar about the meeting, that it is considered necessary to signalize it by "a nip" at a neighboring bar. They feel it to be an absolute necessity to have what is called "a liquor up." It never occurs to them to have "a meat up," "a mutton chop up," or "a beef steak up." Oh, no, "a liquor up," nothing else.

Vincent Vosper was not worse than his fellows in this respect. Perhaps a comparison would have been very much in his favor. However, he did as others did. It was the custom. It was the way to get business. He wanted to get on, and he could not afford to be peculiar, to be different from others.

Vincent Vosper was single. He felt lonely. Vincent Vosper wanted a wife. Vincent Vosper was eligible. A good-looking young fellow with a good business was not to be despised. Fond mothers did not shut their doors in his face. No confidence is betrayed when it is told that there were not a few among his female friends who would have been very pleased indeed to have been addressed as Mrs. Vincent Vosper. The only obstacle in the way was Vincent Vosper himself, for of those who would have gladly become Mrs. Vincent Vosper he would not have one; while the one person that he would gladly have made his wife would not have him.

But that was not his fault, you say? Oh, yes, it was. If he would give up his drinking habits, then Mary Davies would very gladly go on toward the end of the alphabet for the initial of a new name. It is needless to say that Vincent Vosper was miserable. Only those who have gone through the same kind of thing can form any idea how miserable he was. And yet all the time he knew that Mary was right in all she had told him about the drink. He would give it up. He began to believe that in the end, as Mary had urged over and over again, he would not be the worse off in this world's goods.

"He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her" (see page 131.)

"For," said she, "once establish your reputation as a sober, respectable, straightforward tradesman and then people will trust you. Many will like you; of course, some will dislike you; but all will respect you. And then as regards your pocket, your health, and your religion, why, they'll all be the better for the change."

"But look here, Mary," said Vincent Vosper; "I wonder you're not afraid to trust me if I gave the promise or took the pledge; for suppose, after I had promised and you had consented to marry me, and then suppose we actually were married, and then, ah, then I took to drinking again, as you call it?"

"Now, my dear Vincent, what a very low opinion you must have both of me and yourself. Do you think that if I thought such a thing possible, I would have another word to say to you? No! a thousand times, no! I believe that happiness would be ours if once you made up your mind. For, I believe that with God's help you would remain firm."

Still our chandler did not immediately take the step. And why? He was afraid of being laughed at and of losing custom. Satan has a most poweful instrument in chaff. What was Vosper to say, and how uncommonly foolish he would look, when Captain A., and Captain B., and Captain C., with their loud, hoarse laughs opened a battery, a full broadside of chaff upon him.

"Ah me! how many a man possesses physical, but lacks moral courage; respecter of men more than of God; careful about temporal more than spiritual things; thinking much of time and little of eternity." Into some such train of thought as this had Vincent Vosper allowed himself to drift, when his eye was caught by a poster on a wall announcing a temperance meeting.

Vincent Vosper went to the meeting, and was so impressed with all the speakers said that he called the next day on the vicar of the parish.

"I did not like to come forward last night," he said, "but I am determined to join in this work."

He signed the pledge, which was inscribed on a large card containing an ornamental heading and very prettily and daintily finished. His signature was witnessed by the vicar, who expressed a hope on parting with him that he would be brave and not lacking in moral courage.

Now on his way home his eye was again attracted, not this time by a poster, but by a stationer's window, in which there was a display of valentines. A sudden though struck him.

"Yes, I will," he said, "what fun! how pleased she will be! Yes, I'll send Mary such a valentine as was never received by anyone before. Ha! Ha! Ha!"

He entered and purchased a large, square envelope. Several times before he reached home he found himself laughing at the originality of his idea.

Next morning, February 14th, Valentine's Day, Mary Davies received the large, square envelope purchased by Vincent Vosper the day before. Quickly breaking the seal she drew out the valentine. Have you guessed what it was? It was his pledge card. And the vow of constancy to temperance which there was made he kept faithfully. Mounted by Mary Davies, now the happy Mrs. Vincent Vosper, it is hung in her bedroom, and in illuminated letters are recorded the words,

VINCENT VOSPER'S VALENTINE.

THE MISSION ON THE CONGO.

LETTERS recently received from Central Africa give an interesting account of the progress of the Livingstone Inland Mission.

Mr. Banks writes from his new station of Mukimvika, on the southern shore of the Congo estuary, where he has been residing alone for some months, and gives a survey of the "towns," or, as we should call them, villages, in "King Plenty's" dominions. There are nine or ten such within easy reach of his station, and many more at a little distance within a radius of a day or two. Mr. Banks made a little census of the population in these villages, which vary considerably in size, some being little hamlets of forty or fifty houses, others containing four or five hundred.

He has now proclaimed the glad tidings in all the towns and villages about this place; nor do his words seem to have been without effect. In several of the villages the people have promised to burn their idols, and send their children to school, and Mr. Banks says, "I feel convinced that before long a mighty change will take place among these people.

Dr. Sims is making good progress with the language, and says, "You would like to see the work here now in Banana; it would please you and our friends; the evening services are well attended by our own people and strangers. The preaching in the Palaballa dialect seems to attract them better than English, which, of course, they imperfectly understand. We are greatly encouraged by the attention given. The boys in the school can repeat some hymns and some tables and read and write a little."

We may thankfully realize now, dear friends, that at all the six stations of the mission, scattered at intervals through over 200 miles of the country, in a line from the coast toward the interior, real missionary work, preaching and teaching the Lord Jesus, is going on daily. You will, we trust, join us in the earnest prayer that during the year on which we have just entered saving results of such work may be apparent, and that at each station some, at any rate, may believe the things that are spoken, and be quickened to eternal life by the Spirit of God.

TRUE, THOUGH TRIED.

A Tale of the Seventeenth Century.

By Marie Hall

In the Prisoner's Dock.

MARGARET'S heart beat faster as she hurried in, in obedience to her uncle's message. There in the hall was her uncle, striding up and down in the greatest excitement, his dame looking toward him, the picture of bewilderment; and near the door stood two coarse, hard-featured men, one of whom was saying something, and referring to a paper he held in his hand, but he ceased speaking as his eye fell upon Margaret. Her face was peaceful and grave, as if nothing could ruffle its serenity; her open brow and fearless eyes seeming to refute beforehand any accusation of evil. Sir Gilbert himself calmed down as she confronted him, and stopped in his walk.

"How like her mother the girl grows!" he muttered.

"Did you want me, uncle?" asked Margaret.

"Yes, yes; I sent for you," he said, recalled to his former thoughts. "What is this that is charged against a kinswoman of mine? Of course it is altogether a mistake; nevertheless, a most annoying one, and has vexed me not a little;" and Sir Gilbert looked angry, and his color rose again.

"What is it?" asked Margaret, drawing nearer to the hall door. A prayer shot up from her heart for help and direction.

The man who held the paper, for once in his life, felt slightly ashamed of his office; he returned her steady look with a sidelong glance, and shuffled his feet.

"Well, my lady, 'tain't a pleasant business, noways, to haul folks away from their grand places, and nought but a bit of paper like that to show against 'em; but some one have got to do the king's business."

"Certainly, we all have unwelcome duties to do sometimes. But will you tell me—" She stopped; something rose in her throat.

"The paper don't give any particulars; it is only a warrant for the arrest of Margaret Desborough, charged with wilfully destroying the altar-piece in Lyndhurst Chapel. You will soon get righted, mistress, for the judge sits next week, and you could get bail till then."

"Of course, of course," said Sir Gilbert, emphatically. "Still I say it is very annoying, and there will be expenses to pay; a great waste of money for some one's foolish blunder."

Margaret was thinking. "Suppose my innocence cannot be proved, uncle?" she suggested.

"Nonsense!" he exclaimed, angrily. "You can prove that you never were at Lyndhurst; least of all in the chapel. For once your unorthodox religion may be of use to you."

"But it never can be proved," said Margaret, steadily; "for I have been at Lyndhurst. I was there last evening; and—and, I did destroy the altar-piece. I should have been a heathen, or something worse, if I had not done it."

Sir Gilbert was silent, quite sure that his niece had gone clean out of her mind; and his dame whispered:

"I always thought Margaret was not right in her head."

"I am quite in my senses, uncle," the maiden said, catching the meaning of her aunt's words.

"Senses! Why what in heaven or on earth could induce you to do such a wicked thing? And how came you at Lyndhurst, at all?" cried the baronet, his passion rising.

"I heard that a portrait of myself—an exact copy of the one hanging in the gallery here—was in the Virgin's Chapel at Lyndhurst, and that people were bowing down before it. I determined to see for myself." Margaret's indignation kindled at the remembrance. "And I did see; I hate myself when I think of it. It was wicked, blasphemous! Come what would, I dare not leave the picture there; so when the service was over I destroyed it. Perhaps I am worthy of punishment; but I think I should do it again to-morrow, if I saw the same sight that I did last evening."

"You should have asked for the picture to be removed," said her uncle, "and not have outraged the feelings of good Catholics in that manner. You have dragged me into a pretty position. I cannot offend the king by pretending to justify such a deed. No end of trouble will be sure to follow. You are already suspected of holding illegal opinions, and how is any poor interest of mine to get a release for you?"

"I do not ask you to defend me, uncle. I should be very sorry to injure you or any one. I must pay the penalty of my own act," said Margaret, gently.

"But the disgrace, that will fall on my house; and I may be suspected too. I little thought what I was bringing on myself when I promised your mother to take charge of her daughter."

"I can't stay no longer; the lady must come right away with me, anyhow," said the man, losing his shamefacedness.

Margaret sent Rebecca for her cloak and hood, and turned to wish her uncle good-by.

His heart was not altogether hard, selfish and worldly though he was. As he kissed his niece, his eye was dim and his voice was husky, as he made some indistinct promises to do something in her favor.

On the outskirts of Deerham, at the other extremity of the town, were the remains of a castle, very much fallen into decay, except the centre fortress—the keep; that was strong and spacious, and had been used by the Deerham authorities as a prison since its abandonment by the soldiery. A shiver passed over Margaret as she crossed the old drawbridge, and passed under a massive archway, with dilapidated walls on either hand, and the keep dark and frowning before her. The man who carried the paper knocked loudly at an iron door, which, after a little delay, opened with much creaking.

The turnkey stopped on a narrow landing, before a little low door; unlocked it, and motioned for the prisoner to enter. A moment more, and Margaret heard the key turned upon her, and realized her position truly as a prisoner.

She was but human, but a tender woman, and what wonder that her heart sunk within her then? Yet she did not long yield to weakness. Was not the Lord with her? Could He not deliver her shortly? And even if her captivity was lengthened, who was she that the enemy should refrain from smiting, when some whom the Lord loved, and who had grown old in His service, were pining in prisons darker and damper than this?

"Yes," exclaimed Margaret aloud, "I have confessed my Lord; and not even in my most secret thoughts must I distrust Him by refusing my cross or doubting His goodness."

The news of Margaret's imprisonment soon spread. It had come to the knowledge of the Puritan minister, and with a pale, sorrow-stricken face he now stood before his people. Long did he pray; and his voice was almost inarticulate when he asked the Lord to send consolation and perfect submission to their captive sister; and even while they prayed the Lord heard, and an answer of peace was sent to the tiny chamber in the castle. Long did the pastor discourse of that fellowship in Christ's sufferings which every true disciple must have. The word came with such power, that many who entered the room with weak hearts, shrinking from the idea of trial and persecution, went away, saying within themselves, "Yea, I count all things but loss, that I may win Christ."

It was the third day since Margaret had stood in Sir Gilbert's sunny courtyard, and the pigeons had fluttered to her shoulders and eaten from her hand. Three days! They seemed long to Margaret, with nothing to do but watch the little bar of sunlight as it crept up her wall; or, standing on her chair, watch the soft white clouds floating along past her window, for sky only was to be seen from where she stood. Yet she was not unhappy. Hope would whisper promises of speedy release, and faith carried her on still safer pinions to the rest and freedom that lay beyond the touch of human bonds and earthly judgments.

Rebecca and good Master Pelham had both tried to see her, but the turnkey had proved implacable. But the third day brought another visitor, and at the first glance at a slip of paper he held out to the turnkey, he was admitted with some show of respect and alacrity.

"Lead on," said this individual, who was dressed in a most costly style; "lead on. How is the little sinner? Does she make any ado?"

"No, no," said the man. She is a frail bit of a thing to look at, but she is that sort of womankind it ain't possible to break in; they ain't never outrageous, making a hue and cry about things they can't help; they just take things quietly, as if they hadn't a wish of their own. I know 'em; I've had several of that sort mewed up in this place, and they were all of 'em belonging to the Puritan stock. I take it this young woman has got a touch of the same disease, she keeps so uncommon still and meek."

"Whew!" said Captain Butler, panting (for it was no other than he); "you keep this bird in a very high cage, man."

The "cage" door was opened by the turnkey; the visitor entered, and it was instantly closed behind him. Supposing it was only the usual midday meal, Margaret did not turn round; she was busy tracing a passage of Scripture on the stone wall with the point of her scissors. She sadly missed her Bible, and had to draw solely on memory for spiritual comfort—to memory and that blessed Spirit that "bringeth all things to our remembrance."

"Margaret!" exclaimed the captain; and with a low, startled cry, Margaret dropped the scissors, and faced the intruder. She spoke not a word, for the scene in the garden rose up before her; and certainly he was the last person she would have desired to meet, in hall or highway, much less in that narrow chamber, with no way of escape. The soldier was enraged to observe the unmistakable aversion with which she regarded him; but he choked down his rage, and assumed a bland smile.

"I am afraid I startled you; you must have grown quite nervous up here, all alone, with no one to speak to but that gruff old turnkey. But I hope you will forget the little difference we had the last time I saw you. I am quite willing to overlook all the uncivil things you said. So I could not rest till I had made every effort in your favor, and now I have it in my power to set you at liberty."

Margaret had not changed her position, nor moved her eye from the captain, who had seated himself on the only chair, and was delivering himself pompously and patronizingly. The maiden took a deep breath at the mention of freedom; still she waited in an attitude of mingled grace and dignity, and perhaps never had Margaret looked so attractive as she did now—and her visitor thought so too; yet she waited and spoke not. The greatest amount of charity could not delude her into a belief of the soldier's disinterested motives and intentions. He continued, with still greater confidence:

"In this case it is only fair that I should make some terms. In exchange for this order of release (drawing a strip of parchment from his doublet) I ask you again to plight your troth to me. I cannot ask less, eh, Margaret?"

"I gave you my answer to that question long ago, Captain Butler. I thank you for any kindness thought or done for me, but my feelings on this subject are unchanged."

"Nonsense, Margaret. Then you were free, and could toss your head at any suitor that did not hit your fancy. Now you are a prisoner, sure to be condemned, if you take your trial; and I come and offer you perfect freedom, and the protection of my name. Do you want me to play the lover, and kneel at your feet, that you are so coy in saying a simple yes?"

"No, Captain Butler; I only wish you distinctly to understand, that much as I love my liberty, I would forfeit it forever rather than purchase it at such a price. An unsanctified union would be worse than iron chains or stone walls to Margaret Desborough."

The captain did not quite understand the allusion to an "unsanctified union," but he comprehended that he was again rejected, and now, when he felt so sure of success. His bribes, his cleverly-laid schemes, had all been worse than useless, and his fiery nature could stand no more.

"You are a fool, girl!" he cried, crumpling the parchment in his hand; "and if you like your quarters so well, you shall keep them. Whatever the 'gentle Jeffries' awards, don't think I shall interfere again. You shall yet rue the day that you made Richard Butler your mortal enemy. Perhaps it may interest you to know that a foreign nobleman has offered to purchase your miniature for a good sum, to place in his oratory, and I think now I shall let him have it."

With this last poisoned arrow, he flung himself out of the cell, to Margaret's infinite relief.

Even sanctified human nature found such words hard to bear. The blood was trickling from the maiden's lips with the effort she had made to retain silence. Wiping away the drops, she picked up the scissors, and finished the sentence on the wall, to calm her spirit. "The servant is not greater than his Lord."

"Better utter solitude than such society as his," she murmurd, thinking over what had been said. "Perhaps the story about the miniature is not wholly true—only said to vex me; so I will not fret about that. But my poor friend, and Master Pelham"—and her thoughts wandered into another channel, until the captain and his visit were forgotten.

The day of trial came at length, and Margaret was conducted once more into the bright outer world; and very beautiful did all nature seem, after even so short an absence. The "White Rose of Deerham" was whiter and fairer than ever, as she took her appointed place at the bar.

Timidly her eyes sought for some friendly face among the crowd. She sought in vain, until in the farthest corner she espied Rebecca, and a few poor but loving-hearted members of the little community. Margaret recognized them with a smile that caused Captain Butler to frown still darker. That personage was seated near the judge, and in close conference with a Catholic priest.

The trial began. We shall not repeat the coarse abuse of the wretched Jeffries, who always made tender, delicate women the special subjects of vulgar taunts and profane sarcasms; and he made no exception in Margaret's favor. Nor shall we record the confused evidence of the priest, who professed to have witnessed the whole scene of destruction—too paralyzed with horror to interfere. Through all this, which occupied some hours, the prisoner had stood calm and still as any statue.

THE SEVEN CHOSEN.

S. S. Lesson for March 11. Acts 6 : 1-15. Golden Text, Rom. 12 : 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

In our lesson for to-day we have to record the declension which brought the first cloud upon the glorious horizon of the primitive church. At first we detect among the disciples none of the workings of self, Jesus and the Resurrection seemed to absorb every thought; even when Ananias sinned, the instant and awful judgment which followed only tended to deepen the thoroughness, and increase the great grace which was upon them all. They had no fear of man; prison doors and guards of soldiers had been found powerless to hold them in, the council of Jerusalem had been at a loss how to condemn them; the truth was spreading mightily and constantly, and the work of healing confirmed "the Word with signs following" (Mark 16 : 20). Among themselves all had been love and harmony, they were "of one heart and one soul," joy and rejoicing were found in the dwellings of the righteous, and it seemed as though they would carry all before them. But, alas! in those days, when the number of the disciples was multiplied,

THERE AROSE A MURMURING.

"A murmuring"? How could this arise? Satan had done his best to overpower the disciples by bringing upon them the anger of the rulers, but he had been overthrown, he had stirred up persecution against them, but they had only rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for Christ's name. Now he tried other tactics, he began to sow disunion among themselves, and at once the power of the church declined.

"There arose a murmuring of the Grecians against the Hebrews, because their widows were neglected in the daily ministration." Oh, how simple it would have been had they carried their cause to God, and entreated Him to set the wrong things right! how easily then might they have pointed out the mistake, and how lovingly it might have been rectified! But self had crept in; they were injured, they must complain, they must blame those who had wronged them, they must prove they had been wronged. Man had done them harm, man must be blamed for it. How often the work of God in a church, in a town, in a family, has been hindered, or altogether stopped, by this very thing! "There arose a murmuring," against the preacher or against the workers, the eye of the people has been diverted from God to man. When the eye rests on God, when the heart is satisfied with God, murmuring becomes impossible.

But we see the loving hand of God overruling this matter. Until this time everything had lain upon the twelve apostles; the preaching, the distribution of alms, had been done by them alone. Without doubt this murmuring drove them to God for wisdom. Anyway, we find "they called the multitude of the disciples unto them, and said, It is not reason that we should leave the Word of God and serve tables. Wherefore, brethren, look ye out among you seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom, whom we may appoint over this business. But we will give ourselves continually to prayer and to the ministry of the Word." Oh, how much Christian workers need to learn the lesson that God would have them associate others with them in the work! Every worker ought also to be a trainer of others, and if the work itself lies nearer his heart than his own part in it, he will be so.

But what kind of men were they who were first chosen by the early church to take part in the work? "Men of honest report." Our hearts have been grieved and pained on hearing of Christian workers, and even such, as by profession, take a high stand, and yet whose lives will not bear investigation, men who speak of holiness on the platform, and yet whose lightness of conduct at home has been a scandal; men whose integrity about money matters is sadly faulty, and whose character for truth is not above suspicion; men and women too who will speak well, but whose lives belie their preaching, the Lord root them out from His work in our churches and in our missions. Rather let us have men and women of honest report and full of the Holy Ghost, than gifted false witnesses of Christ; we want no rottenness, let the world have it all.

"MEN OF HONEST REPORT"

is the first qualification for workers, those full of the Holy Ghost and of wisdom, the Holy Ghost first, the motive power, the steam, and then wisdom, the machinery.

"But we will give ourselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the Word." "Give ourselves to prayer." How unlike this is to that working one's self up into prayer which is the experience of believers who know not the power of the Holy Ghost! Whenever prayer ceases to flow as an uninterrupted stream through the heart and life of a child of God, there is something wrong about him. Those who have the most responsibility in any work of God are they who most need close and continuous communion with God. The matter for prayer when we live with God is always present, and never gets exhausted. The proposition of the twelve "pleased the whole multitude," and they were not long in making their choice. Stephen, full of faith and of the Holy Ghost was the first chosen; Philip, the instrument, in the Lord's hands, a short time afterward, of bringing the city of Samaria to the feet of Jesus; blessed men, only a short time converted, but thoroughly yielded up to God, withholding nothing from Him; these with five others of a like spirit were set before the apostles "and when they had prayed, they laid hands on them."

What was the effect of this division of labor and strengthening of the apostles' hands? "The Word of God increased," i.e., there was much more preaching, the men chosen to do the secular work being full of the Spirit of God could not but testify to Jesus, and tell the glad news of His great salvation; so that the number of preachers was augmented, there was not enough self among them to produce fear of man; they were practically not their own, but bought with a price, and they gave themselves up to glorify God in their body, and their spirit which were His (1 Cor. 6 : 19, 20). But not only was the preaching increased, but the results of it also; the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly. Holy Ghost preaching produces Holy Ghost results; wherever God is with a preacher, He is also with the congregation. He declares, "If thou take forth the precious from the vile, thou shalt be as My mouth" (Jer. 15 : 19). He says of the false prophets, "But if they had stood in My counsel, and had caused my people to hear My words, then they should have turned them from their evil way, and from the evil of their doings" (Jer. 23 : 22). Again God says of His Word that goeth forth out of His mouth, "It shall not return unto Me void; but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing where to I sent it" (Isaiah 55 : 11). A glorious triumph was given to those poor preachers of the Gospel, "a great company of the priests were obedient unto the faith."

One of the seven deacons who had been chosen, Stephen, was one of the foremost agents in this great revival, he, "full of faith and power, did great wonders and miracles among the people."

"FULL OF FAITH,"

i.e., never looking to himself or at himself; occupied with God. This man, more conscious of God's presence than his own, only saw possibility or impossibility in relation to God, never in relation to himself; he was nothing and sought not to be anything, thus God could use him; and continually fresh manifestations of the present intervention and power of the living God were occurring. This stirred up the anger of a certain class, the Libertines, and Cyrenians, and Alexandrians, men who could not endure that God Himself should be recognized as actively interfering in the affairs of man, men who would reduce all religion to an abstract idea, so that it should neither touch heart or conscience, soul or body.

Oh, how many in our own day are put out of temper when they hear of an answer to prayer, and are ready to persecute those whose diseases have been healed by the Lord alone. These men disputed with Stephen. But they met in him something for which they were totally unprepared. In their very presence, all unknown to them, he was receiving from his God every word which he should speak; God was fulfilling to his faith the promise of his Lord, "It shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak. For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you" (Matt. 10 : 19, 20). No wonder "they were not able to resist the wisdom and the Spirit by which he spake," for the unseen God was speaking through him, and they were fighting against God. In our work we are continually meeting with opponents who employ the cleverest reasoning against us. Let us never seek to oppose them. If God gives us a word, that word will be irresistible, but it is utter loss of time to attempt to argue with such as cannot receive or know the things of the Spirit of God, because they are spiritually discerned (1 Cor. 2 : 14).

Powerless to overcome Stephen by reasoning, his enemies sought to destroy him by

TREACHERY.

By unrighteous means, probably bribery, they obtained men who were willing to perjure themselves, and who testified, "We have heard him speak blasphemous words against Moses, and against God." They succeeded in making a stir; the people, i.e., those who had not been converted, and the elders, and the scribes, "came upon him and caught him, and brought him to the council, and set up false witnesses, which said, This man ceaseth not to speak blasphemous words against this holy place and the law; for we have heard him say, that this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, and shall change the customs which Moses delivered us." So far for the accusers. What about the accused?

Every eye was turned on him, but there was neither confusion, nor shame nor anger. He stood in a greater presence than that of the assembled council; while they looked on him, he looked on God, and God looked back upon him and his face, strong in his conscious innocence, untouched by one hard thought against his enemies, reflecting the light of the God in whose presence he stood, was "as it had been the face of an angel." It is one thing for a man to assert his innocence, what about his face? When he is under accusation is it as the face of an angel? Does God shine out from it? The Lord so dwell in us who are His children, that our very faces may shine Jesus out to a lost world.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Prisoners Accused of the Murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke are twenty-one in number. They were last week formally committed for trial. It is expected that they will be arraigned before a special commission of three judges. The police are making energetic efforts to discover the man whom the informer Carey called "Number one," but whose proper name he swore he did not know. That man was the chief of the conspiracy, and the government are anxious that he should take his place in the dock with the men who were his instruments. The utmost malignity is manifested by the prisoners toward the informer, Carey, who has betrayed their secrets. On Monday, February 19th, as he passed the dock on his way to the witness stand, one of the prisoners aimed a savage blow at him, just grazing his head. Mrs. Carey has been completely "boycotted" since her husband turned informer. Not one tenant has paid rent, and notices have been chalked on the doorsteps of her Denzelle Street property, warning persons not to pay rent to "an informer." A number of marines are employed in guarding her house. There have been some confirmations of Carey's evidence, but some glaring inconsistencies in it have been exposed by the Irish and London press.

The Connection Between the Land League and the Irish Invincibles disclosed by Carey has been the leading topic of debate in the British House of Commons, and the country during the past week. Mr. Forster was warmly congratulated by his friends on his six escapes from assassination. On Thursday last Mr. Forster made an attack on Mr. Parnell. He directly charged Mr. Parnell with heading an organization which had started an agitation that promoted outrages and incited to murder. Mr. Parnell, he said, had reaped advantages from the agitation. He did not plan the outrages, but connived at their commission. Mr. Forster quoted from Mr. Parnell's speeches, in which he had said that murder was unnecessary. He said the wretches who committed the Phœnix Park assassinations had not acted on the letter, but according to the spirit of these speeches. Until Mr. Parnell expressed regret and repentance he could not communicate with him. It was expected that Mr. Parnell would indignantly deny that he had connived at the murderous plots of "the Invincibles," and that the Land League had supplied them with funds. But he sat silent, and when he did speak on the following night, he practically left Mr. Forster's charges unanswered. He made no defence, but excused himself on the ground that Mr. Forster had no right to put such questions and make such charges. His conduct under a charge so grave amazed his friends, and from all the English press there is one outburst of indignant condemnation of the leader who deliberately refuses to disown the outrages and to disavow any possible connection between the murderous societies and the Land League. Mr. Parnell evidently does not know how much information the government have obtained from the informers. There is a general impression that under the circumstances, and in view of disclosures that may yet be made, his policy of silence may be a wise and prudent course for him.

The French Crisis has Terminated in the acceptance of the Premiership by M. Jules Ferry, who commands the confidence of the more radical section of the Republican party. In defining the policy of the new administration, M. Ferry said, it proposes to facilitate the execution of public works and to introduce measures looking to the organization of a protectorate in Tunis, and the reduction of the expenses of the occupation of that country. The foreign policy of the government, M. Ferry said, will be peaceful, but not necessarily one of inaction. "Whenever our interests and honor are engaged we must maintain France in the rank to which she is entitled." Respecting the subject which precipitated the crisis, the expulsion of the Princes, M. Ferry said the government's first care would be to satisfy the wish of the Chamber by applying the law of 1834, under which the princes would be deprived of their military posts. The government thought that nothing more was necessary for the present. It is understood that only the Duc de Chartres, the Duc d'Aumale and the Duc d'Alençon will be affected by the enforcement of the law.

An Uneasy Feeling is Prevalent in France, notwithstanding the termination of the present crisis. The Paris Correspondent of the New York Herald states that a statesman who formerly held high office under the Republic recently said: "I consider the present crisis a terribly grave one, and it will surprise me much if the madness of the Chamber does not lead us to a revolution. The Chamber will not stop at the proscription of the princes. It may be clamoring ere long for the exile of the bankers who have charge of their money. Next will come the turn of the princes' friends, and next—who knows what may not come next? Insurrection, I very much fear, and a dictatorship."

The Extensive Military Movements Italy is now pushing forward have produced a feeling of uneasiness in Europe which indicates the general consciousness that a small conflagration might lead to very serious results. An English journal, describing the Italian preparations says: "Italy is quietly increasing her armaments and consolidating her military strength. This is calculated to awaken a feeling of distrust as to the probable future of the Continent. In the course of this present year no less than twenty batteries of field artillery, four regiments of siege artillery, each consisting of fifteen companies, two regiments of sappers, four companies of railway troops, and six companies of military train, will be organized. In 1884 there will be men and material enough for the creation of two new army corps, which will make a total of twelve instead of ten. The War Department possesses at present 700,000 rifles, amply sufficient for the standing army and reserves. Further supplies of firearms are in course of fabrication. The fortifications of Spezzia are being actively completed. Those of Rome are nearly finished, and already partly armed, while fortified works are being constructed at Vado, Gaeta, and Messina, and new fortifications are being erected at Venice and Elba."

England's Arrangements in Egypt are the subject of a protest from the Turkish Government which takes exception to the British Note. The Sultan opposes the neutralization of the Suez Canal, though he does not object to the cessation of the financial control. It is expected that he will ask for another European Conference. The fact that all the European Powers, except France, have accepted the British proposals will not be without its influence upon the Sultan and his advisers. And, in addition to this, he has plenty of cause for anxiety on his hands in other directions. The state of Armenia is rapidly growing worse, and the condition of other parts of the Turkish Empire is unsatisfactory. The "sick man" is growing more sickly, and his opposition to the proposed mode of settlement of the Egyptian question will not be likely to receive serious attention from the European Powers. The Euphrates is visibly drying up (Rev. 16 : 12).

The French Protectorate in Madagascar Appears to be an established fact. In a recent number of this journal the details of the difficulty were given. It is now announced in despatches from Madagascar that the French flag is flying on the north-west coast. Owing to the fact that the natives are very much irritated, the Prime Minister has begged the foreign residents of Tamatave not to venture into the interior. Warlike preparations are proceeding.

Cetewayo and Zululand.—Cetewayo was Reinstated at Ulundi as King of Zululand, on January 31st; 5000 Zulus were present at the ceremony. Sir Theophilus Shepstone, the representative of the British Government, read to Cetewayo the conditions of his restoration. Many chiefs expressed great dissatisfaction with the conditions. The Durban correspondent of the London Times, telegraphing, said: "It is now admitted on all hands that his restoration was not desired by the people. The same party of Zulus is brought forward daily to produce a fictitious effect of numbers. The King himself now recognizes the fact that his sceptre has departed, and his influence is lost. The question is now asked—'How is the King to maintain his power after the British troops leave, if he be opposed?' But the Zulus are so inscrutable, that possibly after the installation of Cetewayo their attitude may change."

A Letter from the Pope to Cardinal McCabe of Dublin, apparently intended to aid the British Government in pacifying Ireland, has been published. In it the Pope congratulates the bishops of Ireland on the zeal with which they have devoted themselves to calming the disturbances of their country, and recommends that young and inexperienced priests should not be allowed to attend public political assemblies. He further expresses his grief that "the adherents of evil societies do not cease to put their trust in deeds of crime." The letter is very cautiously worded, and even if well intended will have very little effect on such men as those who form the "Inner Circle" assassination committees.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey have Brought their evangelistic labors in Birmingham to a close. The crowds seeking admission on the last days of the services were so great that Mr. Moody held two meetings daily—one exclusively for women and the other for men. From Birmingham Mr. Moody went to Glasgow, and gave his farewell address in Scotland. The following day he crossed over to Belfast, to remain a few days, passing thence to Leicester for a three days' campaign. Active preparations are being made for the visit of the evangelists to Liverpool in April. A meeting of gentlemen was held in Manchester last week to arrange for the visit of Messrs. Moody and Sankey to that city on the 1st of March. At Mr. Moody's request the Free Trade Hall and the Circus were engaged for the meetings, and the committee of the Young Men's Christian Association placed their hall at the disposal of the Moody and Sankey Committee.

The Canadian Customs Authorities have Refused to allow atheistical works to pass the frontier. A Boston publisher recently sent to a bookseller in Montreal two complete sets of the works of Voltaire and Tom Paine, but the collectors seized Tom Paine's "Age of Reason" and Voltaire's "Philosophical Works" from the sets. They refuse to return them to the Boston publisher, and when asked what they were going to do with them Collector Ryan replied: "I suppose I ought to make a bonfire of them."

Volume V. of the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now ready, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1882 with complete index. Price $3 including postage. Ten per cent less to ministers and the trade.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), for February, may be obtained at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price six cents, postage paid.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

PASTOR CHINIQUY, the Canadian Evangelist—Scenes in his Life.

THE REV. PASTOR CHINIQUY,

For 25 Years a Romish Priest.

CHARLES CHINIQUY, whose portrait appears this week on the frontispiece of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was born at Kamouraska, Canada, on July 30th, 1809, and is therefore in the seventy-fourth year of his age. His father and mother were natives of Quebec.

It is stated that his father, Charles Chiniquy, had gone through a long course of study in the Seminary of Quebec, in order to qualify himself to become a Roman Catholic priest, but within two days of his contemplated ordination he saw something among the superior clergy which excited his indignation, and caused him to abandon the project. Leaving the college, therefore, he became a legal notary, and established himself at Murray Bay, which at that time was an entirely new settlement.

FIRST LESSON BOOK.

As there was no school in the locality, the boy's mother became his teacher. A Bible, which the superior of the seminary had presented to his father when he was leaving, in token of kindly feeling, was the first book he was taught to read.

Being gifted with a marvellously retentive memory, he was able, when about nine years old, to recite large portions of the Old and New Testaments. In bad weather, when the roads were impassable, the farmers used to go to Mr. Chiniquy's house on the Sunday, and the boy's father would place him on the table, where he would recite to them some of the chapters in the Word of God.

RECITES A PARABLE IN THE CHURCHYARD.

One Sunday the lad had gone with his mother to church, and was waiting at the door of the edifice before the service began. An old farmer seeing him, put him into his buggy, and called to the people to come and listen to the boy, who would recite a chapter from the Bible. He chose the parable of the Prodigal Son. Many of the poor people had never heard it before; the touching story was new to them, and they listened with rapt attention.

ANGER OF THE PARISH PRIEST.

On the following day one of the audience gave the priest particulars of what had occurred at the church door the day before. The priest angrily demanded to know who dared to read the Bible in his parish, and the man, of course, stated that it was Mr. Chiniquy and his son. The next day, in a rage, the curate called upon Mr. Chiniquy, and peremptorily inquired, "Monsieur Chiniquy, is it true that you and your boy read the Bible?"

Mr. Chiniquy said, "Yes; not only does he read it, but he learns it by heart, and if you like, he will give you some chapters of it." The priest indignantly answered, "I don't come here for that! Don't you know that it is forbidden in the Church of Rome to read the Bible in the vernacular tongue?" Mr. Chiniquy rejoined with warmth, "I do not see any sin in it; the Bible was given to me by the superior of a seminary, who surely knew what he was doing when he conferred the gift." The priest replied, "You know better, Monsieur Chiniquy; you know it is forbidden, and it is my painful duty to take the book from you and burn it."

Mr. Chiniquy was a quick-tempered man, and when he heard the priest's startling demand and the nature of his intention, he began to pace up and down the room, his anger becoming more intense at every step. The priest began to tremble; and after a few moments' most awkward and oppressive silence, the recalcitrant parishioner suddenly turned to the priest and said, "Is that all you have to say?" The priest, in an agitated manner, answered, "Yes; that is all!" "Then," rejoined Mr. Chiniquy, "you know the door by which you came; go!" And the priest thought it advisable to make his exit as quickly as possible.

About a year after this event, in 1821, Mr. Chiniquy died, and the Bible mysteriously disappeared from the house, and it was believed that the priest, through some of his friends, carried it off. But, happily, the fatherless boy retained in his memory many of its life-giving passages.

COLLEGE LIFE AND ORDINATION.

A rich uncle named Amable Dionne, a member of the Upper House of Parliament in Canada, took the boy in charge, and sent him to the College of St. Nicholet, with which he was connected from 1822 to 1833, attaining high honors as a linguist and a mathematician. His moral conduct was so exemplary that his fellow-students humorously called him St. Louis Gonzaque de Nicholet.

In the year 1833, when he was twenty-two, Mr. Chiniquy was ordained a priest, in the Quebec Cathedral, and immediately afterward commenced his ministry in the parish of St. Charles, on the river Berger, Canada. He subsequently became Chaplain to the Marine Hospital, and there his eyes were opened by Dr. Douglas to the pernicious effects of alcohol on the human system. He became convinced that it was poisonous. He thereupon wrote to Father Mathew, of Ireland, and in a short time inaugurated a temperance crusade among the Roman Catholics of Canada.

TEMPERANCE WORK.

He commenced this splendid and triumphant work at Beauport, where he was parish priest at the time. There were then seven taverns or hotels, but no school. In two years, so successful had been his efforts, that he had seven schools, and there was not a single tavern in the parish. A temperance column was erected in that town to commemorate his achievements in the good work. His abilities and successes attracting attention, he was soon transferred to the larger parish of Kamouraska; but in a little time he relinquished parish duties altogether, and removed to Montreal, in order to devote his whole time and energy to the cause of temperance. As one tangible result of his enterprise, between the years 1846 and 1851, all the distilleries but two were closed in the province.

In appreciation of his services the Canadian Parliament voted him an address and $2500 as a public token of the gratitude of a whole people. His fame also as a temperance reformer reached the Pope, who sent him his blessing. He likewise obtained, unsolicited, a letter of unqualified commendation from the Bishop of Montreal.

FORMS A NEW COLONY.

His high position was now universally acknowledged, and he was chosen by the dignitaries of the Church of Rome to lead a new and important movement. It was to found a colony in the Valley of the Mississippi. He accepted the offer, and very soon there was settled in the colony a first contingent of five thousand emigrants, all zealous devotees and emissaries of the Papal Church. He took up his quarters in St. Anne, Kankakee, Illinois, in 1851; all this time a change was working in his heart which five years later, in 1856, led to his separation from the Church of Rome.

HABIT OF BIBLE READING.

When Chiniquy was ordained a priest, he was seized with a most enthusiastic determination to extend the power of the Church over all America. His was the true missionary spirit, and he nurtured it by constant study of the Word of God. It was this study which led him first to question the authority of the Romish Church.

COLLISION WITH THE BISHOP OF CHICAGO.

When he was stationed by his ecclesiastical superiors in 1851 in Illinois, he came into collision with his bishop. About this time the Bishop of Chicago committed a great sin, and Chiniquy and his colonists felt compelled to protest publicly against it. The protest appeared in the press. For a whole year a discussion was carried on, and at the end of this time Father Chiniquy sent all the documents, written by both sides, to the Pope of Rome and the Emperor of the French, for arbitration. The consequence was that the bishop was found guilty, and transferred to Ireland, where two years afterward he died.

The rumor had got afloat that Chiniquy was now more of a Protestant than a Catholic; and when the next bishop was appointed, he was recommended to make his submission in the usual form. The priest accordingly called upon his bishop, and handed him the necessary document, in which, however, Chiniquy had interpolated the qualifying words: "I submit myself to the bishop according to the Word of God as we find it in the Gospel of Christ." The dignitary's delight on receiving the submission, which at the time he did not carefully read, was unbounded, and he gave Chiniquy a letter saying, "he is a good priest, and everything is right between him and me."

Only ten days afterward he was unexpectedly summoned again into the presence of the bishop, who asked Chiniquy to show him the letter he had given him a few days before. Chiniquy at once handed it to him, and it was immediately thrown into the fire. The bishop said, "I have brought you here because you are an impostor. You deceived me the other day, in giving me a note of submission, which is not one." Turning to the bishop, Father Chiniquy said, "What do you mean by saying I have deceived you?"

The bishop then pointed out to the priest the limitation of his submission, and added, "You are a good priest, I hope, and if so, you must know that you have only to submit, without any condition, to your superiors. You must submit wholly to my authority, and promise to do anything I may tell you." Then Father Chiniquy rose to his feet, and said, "My lord, what you require of me is not submission, it is adoration. I refuse it; I will never adore you." He replied, "If so, you cannot be a Roman Catholic priest any longer."

DISMISSED FRON THE PRIESTHOOD.

Father Chiniquy left the bishop, who was trembling and surprised at his determination, and engaging a room in an hotel, entered and locked the door. He then fell on his knees, and exclaimed, "My God! my God! the Church of Rome is not Thy Church; but where is Thy Church? Where must I go to be saved? O God! speak to me!" By giving up the Church of Rome he had given up everything that was dear to him, and though he did not regret the step he had taken, a dark cloud came down upon his soul, and he began to weep convulsively.

After crying for more than an hour, he felt that a battle to the death had begun between the Church of Rome and himself. He says: "I saw that the priests would attack me in their press, in their pulpits, in their confessional. I saw a struggle would begin, which would end only with my life; and I looked around to see if I had any friends left to help me. Not one remained. In the Church of Rome even my dear brothers were bound to curse me—to look upon me as an infamous impostor. Among the Protestants there were none, as I had spoken against them all my life. I saw that I was left alone to fight the battle against the giant power of Rome. It was too much for me, and if God had not stopped this guilty hand, I would have cut my throat in that dark hour. I preferred a thousand times to die! But, thanks be to God, He stopped my hand when I was about to commit the horrible crime of self-murder. Great drops of sweat fell from me, my heart was fainting, and every moment I expected to fall a corpse. I cried, 'O my God! I die; I am lost; have mercy upon me! Tell me where I must go to be saved.'"

Then the thought flashed through his mind tioned, 'Can it be true! Is it possible!' She saw the bright gold ring which the bridegroom had placed upon her finger, and answered her own query, 'This is the witness.' Then she opened the certificate signed by the official of the church, and said, 'This also is a witness.' In like manner Christ has married Himself to us. We have a witness in His written Word that Christ is ours; here are our marriage lines. We have also the wedding-ring in the witness of the Holy Spirit in our hearts. He assures us that we are Christ's, our Heavenly Bridegroom's, forevermore."

THE CHARACTERISTICS AND CONTRASTS OF THE COMING KINGDOM.

By Rev. William Maude.

THE KINGDOM OF LIGHT.

2. SCRIPTURE reveals the wonderful fact that during the Millennial Kingdom the earth will possess

A NEW SOURCE OF LIGHT

in the heavenly Jerusalem; which will, it would clearly appear, be suspended in mid-air over the earthly Jerusalem, constituting in point of fact a new satellite. For concerning this New Jerusalem which cometh down from God out of heaven, it is expressly said that it has the "glory" of God, that is, the Shekinah, the glory-cloud, which ever attends the Divine Presence;* the effulgence of which is "like unto a stone most precious, even like a jasper-stone (or diamond) clear as crystal." (Rev. 21:11.). Nor will this glory shine only upon the inhabitants of the heavenly city; for, speaking of the earthly Jerusalem, Isaiah says (I quote the passage in a revised form): "The Lord will create upon (or 'over') the whole place of mount Zion, and upon all her assemblies, a cloud and smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night; for above all the glory shall be a covering." (Isaiah 4:5.) And in the 24th verse of the chapter of the Revelation just quoted, we read further, "And the nations shall walk amid the light thereof: and the kings of the earth do bring their glory into it."

3. Lastly, the complete control of all the forces of nature which man will then possess, as I showed in the last paper, will assuredly give him marvellous facilities for the easy and abundant

PRODUCTION OF ARTIFICIAL LIGHT.

If even with our present very partial and imperfect knowledge of nature's resources, science can astonish the world by the discovery of the electric light, by the aid of which the streets of our great cities, and the interior of the largest buildings, are illuminated with a brilliance which almost rivals the light of day, what may we fairly expect when the whole arcana of nature will be open to human knowledge, and her most potent forces wholly beneath man's control? Need we wonder, then, when three such sufficient explanations of the predicted fact can at once be suggested, that the Coming Kingdom shall be even physically the Kingdom of Light? But to pass on.

II. In the second place, the Coming Kingdom will be for, as I have already observed, the intellectual equivalent of light is knowledge. Now man's power over nature must necessarily be in exact proportion to his knowledge of nature; since, therefore, the former is to be absolute, the latter must be in a sense complete. Present knowledge is to be far transcended. When Paul says, "If there be knowledge, it shall vanish away," he certainly does not mean that either in "the habitable earth to come," or in heaven itself, all man's laboriously-acquired knowledge is to be swept away as if it were rubbish; but rather that the knowledge then possessed, even by men in the flesh, will be so immensely greater, that our present knowledge will practically be swallowed up, as is the light of a taper by the mid-day sun.

The celebrated Dr. Isaac Watts has somewhere in his voluminous writings, suggested the probability of the Lord Jesus Christ in heaven delivering science lectures to the redeemed! The conception is certainly sufficiently crass and incongruous; but, nevertheless, it is a glorious truth that "in Christ are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col. 2:3), and that of His fulness in this respect mankind shall abundantly receive. Truly does the apostle say, regarding "the wisdom of this age," "the Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain." (1 Cor. 3:19, 20.)

In the light of the fuller and truer knowledge of the coming age, how many rival systems of philosophy will be seen to be equally foolish; how will many of our most bitter and painful controversies be at once and forever settled. We shall then know beyond the possibility of contradiction or of cavil whether man is the result of special creation or natural evolution; whether immortality is universal or conditional; whether the Bible is God's book or man's book. Now we can know these things only by faith, for it is "by faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the Word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear." (Heb. 11:3.) But then we shall know them even as God knows them, for in His light shall we see light. The accomplished professors in the the authorized instructors of mankind—will, we believe, be the risen and glorified saints; those, that is to say, who see Christ face to face, who "know even as they are known." While for every man there will be the final appeal open to that seat of Infallible Authority in all matters of natural as well as religious knowledge, which will constitute the glorious reality answering to the absurd and antedated claim of the Pope of Rome.

III. Above all, however, the crowning glory of the Coming Kingdom, in this its fourth aspect, will consist in the fact that it is

THE KINGDOM OF SPIRITUAL LIGHT.

Of this we have immutable assurance; for He of whom it is written, "It is impossible for God to lie," has sworn by Himself, saying, "As truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord." (Numb. 14:21.) And this "glory" will consist in the saving knowledge of Himself—His glorious character and righteous commands—for David, when celebrating the glories of Christ's millennial reign in that magnificent seventy-second Psalm—David's "swan song," as an old writer calls it—says: "He (i.e., Messiah) shall live, and to Him shall be given of the gold of Sheba; prayer also shall be made for Him continually, and daily shall he be praised. . . . His name shall endure forever: His name shall increase itself (see Hebrew) as long as the sun, and men shall be blessed in Him; all nations shall call Him blessed" (ver. 15-17). Again, in another Psalm he sings: "God be merciful unto us and bless us; and cause His face to shine upon us. That Thy way may be known upon earth, Thy saving health among all nations. Let the peoples praise Thee, O God; let all the peoples praise Thee." (Ps. 67:1-3.)

Indeed, on this note the prophetic harp loves to linger; and here, in a most distinct manner, the vision of the inspired seers seems to attain to its brightest glory. Is Israel the subject? What diviner word of promise have they than this: "This shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord. I will put My law (lit. 'teaching') in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and will be their God, and they shall be My people. And they shall no more teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for they shall all know Me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord, for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more." (Jer. 31:33, 34.) And so Isaiah says, "Thy people shall be all righteous; they shall inherit the land forever, the branch of My planting, the work of My hands, that I may be glorified." (Isa. 60:21.) Nor shall be confined to Israel; on the contrary, the prophet declares that "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea," (Isa. 11:9); while in almost identical words, Habakkuk says, "The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." (Hab. 2:14.) O blessed Kingdom of Light! No longer shall rival sects, by the unseemly contentions in which they engage, bring dishonor on their common Lord. No longer shall men say, "I am of Calvin," and "I of Wesley," and "I of Augustine," and "I of Socinus." No longer shall missions to the heathen be needed and rewarded with so small a measure of success. In that day, over all the earth, "there shall be one Lord, and His name one;" the "idols shall be utterly abolished," and the truth concerning God's will, and revelation, and purposes infallibly known.

"Kingdoms wide that sit in darkness,
Then shall see the glorious light:
And from eastern coast to western,
Shall the morning chase the night:
And redemption
Long expected, win the day."

But once again

THE SOLEMN CONTRAST

presents itself. Between us and that bright and blessed day the deepest, darkest, night still intervenes. It is ever so; the last hour of the night is ever that of the intensest gloom; and if the words of the prophet that "darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the peoples," have been characteristic hitherto, more or less, of the whole course of human history, from the fall of man in Eden to the present hour, it is nevertheless at the very close of the present dispensation that they will receive their last and plenary fulfilment. It is very remarkable, moreover, that there are clear intimations in Scripture that this contrast will be even physically exact. Are we told that in the Coming Kingdom, "the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be sevenfold, as the light of seven days"? On the other hand, the Prophet Joel declares "that the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and notable day of the Lord come." (Acts 2:20.) And so our Lord Himself prophesies, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken." (Matt. 24:29.)

THE GLOOM OF ANTICHRIST'S REGIME.

Still more terrible, however, will be the spiritual darkness of that coming hour of judgment, when, because men do not choose to retain God in their knowledge, they shall be given over to believe the lie of Antichrist, when he shall appear with all power and signs and wonders of lying, even denying the Father and the Son, and sitting in the temple of God, showing Himself that He is God. Nevertheless, to the faithful and watchful saints, the Apostle's words remain true, "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief. Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day; we are not of the night, nor of darkness. Therefore let us not sleep, as do others, but let us watch and be sober. For they that sleep, sleep in the night, and they that be drunken, are drunken in the night. But let us, who are of the day, be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love; and for a helmet, the hope of salvation." (1 Thess. 5:4-8.)

"Think not of rest; though dreams be sweet,
Start up, and ply your heavenward feet.
Is not God's vow upon your head,
Ne'er to sink back on slothful bed,
Never again your loins untie,
Nor let your torches waste and die,
Till, when the shadows thickest fall,
Ye hear your Master's midnight call?"

READERS should understand that when an article published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD bears the name of the writer, that writer must be held individually responsible for the views therein advanced. The ministers whose sermons appear in this journal, and other contributors, must not be regarded as always endorsing views about which there is a wide divergence of opinion, even among Christians of eminent piety and learning.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, was Elected President pro tem. of the Senate on Saturday. Senator David Davis gave notice early in the week of his intention to resign the office before the close of the session, in order that a new President pro tem. should be elected. The importance of the office being filled consists in the fact that under present circumstances its holder stands next in succession to the Presidency. It was understood that Senator Anthony, of Rhode Island, would have been elected to the office, but for the fact that, technically, he was not a Senator after March 4th. His term ended on that day, and his new term would not commence until the meeting of the Forty-eighth Congress. There are rumors that Senator Edmunds will voluntarily retire from the chair in December in order to render more effective service to his party on the floor.

The Tariff Bill, Passed by the Senate, was referred by the House to a Commitee of Conference, and after undergoing important changes in the interest of the monopolies, finally passed the Senate by a majority of one, and the House by a majority of thirty seven. There is no reason to congratulate the country on this result. It will afford no appreciable relief to the people, while the monopolies, already too powerful for the public good, are benefited by the new legislation. As an evidence of the kind of work performed upon the bill after it left the Senate, it may be mentioned that the duty on books was increased from fifteen to twenty-five per cent. The last acts of the Forty-seventh Congress were consistent with its course throughout its existence, and it is a relief to know that it can do no further mischief. It has persistently disregarded the interests of the people, and by what it has done and what it has left undone it has earned an unenviable place in the history of the nation.

The Coinage of Silver Dollars is Still to be continued at the rate of two million dollars per month, until December, Congress having refused to suspend the law in spite of the large accumulation of the coins. It is estimated that at the end of the ten months there will be at least $120,000,000 of this kind in the Treasury. As the silver is for the most part paid for in gold, a scarcity of that metal is apprehended, and many banks in New York and other large cities are preparing for the crisis. Business men having large transactions have been advised to stamp all the paper that passes through their hands with the word "gold" to avoid losses that may be serious.

The Reduction in the Rate of Postage Takes effect on October 1st. The House fixed the date at January 1st, 1884, and the Senate advanced it to July 1st of the present year. It was felt that this would create too large a deficiency. The two Houses have met each other half way, leaving three months of the next fiscal year under three-cent postage. The estimates made by the Department, taking into account a probable increase of business due to the reduction of postage, show that the reduction from October 1st will not cause a deficiency much over $1,000,000 for the next fiscal year.

The Envoys from the Queen of Madagascar arrived in this country on March 3d. The party consists of nine persons. These were Ravoninahitriniarivo and Ramaniraka, the two ambassadors; the United States Consul, Colonel W. W. Robinson, at Tamatave; Mr. W. C. Pickersgill, of the London Missionary Society, who was for nine years a missionary in Madagascar and accompanies the ambassadors at their request; Anthony Tacchi, the English translator, and the secretaries and servants of the envoys. The object of the journey is to ratify a treaty between the Government and the Queen of Madagascar, which was arranged two years ago, but has only recently been approved by the Senate. It is understood that the treaty secures to the United States important commercial advantages. Our trade with Madagascar now amounts to over a million dollars a year, and the concessions now granted will tend to its further development.

The Death of Alexander H. Stephens, Governor of Georgia, early on Sunday morning, closes a busy and brilliant career. He had lain unconscious for several days, and his illness was from the first of a character which convinced his physicians that his recovery was hopeless. Mr. Stephens was seventy-one years of age, having been born in Talliafero County, Ga., on February 11th, 1812. His father died when Alexander was fourteen, but his friends offered to defray the cost of his education. The youth accepted their offer as a loan, which he promptly repaid from his first earnings as a school teacher. He studied law, and from the time of his admission to the bar his eloquence secured him a prominent place there. When only twenty-four years of age he was elected to the State Legislature, and was re-elected for several consecutive terms until 1842, when he entered the State Senate. In 1843 he was elected to the House of Representatives and served until the close of the Thirty-fifth Congress. It was in 1848 that the terrible attack was made upon him in which he nearly lost his life and which left him an invalid until his death. When the Confederate Government was formed, Mr. Stephens was elected Vice-President of the Southern States, and at the close of the war he was imprisoned, but was released after five months' imprisonment. He was elected a member of the Forty-third Congress, and last year was chosen to succeed Governor Colquitt as Governor of Georgia.

The Annual Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of New York State was held at Newburg, N. Y., on February 22–25th. The report states that there are in New York State 91 associations and 66 general Secretaries; 14 association buildings valued at $841,000, and building funds amounting to over $73,000. There are 14 railroad branch associations in successful operation. Much good work is being done among the German-speaking young men at New York, Albany, Syracuse, Rochester, and Buffalo. The association at Watertown, through the bequest of Mr. Sherman, has a block of buildings valued at $60,000. The Buffalo Association has nearly completed a building costing $70,000, $60,000 of which is secured. The Troy Railroad Association has a building costing $18,000, with a debt of only $4000. The Newburg Association has nearly completed a building costing $20,000. At Rome, one costing $16,000 is in use and half paid for. Dr. Sylvester Willard, of Auburn, has subscribed $10,000 for a building there, provided $15,000 additional can be raised, which latter amount is nearly all pledged. The total value of property acquired by the associations in this State this year was $176,000. The total amount expended by the Executive Committee to carry on their work during the past year was $3300. The report urges all the associations to become incorporated according to State law, that they may be able to hold property. It also suggests the importance of distinctive work for German-speaking young men, and urges that special efforts be made for the Chinese in cities and towns.

The Revival in Lincoln University, Oxford, Pa., of which mention has already been made in these columns, is still making progress. In a letter to the Witness from the financial secretary, the following details are given: There have been three conversions in the Senior College Class, so that now all the twenty young men composing it are converted. The Junior Class, containing twenty-five, with two exceptions, is all for Christ, and both of these are anxiously inquiring for the way. The Sophomore Class numbers thirty-seven, all but three of whom are professors of religion, and of these two are inquirers. Of the forty-nine members of the Freshman Class, eight only are not firmly fixed on Christ, though seven of the eight have publicly expressed their purpose to seek the Saviour. The Preparatory Class numbers sixty-one, thirteen of whom are not decided believers. There are six inquirers in this class." From this statement it would appear that twenty-seven young men, of the thirty-three who were unconverted at the beginning of the year, have been awakened, and have publicly confessed their interest in personal religion and their earnest desire to secure it. Nine only of the two hundred and fourteen students in the university remain unmoved.

The Late Hon. Edwin D. Morgan's Will bequeathes $795,000 to charities, of which $200,000 were given to the Union Theological Seminary, $100,000 each to the Presbyterian Home and Foreign Boards and Williams College, $50,000 each to Home Missionaries, Presbyterian Hospital, and Manhattan Eye and Ear Hospital, and $25,000 each to the City Mission and three other city institutions.

The Revival Services at Decatur, Ill., Conducted by Rev. Thomas Harrison, "the boy preacher," have in ten weeks resulted in the profession of faith of over 1200 persons. The services have been held in the Methodist Church, but Mr. Harrison has received the assistance of pastors of churches of other denominations. Many of the converts reside at a distance from Decatur who went there to attend the services. At the daily morning prayer-meetings which are held at six o'clock the attendance is large. It is stated that on some occasions 600 persons were present.

A Prodigal's Return in Answer to Prayer was described in a letter read at the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting last week from the pastor of a Congregational church. A few years ago the pastor asked the meeting to pray that his son might return home. The son had left father, mother, and home because he did not like the restrictions there, and where he was no one could tell. But prayer was offered and he was soon heard from. God had put His hand upon the young man. He was suddenly brought to a stand. Sick in a hospital, he resolved that when he could arise he would go to his father; and he did. Still he did not become a Christian. There were times when he appeared seriously impressed, but the impression soon passed away. Not many weeks ago, however, he avowed himself upon the Lord's side. He rejoiced in the assurance that Christ was his Saviour.

A Novel Hunting Companion is Employed by a man in California. One of the journals of that State describes his method. It appears that when going out to shoot wild geese he is accompanied by a cow instead of the usual dog. He has trained the animal to walk slowly out into the field where a flock of geese has settled on the grain. She browses meanwhile, and he walks alongside on the side away from the geese. When within shooting distance he gently pats her on the shoulder, and the obedient bovine lies down. He rests his fowling-piece over her back and fires both barrels at once, generally killing thirty or forty of the geese. This is the same system of tactics that the great enemy of souls employs. It is behind an apparently innocent and inoffensive occupation or amusement that he conceals his most successful plots (2 Cor. 2 : 11).

Two Little Immigrants Arrived in New York recently by the Transatlantic Steamer Lake Nepigon from Liverpool. They were aged five and three years respectively. Their father and mother came to this country about six months ago, leaving the two children in a charitable institution in Liverpool. The father found employment, and saved money enough to pay for the passage of the little ones to this city. They were alone in the steamship during the passage. Their fellow-passengers say that the little ones behaved themselves remarkably well. They were delivered to their parents at Castle Garden. The mutual joy of parents and children on meeting after the voyage was very touching. The tiny little travellers appeared to find in the reunion compensation for all they had endured during the long journey. Christ's words to His disciples near the close of His career indicate that the believer may hope for such a meeting when death has ended his earthly journey (John 14 : 2, 3).

An Attempt to Rescue a Drowning Boy had a sad ending on February 20th, at Pleasant Lake, near Morrisville, N. J. A man named Foster was working near the lake when he heard the cries of a boy, who, while skating, had broken through the ice. Without a moment's hesitation Foster ran to the boy's rescue, but had not gone far before he sank into an air-hole. The boy managed to extricate himself, crawled over the ice to the nearest bank and summoned help, but Foster had gone down and he was drowned. It is very sad that the heroic effort should have cost the brave man his life, especially as it turned out that the boy was able to save himself. As the believer meditates on the sacrifice on the cross he sees a great contrast between that wondrous scene and such an event as the death of the hero on the ice. When Jesus gave His life to save the race He knew the inevitable cost of His undertaking, and He knew too that without Him no man could be saved (Ps. 49 : 7 and Rom. 5 : 6).

Five South Sea Islanders were Landed in San Francisco recently by the City of Tokio. The captain of that vessel stated that they had been found adrift, out of sight of land, in an open boat, and he had taken them on board his ship. Originally there were ten persons in the boat, but five of the party had died from starvation. There was one woman among the survivors. They proved to be natives of the Gilbert group. They were so emaciated and looked so wretched, especially the woman, that at first their recovery was believed to be impossible. However, they received all possible care, and all recovered. Their story was that in attempting to cross from one island to another a storm overtook them and drove them to sea and out of sight of land. They had nothing to eat, and managed to get only such sustenance as a little rain water was able to give. As soon as they can bear the voyage they will be sent back to the Gilbert Islands by way of Australia. The poor voyagers had no idea when they left their homes of the distance they would travel before they returned, or they would have made provision for the journey. In such matters all men exercise foresight, but how many thousands set out on the voyage of life knowing that it will end in the ocean of eternity, yet are satisfied if they are provided with money and education, useful for this life only, while they are wholly unprepared for eternity (Jer. 12 : 5).

The Deliberate Avowal of a Criminal in jail in Philadelphia is very significant. His manners and conversation show that he has had a good education and moved in respectable society. It is even rumored that his father was a Baptist minister. The prisoner served in the army during the war, and attained the rank of lieutenant, but, on being honorably discharged he fell into dishonest ways and became a regular thief. He has spent most of his time since in prisons. Lately an attempt was made to get him pardoned, and it was essential that he should show contrition. "I have no desire to go back into respectable society," he coldly said; "having been a criminal and associate of criminals so many years, I prefer to end my days among them." Such candor is rare among men of his class, but the prisoner doubtless spoke the truth. Sinners who are postponing to a dying hour their reconciliation with God, and those who are hoping that after death there may be another period of probation, appear to have forgotten the principle that underlies the confession of this Philadelphian criminal (Rev. 22 : 11, 12).

A Strange Discovery was Made in a Hospital at Troy, N. Y., recently. A man was brought there for treatment who complained of acute rheumatism in his arms, which rendered them both useless, and had for several days prevented his doing any work. The surgeons were called to examine the patient, who was suffering excruciating pain. The result of their examination was the discovery that his arms were both broken near the shoulder. The broken bones were set, and the patient was relieved. It was learned that he first complained of what he supposed to be rheumatic pains after using a heavy sledge in his work, and it is supposed the right arm was broken from the shock while striking a beam. The other arm was broken while he was being moved in bed. One of the physicians explains that the man's bones are of unusual brittleness, and that either of the causes mentioned would be sufficient to produce the injuries. What that man's sufferings would have been if the discovery had not been made, it is not easy to imagine. The hopelessness of his condition while being treated for rheumatism when he needed a surgical operation, was complete. Certain philosophers and preachers are acting on a similar principle in attempting to cure spiritual disease. The only effectual cure is the radical one of a change of heart (Ezek. 36 : 26, 27).

A Pearl Diver's Struggle with an Octopus is described in the Youth's Companion. He was diving for pearls off the Mexican and Panama coasts, and carrying a basket on his arm he was lowered from a vessel anchored over the fishery. "I went," he said, "down sixty feet with a rush, and landing on the edge of a big branch of coral, swung off into a kind of basin. The basket went ahead of me, and as I swung off to reach the bottom something seemed to spring up all around me, and I was in the arms of some kind of a monster that coiled about my body, arms and legs. I tried to scream, forgetting that I was in the water, and lost my wind. I gave the signal as soon as I could, and they hauled me into the boat when I reached the surface, and pulled the main part of the animal from me. It was about three feet across, and its five arms seemed to divide into thousands of others. It was an octopus, and I afterward saw the body of one that was washed ashore on the isthmus that must have had a spread of thirty-five feet." The diver might have lost his life but for his connection with the vessel above him, which saved him from the grasp of the monster. The time is coming when watchful Christians, who live in close connection with their Father in heaven, will also be delivered from their great enemy here, and taken up to meet their Lord in the air (1 Thess. 4 : 17).

THE HEARING OF FAITH.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"This only would I learn of you, Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?"—GALATIANS 3 : 2.

Cavillers at the Way of Salvation—The Holy Spirit Received by Faith—I. An Argument of Experience—The Early Church—Modern Experience—In Conversion—In Sanctification—In Backsliding—A Trans-Atlantic Voyage—II. An Argument from Observation—Seekers' Failures—Personal Hearing—A Remarkable Dream—Attentive Hearing—What it is—Points in the Gospel.

A GREAT delusion is upon the heart of man as to his salvation. His ways are perverse. He does not love the law of God; nay, his mind is opposed to it, and yet he sets up to be its advocate. When he understands the spirituality and severity of the law he reckons it to be a sore burden; and yet, when the Gospel is preached, and set forth as the gift of sovereign grace, and he is bidden simply to accept it by an act of faith in Christ Jesus, the man professes great concern about the law, lest it should be made void by the freeness of grace. He takes the broken pieces of the two tables of the law and hurls them at the cross. It is not that man loves the law of God, but that he does not love the God of the law: hence he will resort to any pretence to oppose that way of salvation which God has appointed.

One would have thought that the moment we preached salvation by faith every sinner would have leaped up and accepted it. It is so simple, so easy, that surely every man would wish in this way to be forgiven and justified; instead of which, all the reasoning, all the thoughtfulness, ay, all the cunning of unregenerate human nature is stirred up to fight against the method of deliverance by faith in Christ Jesus. "It is too good to be true," says one. Another cries, "If this be preached it will lead men to think little of moral excellence." A third finds in the doctrine of grace an inducement to inaction; and so on, without end. These take hundreds of shapes; but after all they come to this: proud sinners must dictate to their offended Lord, and be forgiven on their own terms.

The reason of this contention lies in the fact that man is not only poor, but proud; not only guilty, but conceited; so that he will not humble himself to be saved upon terms of divine charity. He will not consent to believe God; he prefers to believe in the proud falsehoods of his own heart, which delude him into the flattering hope that he may merit eternal life. Against this wicked spirit our text enters the lists; let us see how it conducts the combat. The argument of the text is a very plain and powerful one. Paul puts it thus: "The Holy Spirit has been received by you Galatians. How did you receive the Holy Spirit—by the works of the law or by the hearing of faith?" They were bound to admit, each one for himself, that they received the Holy Spirit by faith, and by no other means.

Now, the Holy Spirit is the choicest of all the gifts of God which are received into the soul, and it is by the Spirit the work of the Lord Jesus is known and received. The Holy Spirit is Himself the seal of divine favor, and the token that we are at peace with God. I might almost say that the reception of the Holy Spirit is salvation; for when He enters into us we are saved from death in sin, from the love of sin, from the power of sin, and from the terror of sin. When He reigns in the heart, all the graces of a perfect character attend upon Him as courtiers upon a king. He becomes the source of life, light, love, and liberty to our souls, and even our bodies He sanctifies. Know ye not that your bodies are the temples of God when the Holy Spirit comes to dwell in them? To whom, then, the Holy Spirit is given salvation is given in the highest sense. But how is that Holy Spirit received? The question is soon answered. He is not received by the works of the law, but by the hearing of faith.

I am going to handle this fact, first, as an argument of experience for all the people of God, and, secondly, as an argument at least of observation for those who are seeking after Christ. May the Holy Spirit graciously aid us in our discourse.

I. First, then, here is

for the people of God.

Before I dwell upon the personal experience of believers who are here present, I would remind you of the experience of the Church of God as it is recorded in the Acts of the Apostles. The book of the Acts of the Apostles is a confirmation of the correct answer to my text. The disciples were met together after our Lord's ascension, and the Holy Spirit descended upon them; but in what way? Simply by their obeying the command of the Lord Jesus, "who commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which, saith He, ye have heard of Me." The gift was received by the hearing of faith, which led them to united prayer and waiting. They performed no ceremonies, and entered upon no labors; the watchword was, "Tarry ye till ye be endowed with power from on high." The power came that they might work, and not because they had worked. The gift of the Spirit came according to promise, and not according to works.

Very speedily the Spirit of God fell upon the people outside, and three thousand of them were converted and baptized. How came the Spirit of God upon Parthians, Medes, and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, and so forth? Was it by the works of the law? No, beloved; but Peter thus preached (Acts 2: 38): "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." When the thousands believed in Christ Jesus, and confessed their faith by baptism, the Holy Spirit was given them. Was it not the same when Paul went out and preached among the Gentiles? It was indeed so startlingly so, that the news came to the Hebrew Christians who were at Jerusalem, and no small dissension and disputation was the consequence. Here had been no circumcision, no proselyting to Judaism, no observation of any part of the Mosaic ritual, and yet they heard that the Holy Ghost had fallen upon the Gentiles, who had not even known the law, much less fulfilled it. It needed all Peter's influence to stem the flood. Hear how he puts it: "God made choice among us, that the Gentiles by my mouth should hear the word of the Gospel, and believe. And God, which knoweth the hearts, bare them witness, giving them the Holy Ghost, even as He did unto us." The Holy Ghost was received by believing Gentiles in every place where Paul had preached; and hence he could refer to these Galatians and use their experience to correct their errors. The fact that the Holy Ghost is given to the hearing of faith, and not as a reward of works, runs like a silver thread through the whole of the Acts of the Apostles; why, then, should men look to the works of the law for that which was never given except to faith? What an infatuation to look to the mirage when a real well is open at their feet!

Now I come to

YOUR OWN EXPERIENCE.

You, beloved friends, if you are indeed in Christ Jesus have received the Holy Ghost. But how? Let us go over the list of His operations upon your minds. You received enlightenment by His means, by which you were led to understand the way of salvation, and to behold the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Did you attain to that enlightenment by the works of the law? Was it so in any one case? It has been my privilege to know many of you, and to remember your confession of faith; you told me that when you were seeking salvation by your own works you were blind, and saw not the light; the more you strove and the more you struggled the more intense the midnight grew about you, until you well-nigh despaired. Light came by a look at the Crucified; it came only by "the hearing of faith."

Since that, you have received the Holy Ghost to help you in your sanctification; but you have obtained no sanctification apart from believing. If you have reached after sanctification by your own efforts, made in unbelief, you have never succeeded. Unbelief works toward sin, and never toward sanctification. Our good works are fruits of sanctification, not causes of it; and if we put the fruit where the root should be we greatly err. If you have gone out to fight against a temptation in your own strength, have you ever returned a conqueror? It has been written of all other believers, "They overcame through the blood of the Lamb;" and this is true of you also. Sanctification does not come to us from self-reliance but as a work of the Spirit received by faith in Christ. Believing in Him, He is "made of God unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption."

Every Christian here must confess, "it is even so: we have received everything by faith, and nothing by merit." Well, then, the inference is this: do not pump a dry well. If there be a fountain that is ever-flowing and overflowing, keep to it. Do not commit the double evil of forsaking the fountain of living water, and hewing out to yourselves broken cisterns. Wait you at that door at which you have received everything as yet, and do not go where you have received nothing except it be conviction and condemnation. Look not to Moses to bring you into Canaan; that can only be done by Joshua Jesus.

Now, mark this inference: let every child of God ponder it—keep you to "the hearing of faith." When you are under a sense of when you feel unworthy to be called God's son, when you have erred and strayed from His ways like a lost sheep, do not rush like a madman to the law, for that would be to leap into the fire; but still say, "Lord, I believe in Thee. As a sinner I trust the sinner's Substitute." Whether you did truly come to Christ at the first or not, is a point which you need not discuss; but begin again. Take with you words and come by faith to Jesus, and say, "Heal my backslidings, receive me graciously, and love me freely." By faith we can be restored, but never by doubting and despairing.

We can only come to Christ by faith at first, and we can only return to Him in the same way. If you begin to doubt the mercy and love of God to you, you will backslide more and more. Your hope lies in holding on to this—"Be I what I may, yet God has not changed, and there is still forgiveness with Him, that He may be feared; therefore will I go with the language of the fifty-first psalm upon my tongue, and the penitence of David in my heart, and I will says, 'Create in me a clean heart, oh God, and renew a right spirit within me.'" Stick to your faith in Christ; do not think that the greatness of your sin exceeds His atoning merit; do not doubt but that He will still cleanse you and love you as aforetime.

Suppose you have not backslidden, but yet you are in the presence of a tremendous

INWARD CONFLICT.

I will suppose that you are led to question whether you are the children of God at all, and persuaded to doubt your sonship. Now, be resolved to hold on to your faith in your Heavenly Father. The devil is saying to you, "If thou be the son of God." Do not yield to his "if." This is the way in which he attacked your Saviour in the wilderness.

Do this, dear friends, with regard to the whole of your life's struggle. Some begin their religious life in the Spirit by faith, but they fancy that the rest of their spiritual life will have to be by works. They forget that the just shall live by faith. My hope of heaven lies in the belief that the Lord Jesus has redeemed me and will keep me. He will make me watchful and prayerful, and work in me by His Spirit all else that is essential to my safety. "I know whom I have believed," and I am not afraid to add, "I am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him until that day." Brothers, it is by such faith that we receive the Spirit, and not by legal works and fears. My dear friend, if you look to yourself in any degree your foot is beginning to slip. Put the future where you put the past, namely, into the hands of Him that is able to keep you from falling. Believe in Jesus for a life as well as for an hour, and He will keep you with spotless garments to the end. Stand on the sure rock of the Lord's finished work, and not on the dubious ground of your own carefulness.

Brethren, let us keep in this condition when we are comparing ourselves with other saints of God. I sometimes read biographies which make me cover my face for shame because I fall so far short of the attainments of certain believers. This for us. What ought we to do when we feel it? To begin to doubt the Lord, and imagine that the Lord Jesus cannot or will not save us? Far from it. Faith should rise by observing what the Lord has done for other poor sinners like ourselves; for He is able to do the same for us. Remember that the safety of the weak and of the strong believer rests upon the same foundation. This may be seen in a figure.

On board one of the fine steamboats which flit between England and America I see a strong, hardy, vigorous man. Will he get to America safely? Yes, if the ship does. But see, yonder is a little child which cannot walk, and has to be carried in its mother's arms. Will it reach America safely? Yes, if the ship does. Both the robust man and the puling infant, all being well, will reach their journey's end—if the ship does. Their safety lies in the same place. Their condition does not affect their transit. But is there no difference between the child and the man? Assuredly, a great deal of difference as to many things; but there is no difference about the fact that their passage across the ocean depends upon the steamboat rather than upon themselves. The strong man could not walk across the Atlantic any more than the child could; they are alike incompetent for the passage if left alone, and alike capable of it if placed on board the same vessel. So, if you meet with a great saint, say to yourself, "My honored brother will get to heaven through Jesus Christ; and I, a poor babe in grace, shall get to heaven in the same way."

I want you children of God to feel this. Are you on board the Covenant transport? Does the blood-red flag fly at the masthead? Then, if the meanest believer is not safely carried into port, neither will the strongest child of God reach the fair havens. If that ship of free grace go down, Peter and Paul must sink as well as ourselves; for we are at sea in the same vessel. Our confidence is in no measure or sense in what we are, but altogether in what Christ is on our behalf; we depend on Jesus and rest in Jesus by a simple faith, and the brightest of martyrs and apostles has no surer ground to rest on.

This is the argument, then—you have obtained nothing except by the hearing of faith; therefore, keep to the way of faith even to your last hour, for wisdom teaches you so to do.

II. But now I want to throw all my strength into the second part of the sermon, which is this: I want to use this as for the use of seekers. I say "observation," but in part it might be called an argument from experience, for at any rate on the negative side it is so.

Listen, dear hearer, you have not yet found rest, you are not yet saved; and so far you have obtained no advantage by the works of the law. By your own honesty, generosity, and righteousness, you have not been justified, nor have you received a new heart, or any other gift of the Spirit. Why continue at this unprofitable business? Some try church-goings, chapel-goings, Bible-readings, sacraments, forms of prayer, and the like, but nothing comes of it. Hear how they repeat their Ave Marias, and their Pater Nosters; and not only Romanists, but so-called Protestants, are puffed up with the hope that by formal worship they will be saved. But they make no headway, and are still without salvation.

Let me ask you work-trusters, have you any rest? are you prepared to die? would you be willing to die at once? No. Your position is one of unrest, and fear, and dread. Why not abandon this vain method of building, for "except the Lord build the house they labor in vain that build it?" Instead of following out your own way of salvation by the works of the law, why not try the Lord's appointed way of the hearing of faith? Has He not said "Hear and your soul shall live?" Are you willing to hear me explain it?

The "hearing of faith;" this is the way by which the Spirit of God comes to men.

"WHAT KIND OF HEARING,"

says one, "is that?" Well, to begin with, it is personal hearing, listening to the Word for yourself. I have heard of one who had a dream in which he thought he stood at the gates of heaven, and his wife with him. She went in, but the porter shut him out, saying, "The other day you said to your wife, 'Mistress, you may go to church and pray for us both,' and now she shall go to heaven for you both, and you must stop outside." Is not that just? There must be a personal hearing. I pray you, do not absent yourselves from the hearing of the Word; for "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God."

That last sentence reminds me that the hearing must be the hearing of the Gospel. I wish people were more careful upon that point. You will not receive the Holy Ghost by merely hearing a man talk. He may be eloquent, he may be clever, and he may be pious; but mark you, if he does not preach the Gospel, saving faith cannot come of your hearing it. Too many people go to that place of worship which is nearest to their houses, and never mind what is preached so long as there is an attractive service. Oh, sirs, do not thus play the fool with yourselves. The faith that saves you cannot come to you by hearing anything which comes first; it only comes by hearing the testimony of the Spirit to the appointed Saviour.

The right kind of hearing is an attentive hearing. There is a great difference between hearing and hearing. If I were to say, "There is a ship going to sail next Tuesday for New Zealand," the most of you would hear it, and think no more of it. But suppose there should be a person here who is in great haste to reach New Zealand, he will catch at my words, and be round in the vestry to make further inquiries. This is the kind of hearing which the Gospel requires. Now, I am talking about the salvation of man from the power of sin, the salvation of man from the guilt of sin, the preparation of man for a holy life on earth and an eternal life of bliss in heaven; if you have the hearing of faith you will feel that this subject is one which concerns yourself, you will be anxious to know more about it, and you will give your mind to its consideration: this is the sort of hearing by which faith comes.

"WHAT IS THIS FAITH,"

says one, "the hearing of faith?" I will try to work out the idea. You begin with hearing the Gospel believing that it comes from God. Knowing the Gospel to be God's testimony we believe it all. That is the way in which to hear the Gospel. Say to yourself, "This is God's Gospel. It is wonderfully grand and good, but it is not therefore a matter of doubt. That I may be saved in one single minute by believing in Jesus; that every sin I have ever committed, however black, may all be washed away ere the clock ticks again—these are wonderful things; but I believe them because the Lord has said so. It is not mine to quibble, question, or cavil; if there are any difficulties in these great promises, those difficulties belong to God, and not to me. Let the Lord promise what He pleases, I am ready to believe it because He is able to perform His own word."

Then, "the hearing of faith" signifies, further, that we do venture our eternal interests upon the truth of what we hear. I use the word "venture" advisedly. I have heard critics object that it is no venture, but a certainty, when men trust in Christ. But I venture to assert that, when a man is in trouble of spirit, faith is a venture to him; it appears to him to be the greatest venture possible. He that saith, "This Gospel which I have heard is true, and I will venture my soul upon the truth of it," he is the man who has given to the Gospel "the hearing of faith." Let me try to set forth faith yet again; this bridge is strong enough to carry me over the stream, therefore I am going over the stream upon it. That is real faith.

in daily life. The most of trade hangs on trust. When a man sows wheat he has to scatter it into the furrows and lose it, and he does so because he has faith that God will send a harvest. When the sailor loses sight of the shore, he has to sail by faith; believing in his compass, he feels safe though he may not see land for weeks. Faith is the hand which receives what God presents to us, and hence it is a simple child-like thing. When a child has an apple offered to him, the child may know nothing about the orchard in which the apple grew, and he may know nothing of the mechanism of his hand and arm, but it is quite enough for him to take the apple. Faith does the most effectual thing for the soul when it takes what God gives: all the rest may be or may not be, faith is the main thing. When God holds out to me salvation by Christ Jesus, I need not ask anything further about it, but just take it to myself and be at once saved, for by faith the Spirit of God is received.

I want your attention for a minute while I mention some of the out of which this "hearing of faith" generally comes. What truth is it which men most readily believe?

The first is this. A man says, "I cannot believe;" but he can hear, and he hears that God has sent forth His Son Jesus Christ to be the Saviour of men. "God has sent Him," says he, "the offended God has appointed a mediator. Christ does not come as an amateur, but as an ambassador authorized of heaven." "Then," says he, "I will trust Him whom God has ordained to be a Saviour."

Next, while listening to the Gospel the man hears about the person of the Lord, and sees who He is, namely, that He is God's only-begotten Son, equal and co-eternal with the Father; and yet He is in the fullest sense man, in our nature. I have known many a soul say, "I can trust Jesus, since He is God and able to save me, and man, and thus willing to save me." By that celestial lamp many have seen their way to faith. Oh, that faith may come to you while you are hearing me.

Another very blessed nail on which faith loves to hang all its weight is the sufferings of Christ—for, being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, and became obedient to death, even the death of the cross. See Him languishing upon the cruel tree, bleeding out His life for unworthy men, His enemies, that they might live through Him. Many and many a time that sight has turned a doubter into a believer. Thousands have seen the cross, and felt that they must believe.

Another nail on which many have learned to hang all their hope has been Christ's risen power. They have heard of Him that He is in glory now, at the right hand of God, making intercession for transgressors, and this has been the star of hope to the desponding. Is it not a joy that God also hath highly exalted Him, so that He is able to save to the uttermost all that come unto God by Him?

MYRIADS OF TREMBLERS

have felt faith leap up from their hearts like the water from the rock in the wilderness when Christ has been set before them as exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour, giving both repentance and remission of sins. They have been trying to believe before, but now they believe without trying. Trying to believe is a very stupid operation: you cannot do it; minds work not so; but when a man sees a thing to be true he believes it as a matter of course. He is convinced by the blessed fact of Christ's resurrection and ascension that He is able to save, and so He trusts in Him to save him. Thus he receives the Spirit.

I have known many that have been led to believe by hearing of the work and grace of the Holy Spirit. They have heard the preacher say that the Holy Spirit can raise men from their death in sin, that He can renew the heart, that He can change the will, and conquer the passions; they have said "Is it so? Is God Himself willing to work with me to make me holy? Then I will trust Him." Thus faith comes.

I pray that all of you who are seekers may give up all trying to feel, and trying to work, and trying to be, and may just come and put your trust in Jesus. Then shall you be saved, and then you may work, and feel, and do as much as you like. Then shall you abound in good works, and the more the merrier. Then you shall fight with sin and overcome it; then shall you set up a high standard and reach it; then shall you strive after holiness and manifest it. But do not begin where you ought to leave off. Do not put the cart before the horse; do not place the top of the house where the foundation ought to be; but as you never did obtain anything by the works of the law, come and try "the hearing of faith," and you shall receive all that you need in Christ Jesus. God grant it, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

MR. W. R. BRADLAUGH.

THE readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are familiar, through the items of intelligence under the head of "Foreign Topics" with the name of Bradlaugh. The daring atheist who has been elected member of the British Parliament is still endeavoring to obtain admission to the House of Commons, but hitherto his efforts have failed, the majority of the members rightly feeling that a man who has been guilty of utterances so blasphemous as those of Mr. Bradlaugh, is no fit person to take part in the deliberations of the legislature of a Christian country. The portrait which appears on page 156 is that of the brother of the infidel. He is a successful evangelist, and the author of several able pamphlets, designed to counteract the evil influence of his brother's teaching. God has signally blessed Mr. W. R. Bradlaugh's efforts in His service, and we hope that he may long be spared to labor in the Gospel field.

William Robert Bradlaugh was born in London, September 21st, 1845, and is now thirty-eight years of age. His father, Mr. Charles Bradlaugh (for whom the infidel is named), was by profession a law stationer. At the time of his death, which took place on August 24th, 1852, the law firm, whose confidential clerk he was, of Messrs. Lepard, Gammon & Co., together with a number of influential gentlemen, interested themselves in providing education for William. The other son, Charles, who is more widely known, was at the time of his father's death a private in the army, having enlisted soon after he became sceptical, before which time, however, he had been an earnest Sunday-school teacher in connection with St. Peter's Church, in the graveyard of which his father lies buried.

In February, 1854, William Robert entered the British Orphan Asylum, but did not make that progress which marked the career of many other boys. Being very delicate for weeks at a time, he would be confined to the infirmary with acute headache. He is said to have excelled in mathematics, writing, drawing, and general knowledge, but in classics he was always "plucked."

ENTERS UPON BUSINESS LIFE.

On leaving school, a city merchant (a friend of his father's), Mr. Lockington, took him into his office, where he remained for about two years. After that he was in the office of the Institution where he was educated.

For a short time after this he was with a civil engineer and electrician in Gresham House. Here he made the acquaintance of the cashier of a slate company, who introduced him into "fast society," and he soon acquired

A LIKING FOR STRONG DRINK.

Leaving this office, he was articled to a civil engineer, architect, and surveyor, but there being little or no practice, the indentures were cancelled. Being thus blighted in his prospects, he took a position as book-keeper, but the appetite created for strong drink became stronger and stronger. However, in the year 1867, in prospect of getting married, he became an abstainer, and though he did not sign the pledge, he continued steadfast for two years; but in the beginning of 1869 he was prostrated by acute hæmorrhage of the gums, and nearly bled to death. The medical gentlemen who remained at his bedside administered to him for the purpose of restoration, every hour, the fourth-part of a pint of brandy, with a new-laid egg beaten up in it. When convalescent he recruited his strength at his brother's house at Tottenham, returning home in June, 1869, to get married, and resume business.

The liquor administered during his illness revived the appetite for intoxicants, and all the old drink-craving returned. He went on from bad to worse, until in 1872, he became so debased that his brother, who had always been kind to him, cast him off. Forsaken by relatives and friends, he drifted helplessly in the ways of vice, until on March 7th, 1875, he signed the pledge at a temperance meeting.

MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS.

In 1875 Messrs. Moody and Sankey were in London, holding mid-day services in Agricultural Hall during the month of March. Mr. Bradlaugh attended one of these meetings.

After business he immediately set out for the Agricultural Hall. There the crush was very great, but he was determined to get in. On hearing, after entering the hall, that Mr. Moody was not to be the speaker, he was much disappointed, and was so depressed in spirits in consequence that he could take no part in the service. The Rev. William Taylor, of California, was the speaker, and Mr. Bradlaugh soon became interested.

The meeting was brought to a close; he entered the inquiry-room. Mr. Sankey asked him the three following questions, to each of which he replied in the affirmative: "Do you believe that God is the Creator of all things? Do you believe that Jesus is His only begotten Son? Do you believe that Jesus came into the world to save sinners?" Mr. Sankey then asked him what was the difficulty. His reply was, "I am lost!" Mr. Sankey said that Jesus came into the world to save sinners. Mr. Bradlaugh replied, "Not for me."

Mr. Sankey appeared as distressed as himself for a moment, when, opening the Bible, he placed it in Mr. Bradlaugh's hands, pointing to John 3 : 16, saying, "While you read that, I will pray." Mr Bradlaugh said: "Three times I read it, each time stopping at the word 'whosoever.'" When the light at last dawned into his soul, he was enabled to read his own name in that word; and rising to his feet like one electrified, he shouted, "Thank the Lord I have found it!" and rushed out of the building.

Immediately subsequent to his conversion, Mr. Bradlaugh entered the office of the London Christian Herald, where he remained for some time, and engaging in mission work as he had opportunity. By degrees the requests for his services became so pressing that he decided to devote himself wholly to the work of an evangelist, and since that time he has been constantly engaged in the cities of Great Britain, preaching the glad tidings of salvation.

JAMES WATSON'S CHANGE OF LIFE.

It was a sorrowful day when James Watson left home, for he was an only son. James was up early, but his mother and father were up before him, and when James came down into the little kitchen he found his breakfast prepared, and his mother with tearful, yearning eyes on the lookout. There was a last meal together, and then the father, opening the old family Bible, tried to read a chapter, but his voice, husky at first, soon failed him, and he gave up the attempt. But when the old man knelt in prayer the tears left his voice as well as his eyes. He was pleading with God, his Help in days gone by and faith and hope overcame foreboding. Then there were farewells, and James was fairly off.

Unhappily for the boy he shipped under a captain whose profanity was famous even on shipboard, and the sailors were as bad or worse than the captain. Oaths garnished the conversation before the mast as they did the orders from the quarter deck, and young Watson soon found himself falling into the prevalent vice. But his heart was in his work, and he was popular among the crew, and soon became expert in his duties.

During the next few years James was seldom ashore, and when there his visits home were brief. He could not enjoy himself there as he could with his messmates in port. He had to set a perpetual watch on his lips lest, in some unguarded moment, an oath should send a wound into the heart of his mother whom he dearly loved. So he stayed home but a day or two, and if he had more time at his disposal, he spent it in the city where his ship lay in dock. But he rose in his profession; he was the smartest man on the ship, and became second mate.

How low he might have sunk in vice none can say, had it not been for "an accident" which, though James called it by that name at the time he did not regard it as an accident afterward. While his ship was in the harbor of Boston, Mass., James Watson fell and broke his leg. He was taken to the city hospital where his limb was set. There he was visited by a well-known missionary, to whom a sick sailor was always an object of interest. The young man's love for his mother was soon discovered by his visitor, who was anxious to find some tender spot which might be turned to account. James described his mother, and eventually told his visitor of his leaving home and of his mother's forebodings only too surely fulfilled. The missionary was assiduous in his visits, and had the happiness of seeing that the Spirit was working in the young man's soul. He prayed and read with him daily, and before James Watson left the hospital he had given his heart to God.

The return to his ship was sure to be a trial, but Watson was resolved that on that ship where his oaths had been heard, he would go, and on no other, and by the help of God live a godly life, and work for his Saviour. He went aboard, and on the very first day told the men of his conversion. No one dared to laugh openly, for Watson had made himself feared in the old days as well as liked, and he was not the kind of man it was safe to chaff. But when he was away there was many a quiet laugh at his expense, and many a prediction hazarded that Jem would soon go back to his old ways. But Jem did not go back to his old ways, and the men listened with surprise to his speech, now rid of its ungodly expressions. But he was no less able a seaman than before, and if there was any change it was that he was more reliable, less excitable, and more vigilant and attentive to his duties than ever.

During that voyage a storm was experienced such as no man on board had ever seen before. It seemed as if the vessel must go to pieces before the fury of wind and waves, or be engulfed in the trough of the sea. A little group was gathered around the wheel where Watson stood, as he had done all through two watches, afraid to intrust it to other hands. Many a time during those hours his heart had been raised in prayer to God that the ship might be saved. He groaned as he thought of the men on board, of whom not one was prepared to die, and he pleaded with God for them, that they might have another opportunity of making their peace with Him.

The storm increased in violence, and the stout ship quivered before its force like some living thing. The stout hearts of the sailors were quailing, for it became evident to all there that in a very short time the fate of the ship would be decided. Watson noticed a whisper pass round the group, and then one of the men said, "Me and the men thought as perhaps you'd say a prayer, now you've got religion. Maybe it would do good."

James was startled. Such a suggestion had never before been made on that godless ship. But he was thankful, and there with his hand still on the wheel, and every head uncovered, he prayed. He besought God for mercy for all on board if they were about to appear before Him, or if it might please Him that the vessel should be preserved, that the lives of all there might be consecrated to His service.

The ship was saved. The storm blew itself out. But the recollection of that hour of suspense was not lost on either Watson or those who had heard his prayer. It caused James to be more earnest, knowing not how brief might be his opportunities for labor; and it appalled the men by the narrow escape they had had from a watery grave and a dreadful hereafter. When James next entered his father's house he carried not only the good news of his own conversion but of others, brought to God through his instrumentality.

Clara Dalton's Prayer for Her Profligate Cousin.

AN OLD LEGEND OF THE DALTON FAMILY.

Among the traditions of an ancient family is one dating from the troubled times of near a century and a half ago. It is one of the power of a prayer uttered in a moment of unconscious danger to deliver the one who prayed, and those dear to her.

Hugh Dalton, the owner of a large estate, adopted the son of his dead sister, and reared him as his own, when the boy was left alone in the world by the death of his father and mother. The boy from the beginning seemed to have an incurable propensity for bad and deceitful ways. Neither severity nor kindness appeared to have any effect upon him. Mr. Dalton was very patient, and bore from young Reginald provocations he would not have endured from any one else. But he had loved the boy's mother very tenderly, and as his own youth had not been a happy one, he, for the sake of his sister, clung to the hope that care and patience would overcome at length the boy's perversity. But both failed, and the boy grew to be a depraved young man. At length his patience was exhausted, and after the commission of a very wicked act he decided on turning him out of his home.

At this crisis his daughter, Clara Dalton, the cousin of the young man, interceded for him. She was a good Christian girl, and she begged her father to give Reginald one more chance. For a long time Mr. Dalton was immovable, but at last his love for his daughter prevailed, and Reginald was forgiven. Not many days afterward Reginald again transgressed, and this time with peculiar ingratitude. During his uncle's temporary absence from home he brought a few of his dissolute companions home with him and entertained them. Wine flowed freely, until all the party were in that hilarious condition when wickedness is more dangerous than in complete intoxication. While they were in that state Reginald led the way to Clara's sitting-room where she sat alone reading, and allowed her to be grossly insulted. That sealed his fate. Mr. Dalton would listen to no appeals on his behalf. "Reginald must be cast off forever."

The young man was given three hundred dollars, and informed that every three months he might call at his uncle's bankers and receive the same amount, on condition that he never came near his uncle's residence again. Many a young man would have observed the conditions and tried to redeem his character and position, but Reginald Dalton was not of that kind.

In less than a month he and his boon companions had spent all the money, and he had the effrontery to write his uncle for a loan. No answer was returned, and pressed on by his friends and primed with liquor, he went to the old house and asked to see Mr. Dalton. He was refused, and summarily ejected from the premises.

That night in mad resentment he and his companions concealed themselves in the shrubbery, resolved to rob the house in the dead of night. Reginald knew where his uncle kept his money and where the plate was stored, and he promised to lead his companions to the store. They waited until past midnight, and then Reginald, with his face blackened and otherwise disguised, crept cautiously around the house to see that all was quiet. Suddenly he stopped. He heard a voice. He waited and listened. It was his cousin Clara standing at her open window, and she was praying. He remained quite still. He was so close that he could hear her words. She was praying for him, the poor outcast, her poor, misguided cousin, that he might be forgiven and brought to see the evil of his ways.

The abandoned young man had resisted everything else, but before that prayer his heart melted. He turned and fled from the scene a changed man. Changed by the compassion of the Christian whom he had wronged. It was many years afterward when Mr. Dalton and his family heard the story, and then it was from Reginald's own lips, when he returned and received a welcome as a repentant prodigal.

TRUE, THOUGH TRIED.

A Tale of the Seventeenth Century.

A Visit in Prison.

It was late in the afternoon when Jeffries, having exhausted his energies by spasmodic bursts of passion, and when all the evidence that could possibly be obtained had been canvassed, addressed the prisoner, whose immovable attitude had irritated him not a little, and asked her if she had anything to say.

Margaret looked the judge steadfastly in the face, and opened her lips to speak, but no sound came. All eyes were directed toward her, and again she failed to articulate a word. Every voice was hushed; all were eager to hear what a weak woman would have to say in such a hopeless cause. Margaret heard her own heart beat in that dead silence. And at last, summoning all her courage and strength, this time her soft voice was clearly heard by all in court.

"My lord, it is useless for me to undertake any defence of my conduct. . . . I destroyed the picture because it was an exact portrait of myself. When I entered the building, it was not with the purpose of destroying the picture; it was only when I saw men and women bowing down and worshipping before it, that the idea entered my mind. All worship of pictures or images is contrary to God's law; but to behold my sinful self hung there, under the title of the Virgin, the 'mother of God,' was hateful and abhorrent to my soul. It was an insult and a mockery to the God who made me. I could not leave it there—it would have brought a curse and blight upon me, for robbing Him of His glory. I may have outraged the laws of my country, and of a Church who sets her judgment above that of the Most High; but I count my Saviour's honor dearer than liberty or life itself."

What more Margaret would have said is not known, for the judge rose impatiently from his seat, saying:

"The court does not want a sermon. What does a puling girl like you know about doctrines? Woman, you have condemned yourself; and since you hold yourself so cheap, it may please you to know that you are to be imprisoned until such time as it shall please his majesty to extend his favor toward you; and that this night your dainty back is to receive twenty lashes. I would recommend you during the whipping to cheer your spirits by singing a new psalm, in praise of the great clemency of his majesty's representatives."

"I doubt not that God will sustain me under this and every other trial." And so saying, Margaret was led away, her countenance as cheerful as one who had been acquitted, instead of one who knew that stripes and perpetual imprisonment were her inevitable lot.

It was ten o'clock of the evening following the eventful day just recorded, and Margaret lay on the straw bed, in her cell at the castle, watching, with her eyes wakeful with fever and pain, the stars shining in through the bars of her window. She had undergone Jeffries' brutal sentence. During its infliction she had been partly insensible, but the agony she endured would not long allow her such blessed oblivion. Yet through all the "Lord had sustained her," and no cry had escaped her lips. Bleeding and faint, she lay on her bed, thankful for even this quiet and rest. Again and again she tried to remember and repeat the evening hymn she knew so well last night; but her mind wandered continually, dwelling, unbidden, on her childish days.

The door opened, and the sufferer wearily turned her head, and saw the turnkey's wife, with a lantern and cup in her hand. The sight of a woman was welcome, and an expression of pleasure lighted up the prisoner's white face and bright feverish eyes.

"You will be thirsty, maybe?" said the woman, as she set down the lantern and pushed to the door.

"Yes, I am parched," gasped Margaret, as the cup was held to her lips. In a few seconds it was drained. "Thank you, thank you!" said the girl, gratefully; and the woman felt more than repaid for her kindness.

"Does your back hurt you very much?" she asked, feeling in her pocket, and producing a phial.

"Yes, it is very painful; but I suffered almost as much from thirst. I shall be better now. I never tasted anything so good as that cup of lemon-water."

"There was only a squeeze of lemon in it. I know it's good for sick folks. Now you had better have some of this balsam on your back; it will smart bad at first, but heal over all the sooner after. I brought some linen with me."

With gentle hands the woman dressed the wounds. She said truly they would smart, and looked with wonder to see the maiden bear it without a murmur. The jailer's wife was ignorant, low-born, and unlettered; but this deed of charity and womanly kindness shall ever be remembered to her honor.

The lantern and its bearer departed, and Margaret was again left alone to watch the stars, until they faded at the dawn of day. Lonely weeks crept on, and at length the winter came, and the merry Christmas-time, and in Sir Gilbert's hall the holly and evergreens were hung, and his larder overflowed with good cheer. The baronet tried to forget one who last year made his hearth look brighter and bonnier by her smile and graceful presence. As Rebecca heaped on the faggots, and saw the cheerful blaze leap up, she thought with aching heart of her young mistress, cold and comfortless in the old keep; and when the servants sat down to their feast, she turned away from the richly-laden board. How could she feast, when a scanty meal of the coarsest food was all that would be served to her dear lady!

Rebecca was determined to make one more desperate effort to see her mistress. By laying in wait for the turnkey's wife, and the offer of well-timed gifts, she had established herself on a rather friendly footing with this woman, and by her interest she hoped to be successful at last. The day after Christmas Day she made the attempt; and joining the jailer's wife as she returned from market, would not be shaken off, and was overjoyed to find herself at any rate within the walls of the formidable keep. Then it required no small contrivance and manœuvring on the part of the woman to obtain the key of Margaret's cell. That secured, Rebecca did not linger long before she stood at her mistress's door. But when she entered, and caught sight of the altered face and form of her beloved lady, she could not utter a word; she could only kiss the head that sank on her faithful bosom, while Margaret murmured:

"O Rebecca, Rebecca! it seems years since I saw you last!"

"It has not been for want of trying, I warrant you, Miss Margaret; it is almost a miracle I am here now. But oh, what a hole this is!" said Rebecca, recovering and looking round; and how cold and dreary you must be. I should go mad, I think, shut up here month after month."

"I trust you would not deny our blessed faith, Rebecca, if ever you were tested. We don't know what we can endure till the trials come."

"Well, I hope I should not be a coward, but I think it is a mercy that I have never been tried. Master Pelham has tried to see you, over and over again; and the other day he gave me a letter, which I was to give to you if I had ever the luck to see you, and here it is."

With great reverence and pleased surprise, Margaret took her letter, which the careful maid had wrapped in a snowy handkerchief, smelling sweetly of lavender. She could hardly keep her eyes off the cover that bore her name, in square, bold characters.

When shortly after the sound of Rebecca's retreating footsteps had died away, Margaret's eyes again wandered to the letter. In those days written communications were rarer than they are in this scribbling age. The epistle was written on a large sheet of paper, that was rough compared with our modern "cream-laid note," but the writing was manly and clear; the seal neatly made, bearing an ancient crest, with the writer's own motto, Vota vita mea; and to Margaret it seemed the most precious piece of paper she had ever handled. After surveying the outside, and trying to imagine all that was written within, she at length opened it, and soon became absorbed in its contents. Faded and yellow and worn, with the seal still preserved unbroken, we may peruse it ourselves now, for the hand that wrote it, and the thin fair fingers that unfolded and treasured it so sacredly, have long since mouldered in the dust.

"To Mistress Margaret Desborough.

"Dear Sister in the Faith: I would that it were in my power to visit and minister unto you in prison, but the Lord has hedged up the way, and it is not for me to gainsay His will; nor, since I have such a sincere desire to follow His commands, and serve even the least of His little ones, will He lay the lack of its performance to my charge. Therefore I take the only means left, namely, that of writing the words I would fain speak, and trusting my letter to the hands of your faithful friend, Rebecca. . . .

"Our little flock is . . . not unmindful of your sufferings, dear sister; of bodily pains, or still sharper, the loneliness and isolation of your warm and tender heart. 'No chastening for the present seemeth joyous, but grievous;' yet we cannot find it in our hearts to pity one to whom the Lord hath given a fellowship in His sufferings, and honored by permitting her to endure shame, and loss, and rebuke, for His dear sake. . . .

"These are dark days for our beloved England; the best and holiest of her sons and daughters are either living in insecurity, or in bonds, or forsaking their native land for a less loved but freer soil. May the chains soon be loosed from the necks and consciences of this people, and Englishmen again enjoy their birthright of liberty to worship God. There is much talk of one Master John Bunyan, who lies in Bedford jail—a godly Baptist minister, who spends his time most profitably for the future edification of the Church and the world. He is a wonderful man; and if his written words are as powerful as his preached ones were, his imprisonment is likely to be a greater blessing than if he were still at large: so the evil one that thought to do him hurt, will, as he often does, outwit himself. . . . Open thine heart, my sister, to divine influences, as the flower opens to the sun; and He who filleth heaven and earth with His presence and story, will dwell in the temple thou hast prepared within, and thy night of sorrow shall be turned into a morning of joy. Farewell.

"I am ever your faithful pastor,

"John Pelham."

The spring came early in the year following this Christmas, and the country round Deerham was silently clothed with beauty. But while everything was starting up into new life without, the "White Rose of Deerham" was drooping and fading.

"Poor thing!" said the turnkey, "if they don't send an order for her release soon, it will come too late. Just see, wife, if you can't persuade her to eat a bit of something. Captain Butler may rave, if he likes; but I ain't going to have a young creature pining away by inches, if I can help it. She has been punished fifty times over for any foolish trick she did; and now she'll die, if they don't send for her soon. I shall have it on my conscience, and I don't need to load it any more."

The woman went right willingly on the kind errand. Margaret was lying on her bed, too weak to sit up in her uncomfortable stiff-backed chair. She smiled cheerfully on her visitor, but could not be persuaded to eat. The woman could not return her smile; she was too much distressed to see the sick maiden's death-like pallor. She implored her, almost with tears, to take something; so to please her, Margaret did.

"One breath of the sweet fresh air would do me more good than medicines or food; but it is useless to long after impossible things," said poor Margaret.

The jailer determined, however, that she should have a taste of the spring breezes, and have another and more comfortable cell; but her sickness increased, so that it became impossible to move her. During her illness, the good wife waited on her night and day, never grudging the many toilsome steps she took up and down the winding staircase. When able to takl, Margaret strove to repay her nurse's care by directing her dark mind to the only source of light. It was a happy day for the jailer and his family when Margaret Desborough was committed to his keeping; and still happier when sickness cast her on their humanity and care.

THE FIRST CHRISTIAN MARTYR.

S. S. Lesson for March 18. Acts 7 : 54 ; 8 : 1-4. Golden Text, Rev. 3 : 21. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Persecution as a Blessing—Preferable to Earthly Joy—An Unusual Defence—Not an Apology—An Indictment from History—God's Witnesses Invariably Rejected—Joseph—Moses—A Protest Against Formalism—The Judges Exasperated—Stephen's Work Done—Stephen Lynched—Prayer for His Assailants—Outburst of a Storm—The Fugitives Preaching.

PERSECUTION is among the blessings of Christianity, "Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." The blessing is not simply an expected, but a present one, "Blessed are they," "theirs is the kingdom of heaven." The poor, blind world imagines that the followers of Jesus forego with some difficulty the pleasures of earth for the sake of a reward more or less certain hereafter; and many of them say in their hearts, "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush," and they think they are really better off than God's people. But oh, how blind they are! To any one who is entirely given up to God because it comes from a Father's hand; he cannot be persecuted without the precious sweetness of knowing that it is for Jesus and with Jesus that he suffers, and he would not exchange such suffering for all the joy which the world could give. Instead of being occupied with the personal wrong which was done to him, Stephen, more alive to the presence of God than that of man, and seeking by any means to bring his judges into contact with God, stood ready and fearless to make his defence, as soon as he should be called upon.

EVERYTHING COMES IN THE WAY OF BLESSING,

The high-priest called upon him to answer his accusers, "Are these things so?" It was which was made by this man "full of faith and of the Holy Ghost." Not one word do we find in it of apology, excuse, or self-defence. He seemed altogether to rise above the circumstances in which he was placed, and he took the position of accuser instead of accused; instead of pleading his own cause, he pleaded that of his injured God and his crucified and risen Saviour. To him it was a matter of unconcern whether he was condemned or acquitted, whether he lived or died; the opinion of no man present was of any value to him, but the salvation of their souls was to him a priceless object, and putting himself and his interests and safety entirely on one side, he sought their good alone. Oh, for such a spirit now! Oh, for such divine disinterestedness! Lord, make it revive among us.

Stephen had the history of his people at his fingers' ends, and he traced through their early life the rejection of God's chosen witnesses. In the very patriarchal times Joseph, God's chosen one, was rejected and persecuted by his brethren; cast out by man, yet "God was with him," and wrought by him great deliverance in the land of Egypt. Then arose Moses who was "fair to God" (see margin). He was stirred up to deliver his people, "it came into his heart to visit his brethren, the children of Israel. . . . For he supposed that his brethren would have understood how that God by his hand would deliver them, but they understood not." Like Joseph he must be one alone, rejected by men, but chosen by God. His divine commission, although delayed for his own education, and also because of the unbelief of his people, was renewed again when God appeared to him in the burning bush. "This saying, who made thee to be a ruler and a judge? The same did God send to be a ruler, a deliverer, by the hand of the angel which appeared to him in the bush." The rejected one, and no other, should bring out the people of God from Egypt. Stephen testified, "This is that Moses which said unto the children of Israel, a Prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren like unto me; Him shall ye hear."

But Stephen went on to shew them the rebelliousness of heart which had always characterized them; how the very Moses who had been their deliverer was disobeyed by their fathers who "thrust him from them, and in their hearts turned back again into Egypt." It was always the rejection of God's choice.

He then touched upon the worship of the children of Israel, "the tabernacle of witness in the wilderness," then Solomon's temple, and knowing how the Jews prided themselves in the possession of a place where men ought to worship, and knowing how God regarded the drawing nigh unto Him with the lips when the heart was far from Him, Stephen, said, "Howbeit the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands." This touched the very root of that externalism which made them so averse to the reality of a spiritual worship. To them there was, and could be, no worship without the temple; the temple itself was indispensable, while they could do without the presence of God. But Stephen feared them not to all he said and to all he did; and he heeded none other. Thus turning full upon his judges, he said, "Ye stiffnecked, and uncircumcized in heart and ears, ye do always resist the Holy Ghost: as your fathers did, so do ye. Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted? And they have slain them which have shewed before of the coming of the Just One; of whom ye have been now the betrayers and murderers: who have received the law by the disposition of angels, and have not kept it."

GOD WAS WITNESS

Was it not rather unwise of Stephen to have gone thus in the very face of the prejudices of those to whom he spoke? No, he had counted the cost; led by the Holy Ghost, he followed on, regardless of what the consequences might be to him; he was animated by no ill-feeling toward his accusers, but he knew that they were self-deceived, and needed rousing, and most effectually he did it. "When they heard these things, they were cut to the heart, and they gnashed on him with their teeth." But his work was done, it cost him his life, but he died victorious; those hearts which had received a sword cut from the Word of God, could be healed only in one way, and that was by Jesus Himself. Many a life has been lost over some paltry political question, or some strife about territory; but here was a noble object, the awakening and salvation of souls which were crusted over with pharisaical self-righteousness.

STEPHEN HAD DONE HIS WORK;

his enemies might gnash their teeth, but it was lost upon him; there was nothing in him which could be touched or hurt by their rage; "He being full of the Holy Ghost, looked up steadfastly into heaven, and saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God, and said, Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God." "Whosoever therefore shall confess Me before men, him will I confess also before My Father which is in heaven" (Matt. 10 : 32). Stephen was confessing Christ on earth, and Jesus was confessing Stephen in heaven; and God dropped the veil between, how should the rage of a few dying men around him distract him at such a moment?

But his absorption with his Lord did not create any feeling of awe in these men, stung to the quick as they were by an accusing conscience, the dictates of which they were unwilling to heed. "Then they cried out with a loud voice, and stopped their ears, and ran upon him with one accord, and cast him out of the city, and stoned him." What was this? The august tribunal of Israel's priests and elders yielding to a spirit of riot as though they had been a mob of roughs!

Was this seemly? Was this worthy of them? Ah no, but their pride had been wounded, the covering which had hidden away their sin from themselves and from others was rudely torn away, they were unmasked, they were found out, and their rage boiled against the man whom God had used to show them up. All other feeling gave way before their thirst for vengeance. They could not get away from the pure, holy, heavenly look of the man they hated, reflecting as it did the opened heaven into which he looked; but they would stop their ears so that no more of his words should enter into them. It was lynch law, there was no justice in Stephen's execution. An idolater must be stoned (Deut. 17 : 2-5); a rebellious son who "is a glutton or a drunkard" (Deut. 21 : 18-21); an adulterer or adulteress (Deut. 22 : 24); but Stephen was none of these, at the mouth of false witnesses, in the presence of unjust judges, he was put to death.

But oh, how different was his death from that of the prophet Zechariah under similar circumstances. Under the dispensation of the law, the martyr said when he was stoned, "The Lord look upon it and require it" (2 Chron. 24 : 22). But Stephen, looking into the open heaven, even after the fatal stones had blinded him, for his spirit saw Jesus, cried saying, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." And he kneeled down, and cried with a loud voice, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge." Thoughts of vengeance did not exist in Stephen; he saw the hands which threw the stones only as instruments permitted by God, how be angry with them! He died in a spirit of sacrifice for them, and only love reigned in his heart, because Jesus had full possession. "And when he had said this he fell asleep.

"FAITHFUL UNTO DEATH"

(Rev. 2 : 10) and loving his enemies, he had trodden in his Master's footsteps, and the then unwritten promise of our golden text was fulfilled to him, before it became the written inspiration of God, "To him that overcometh will I give to sit with Me in My throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with My Father in His throne" (Rev. 3 : 21). "And devout men carried Stephen to his burial, and made great lamentation over him."

There was one man, afterward the Apostle Paul, who took part in this guilty transaction, "The witnesses laid down their clothes at a young man's feet whose name was Saul." "Saul was consenting unto his death." But Saul also was "cut to the heart," the arrow had entered in which rankled until the time of his conversion. Meanwhile this martyrdom of Stephen was but of persecution which had long been gathering. The enemy of souls could not let the Gospel of Christ carry all before it in Jerusalem, he succeeded in making his partizans so zealous that whereas, a short time previously, the triumphs of the Gospel were so glorious and the work spreading among the priests themselves, now the disciples were "all scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judea and Samaria, except the apostles."

"What a deathblow to the Church!" some would say, "what a terrible misfortune!" others would exclaim. But no; although "Saul made havoc of the Church, entering into every house and hailing men and women, committed them to prison," and thus gave them an opportunity to endure suffering and shame for Jesus' sake; "they that were scattered abroad," undaunted by the imprisonment of their companions, undeterred by the stoning of Stephen, "went everywhere preaching the Gospel." They could not help it; the fire burned in their bones, souls were perishing, they were possessed of the secret which could save them from eternal death, how should they be occupied with the trifles of time? How make business or any personal interest a first consideration? God, souls, eternity, were realities to them, and they lived and preached accordingly. Let us do likewise.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Silver Wedding of the Prince and Princess Imperial of Germany was celebrated on March 1st. The anniversary of the wedding was January 25th, but the celebration was postponed on account of the death of the Emperor's brother. The streets of Berlin were thronged with people, and busts of the Prince and Princess were exhibited everywhere among the decorations. In the palace the scene was one of extraordinary splendor. Its chief feature was a procession representing the march of history, in which the promenaders were attired in the costumes of the various periods. Hundreds of Germany's proudest nobles took part in the procession. In the course of the pageant a youth recited an ode to "the flower of England, which had embraced the Hohenzollern stem, invoking eternal bloom and prosperity on the spreading Hohenzollern tree." Distinguished guests from England, Austria and other courts were present.

Mr. Gladstone has Sufficiently Recovered to leave Cannes and return to London. On his way thither he made a short stay in Paris and had interviews with M. Grévy and other members of the French Government. They are supposed to have been on the subject of the Egyptian complication, as it is known that France is still strenuously opposed to the assumption by England of sole control over Egyptian affairs.

A Violent Speech on the State of Ireland was delivered by Mr. Parnell in the British House of Commons in moving an amendment to the address in reply to the Queen's Speech. In the summary of the speech cabled here, Mr. Parnell is reported as saying: "If there has been any reduction in the number of outrages in Ireland, it is only because the people are being kept down by the brutal, terrible Coercion act administered in a brutal, terrible way." He pointed to the fact that hardly any persons arrested under the curfew clause had been convicted, and contended that the power of arrest had been abused. He complained of the conduct of Irish judges, who, he said, were mostly appointed for political reasons and were, therefore, unfit to try political cases. When the people saw that juries were packed and that judges turned crown prosecutors, all sympathy with law and order was destroyed, and the people inevitably became abetters in crime. If the government, after the Phœnix Park murders were committed, had relied on the sympathy of the people instead of upon a tyrannical act, Ireland would have been pacified. The charge of jury packing was indignantly denied by members of the government, and facts were adduced to prove that it was unfounded. Mr. Parnell's allusion to the Phœnix Park murders excited considerable feeling. In implying that after the commission of the foul crime Ireland would have been pacified but for the effort of the government to trace the murderers and prevent further outrages, he was regarded as displaying shameless effrontery. By abstaining from disavowing his indirect complicity in the conspiracy, he is reported to have alienated the sympathy of the English radicals, without whom he cannot hope to accomplish anything for his country.

Two Men are Wanted by the British Government to answer for a share in the conspiracy responsible for the Phœnix Park murders. Of these Frank Byrne is in Paris, and P. J. Sheridan is in New York. In both cases the British Government has applied to the respective governments for the extradition of the men. It is reported that the French Government is indisposed to comply with the demand, though Byrne has been arrested and held to await the arrival of evidence from England. Mr. Sheridan was not arrested at the close of last week, although Washington despatches state that a warrant for his apprehension has been issued. It is very doubtful whether, under the extradition treaty, Sheridan will be given up. The charge will be of conspiracy to murder, which, if the culprit's guilt were proved, would be covered by the treaty; but it is contended that the Phœnix Park murders were a political crime, the assassins having no personal enmity to the victims, except in their official capacity. England has herself set the example of refusing to give up political criminals, so that if the charge against Sheridan is proved to belong to that category, it is not likely that he will be surrendered. Governor Butler and General Roger A. Pryor are engaged to defend Sheridan if he should be arrested and brought to trial.

A Pathetic Letter has been Sent by Lady Frederick Cavendish to a clergyman who, having preached a sermon on the Phœnix Park murders, and being about to publish it, asked Lady Cavendish's permission to dedicate it to her. She wrote: "You will, I am sure, forgive me if I beg you, before sending the MS. to the printers, to look through it first with the special view of seeing if there is any word that could be turned into a desire for vengeance. You will readily understand how I must shrink from any such feeling. I would rather, as far as I reverently may, adopt the Lord's prayer on the cross —'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.' The law, I know, must take its course for the sake of the unhappy country itself. I pray that neither the unspeakable greatness of my sorrow nor the terrible wickedness of those men may ever blind either myself or any of the English people to the duty of patience, justice and sympathy in our thoughts, words and deeds with regard to Ireland and its people at large."

Reports of Plots Against the Life of the Czar are in circulation. A seizure of anarchist documents was made recently in Brussels, and it is stated that they show a plot has been organized to murder the Czar of Russia on the occasion of his coronation in May. It is rumored in Paris that the disclosures will lead to the arrest of Louise Michel and several of her colleagues. The house of an anarchist in Brussels, who entertained Louise Michel when she was there recently, was searched on February 25th by the police, who seized three trunks. The Brussels Gazette says the majority of the documents which have been seized are written in Russian and Italian. They refer to an international plot.

A Missionary Conference has Recently been held at Calcutta, India. It was attended by nearly five hundred persons, men and women, the representatives of nearly all the Protestant societies working in India. No formal resolutions were passed, but practical suggestions were made by different speakers which could be adapted to the circumstance of various places and needs. It was reported at the conference that the census just taken shows that the number of Protestant native Christians in India is 528,000, an increase of 86 per cent in the ten years that have elapsed since the former sitting of the conference.

Idolatry in Spain is the Startling Subject of a letter from Miss Lydia Brooks, a Christian lady now visiting that country. She lately received from a woman a little idol, meant to represent Christ as a babe, which had been worshipped for many years. The woman was afraid to burn it lest it should leap upon her. Her eyes have been gradually opened to the wiles and machinations of the priests, and there is every reason to believe she has received the Saviour. Amid much persecution she remains firm to her principles, and has gathered round her a number of the neighbors, to whom she reads the Bible. Many of the fishermen are much interested in the meetings. Miss Brooks has commenced Cottage Meetings, which it is hoped will quietly introduce the truths of the Bible into the homes of the people.

Mr. Moody Paid a Brief Visit to Edinburgh after the conclusion of the Birmingham services, and before commencing the meetings in Belfast. He visited the Scottish capital to inspect a building in which he takes a deep interest. Last year during the services in Edinburgh, Mr. Moody made a strong appeal for a new and suitable building in which to conduct the manifold operations of the Carrubbers Close Mission. For many years this mission has done a noble work of evangelization among the lapsed masses of the old town of Edinburgh. Recent accounts have shown that the need for such work in that part of the city is as great as ever; it was therefore deemed imperative that a capacious building should be erected in the High Street, whence Gospel agencies could radiate through the surrounding darkness, and streams of blessing be made to flow all the year round. Mr. Moody's appeal was liberally responded to, and the money needed, $50,000, was subscribed. The new premises are now well on in the process of erection; it was to note the progress made and to take counsel with those friends in charge of the enterprise that Mr. Moody made a detour to the Scottish capital.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey's Services in Belfast, Ireland, attracted immense crowds of attentive hearers. On February 11th, the first day of the mission, a meeting for Christians was announced at the early hour of eight o'clock. Before seven, some two thousand people had filled the church. Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey had great difficulty, by half-past seven, in the gray dawn of the morning, in getting access to the church. Overflow meetings were held in the adjoining lecture-room, and also in a neighboring church, and even then the streets remained crowded. At three o'clock a meeting for women was held in the Ulster Hall, capable of holding over 3000. By two o'clock it was crammed, and two other churches were again filled, while crowds were still upon the streets unable to find entrance. Mr. Moody seemed overcome by a sight of the greatness of the crowds, and the eagerness of the multitudes to hear. He was obliged to preach four times to the listening crowds during the afternoon and evening, as they successively filled the hall. On all occasions a large number professed a desire to accept Jesus as their Saviour. Mr. E. W. Bliss conducted the overflow meetings. The evangelists are now laboring in Manchester.

Dr. Ziemann is now Evangelizing in Westphalia, Germany, among his own countrymen. A Westphalian paper says: "A remarkable event in the religious life of our province is the meetings held by Dr. Ziemann from England. The largest hall, holding 2500 people, has been filled. If those who listen to the Doctor's words wish to reap real blessing they will have to take in hand again the old Bible, and to use it as their fathers did."

Mr. Philip Phillips, the Singing Evangelist, and his son have met with a hearty reception at Kingston, Jamaica. The Bishop of Jamaica and ministers of all denominations were present at their first meeting in Coke Chapel. The service is described as most impressive throughout.

Volume V. of the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now ready, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1882 with complete index. Price $3 including postage. Ten per cent less to ministers and the trade.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), for February, may be obtained at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price six cents, postage paid.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

REV. J. G. GREGSON, GOSPEL TEMPERANCE MISSIONARY IN INDIA—SCENES IN HIS LIFE.

REV. J. GELSON GREGSON:

Indian Missionary and Temperance Advocate.

His Early Consecration to Christ—First Journey to India in 1858—Removal from Monghyr to Agra in 1861—Formation of the Soldiers' Total Abstinence Association—Illness and Return to England in 1865—Temperance Work in the Royal Navy—Co-operation of Commodore Goodenough—Return to India in 1871—Evils of Drinking Among Soldiers—Hindrances to Temperance in India—Recent Visit to England—Incidents of The Afghan Campaign, 1879-80—A Soldier's Funeral—A Temperance Meeting in Camp—The Khyber Pass—Convoy of Sick and Wounded—Mr. Gregson's Present Work among the Military Stations in Egypt.

THE temptations of a soldier's life are neither few nor feeble. Surrounded, as he generally is, by men who have entered the military profession out of sheer recklessness or because they expect to spend in it a life of relief from hard labor with opportunities for the indulgence of the lowest passions of human nature, he is liable to be led by example and companionship into degradation and vice. Of all the professions, it is probably the most unpropitious for the practice of Christian principle. But while the life of a Christian in the army is one beset with temptations and full of danger, yet, there are many bright examples which prove that the grace of God can enable the Christian soldier to lead a godly consistent life in the garrison and in the field. Of all the spheres of Christian usefulness, therefore, there are none demanding more patience, tact and devotion, than that of the man who carries the Gospel to soldiers, and endeavors to counteract the temptations incidental to the military life. Among the most successful of these missionaries of the cross is the Rev. J. G. Gregson, whose portrait appears this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The record of his labors in India abundantly testify to the triumphant victories of the Holy Spirit and to the earnestness and energy of the human instrument.

The Rev. J. Gelson Gregson was born in the South of England about 1836, and having been benefited by the prayers and example of a pious mother and father, at an early age he was convinced of sin, converted to Christ, and devoted himself to His service.

Ever since, almost without intermission, he has been identified with mission and temperance work, and many, both civilians and soldiers, have been blessed through his instrumentality.

FIRST JOURNEY TO INDIA.

When he was about twenty-two years of age—in October, 1858—he performed his first journey to India under the auspices of the Baptist Missionary Society, and for three years after his arrival, he was stationed at Monghyr, where his evangelistic work among the natives was highly appreciated for its wisdom and earnestness, and was much blessed of God.

In 1861, Mr. Gregson was removed to the great city of Agra, and in the following year he commenced his temperance work among the soldiers, native and British, stationed there, by giving an address, "On the folly and peril of drinking," in front of the canteen, in the Agra cantonment, to the men of the 35th Regiment. As an immediate result of this courageous effort, the Soldiers' Total Abstinence Association was inaugurated. It received no little stimulus from the fact that at the very first it received the hearty approval and co-operation of the first commanding officer, Colonel J. C. Guise, V. C., of the 90th Regiment, who joined it and encouraged others to do so. The enterprise, once launched, continued to command attention, and, though often in the face of petty and annoying persecution, prosecuted its victorious and beneficent errand among the men.

ILLNESS AND RETURN HOME.

After three years of absorbing and exhausting work, in the year 1865, Mr. Gregson fell a victim to the ravages of small-pox, and in a precarious condition was confined to his bed for a considerable time. When he was sufficiently restored, he was advised by the physicians who attended him to return to England, that convalescence might the more quickly end in complete recovery. He did so, and derived so much benefit from the change of air and scene on his journey home, that when he once again sighted the shores of England, he had regained his health and strength, and with a thankful heart, bounding with high hope, he consecrated himself anew to the Lord whom he loved, and became more than ever conspicuous for successful service.

Mr. Gregson still led to consecrate his efforts to the reclamation of soldiers, went to Portsea, a town which is practically one with Portsmouth, where a large force of British soldiers is always stationed to guard the docks and arsenal. There he settled down for a time, throwing himself with characteristic ardor and activity into the various local philanthropic and evangelistic movements, such as the town mission and midnight mission, himself, on every possible occasion, preaching the Gospel of the grace of God to the multitudes of the debased and perishing around him. His popularity was so extensive, and his interest in education so well known, that he was elected to a seat on the first School Board appointed in the borough.

TEMPERANCE WORK IN THE NAVY.

His identification with temperance work, however, grew more complete, and the needs of the seamen on board the government ships appealed to his warmest sympathies. As one stage toward the realization of his plans for their welfare, he obtained the permission of the authorities to form a Naval Temperance League on board the Minotaur flagship, which was at that time commanded by Commodore Goodenough, who, in 1876, died from the effects of a poisoned arrow shot at him by a treacherous native on the beach of Santa Cruz Island, in the Pacific Ocean. This League became the parent agency of the multiform temperance work now so largely promoted in the British navy.

COMMODORE GOODENOUGH.

Commodore Goodenough was a stanch temperance man, and much benefit accrued to the cause of Gospel temperance through his co-operation with Mr. Gregson in introducing the movement. Mrs. Goodenough tells us that it was upon her husband's return from a second meeting in Portsea that he "came to the conclusion that he could not, consistently with his own ideas of right and wrong, continue to advise people to do what he did not do himself. Having already become much more firmly impressed with the advantages of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors—an opinion which gained strength with him every year that he lived—he from that day, though he took no pledge, gave up the use of all wine, beer, or spirits, and, except in illness, continued to do so during the remainder of his life."

But Mr. Gregson had a tender place in his heart also for the children, and appraised at a very high rate their intelligent sympathy, and the devotion of their youthful energies to the furtherance of temperance work. In 1870 he was the means of bringing about a great Band of Hope demonstration, when three thousand children, all abstainers, marched through Portsea. At this time he was also much employed in visiting a considerable number of the Baptist Churches of the United Kingdom as a deputation from the Missionary Society in London.

RETURN TO INDIA.

In the year 1871 an earnest appeal for more missionaries in India not meeting with the response that was anticipated, Mr. Gregson volunteered his services to the Missionary Committee in their emergency, and they were gratefully accepted. In January of the following year he again started for his old quarters at Agra. We learn that during his absence from India the Temperance Association which he had commenced in 1862 had been allowed to lapse, so he at once determined to reorganize it. From that time to the present, the work has been pressed forward with conspicuous success.

The Association now has a distinguished list of vice-presidents, comprising officers, chaplains, and others. Mr. Gregson acts as secretary, in which capacity he has travelled from one end of India to the other; in the cold season of 1879 alone, the journeyed upward of nine thousand miles. In connection with the Association there is a temperance magazine, On Guard, which is edited by Mr. Gregson. When it was first issued the circulation of the monthly issue amounted to three hundred copies, but this has steadily progressed until it has now a circulation of over one thousand copies monthly, and a higher figure will soon be reached.

EVILS OF LIQUOR AMONG SOLDIERS.

The Report for 1880 returns the number of branch societies at 128, with no less than 9002 members. In the same document Mr. Gregson presents a tabulated statement, dealing with nine departments, and showing the deaths, admissions to hospital, defaulters, courts martial, etc. He divides the men into abstainers and non-abstainers, and in each case the advantages of total abstainers on active service are clearly demonstrated.

The following extract from the report indicates the evils arising from the vice of drunkenness among soldiers: "In visiting our societies in Afghanistan, it soon became evident that drink was a fruitful cause of insubordination. There was hardly a camp between Peshawur and Cabul where soldiers hadn't been flogged for crime connected with drink. At Jellalabad, the guard over the Commissariat rum store broke into the barrels and got incapably drunk, which led to a native sepoy guard being placed over the store, as the British soldiers could not be trusted over rum. This was all the more conspicuous at this camp on account of the illustrious garrison of Jellalabad in 1842 gaining such honor for brave deeds and patient endurance, without a single dram of rum. Nothing is more fatal to steadiness under fire, and patience on the line of march, than a dram of rum, and whenever soldiers have been without it, they have always discharged their duties better than when they got it."

HINDRANCES TO TEMPERANCE.

Mr. Gregson traces the obstacles which have so long opposed the progress of temperance work in India to three sources, namely, "Prejudice against any effort which discountenances drinking customs; popular fallacies which have long supposed the use of intoxicating liquors to be essential in an Indian climate; and habits which have overcome hundreds of men, leading moderate drinkers into continual excess." It is encouraging to be assured, on his authority, that "Every year the opposition has to give way before the strong evidence of facts, gathered from every regiment in the service, that drink is the ruin of British soldiers, and the cause of more sickness than that which arises from climatic influences." He adds, with an emphasis which cannot be misundersood, "Much that is attributed to the Sun might be more correctly ascribed to the Bottle."

Beside his purely temperance work, Mr. Gregson has been instrumental in erecting mission halls at Monghyr, Allahabad, and Agra. The building at Agra is a fine structure in memory of the late General Havelock, who was stationed in the cantonment.

MR. GREGSON'S RECENT VISIT HOME.

In 1880-1881 Mr. Gregson once more visited England, and during his stay addressed several large public meetings in London and the provinces, everywhere receiving the most enthusiastic reception. One of the most effective speeches he delivered was at Dublin, in November, 1880, in which appears the following incisive and pregnant language:

"When heathen men have told me that they regarded Christianity as something that is closely allied to drunkenness, is it not time to speak out? Yes; and when we see the influences the drinking customs of our nation exert working among the educated communities of Hindostan, among men who have passed with their tumult the sound of a deeper roaring? Should we not at once understand that we were already within the rapids caused by the terrific fall?

And have we not exactly described the present condition of the stream of time? For both the prophets and the Lord Himself foretold a mighty catastrophe which will usher in a new age; a season of perplexity and trouble immediately preceding the times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord; a general disruption and disintegration of society, amid wars, tumults, and the most appalling calamities, to be followed by the glorious

REIGN OF THE PRINCE OF PEACE.

And are not signs of our approach to these predicted days of terror continually multiplying around us? Do not events, which were wont to float by in slow procession, now chase each other before our bewildered eyes with such rapidity that they pass away in months, or it may be even in weeks, instead of years? Have not the currents of public opinion ceased to originate merely in the schemes of a few princes and statesmen—and is not every country torn by antagonistic factions which drag the State, now in this direction, now in that?* Nay, are there not also multitudes of private individuals, who have each his own nostrum for divers ills, ever agitating society by thrusting themselves into notice?

THE SPREAD OF KNOWLEDGE.

Doubtless one chief cause of all this confusion has been that very thing which the world regards as a cure for every evil—the spread of knowledge. For many of those who acquire "a little learning"—and the majority of mankind can do no more—are not slow to give proof that in very deed

"Shallow draughts intoxicate the brain," and are wont, by a confident and persistent setting forth of their opinions, to lead astray those whose ignorance exceeds their own, and in this manner to confound the counsels of wiser guides.

Education of a certain kind has indeed become general; but, alas! not with the expected result, since morals seem at the same time to be degenerating in inverse ratio. For how common is the lack of truthfulness, and that not merely in commercial life, but in all ranks of society! And this evil does not only exist, but is recognized as at least a venial fault, if not an absolute necessity. The law, "Swear to thine own hurt and change not," has no popularity in the present age, and he who breaks it will find many advocates and defenders.

Meanwhile the growing impatience and irritability of men, arising from the indulgence of generations, the abuse of stimulants and narcotics, and the painful pressure and excitement of modern life, are beginning to manifest themselves in deeds of recklessness and violence, such as may be found in the records of any newspaper; while lawlessness and crime of every description are increasing, and often assume shapes difficult to detect or punish.

TERRIBLE WARS IMMINENT.

And over all this sin and misery the giant forms of still more terrible woes are projecting their advancing shadows. Europe is armed to an extent hitherto unknown, and has been converted into a vast camp through the jealousy of the great Powers, which are simply waiting for an opportunity of carrying out their aggressive schemes. The most cruel and bloody war of our days has lately terminated in a peace which can be no more than a lull in the storm; for the dreaded Eastern problem is still unsolved. Few are those who expect more than a brief respite before the air is again tormented with the rush of shot and shell and polluted with the smoke of burning villages and homesteads. And even during the short-armed truce in Europe, wars have been raging in Asia, Africa, and America.

REVOLUTIONARY TERRORISM.

Yet again, the rapid spread of Socialistic principles among all the nations of Christendom, and the numerous secret leagues organized for their propagation, are giving statesmen grave cause to apprehend a revolutionary outburst which may shatter the whole framework of society.

Nor are physical commotions wanting to heighten the excitement. The last few years have been unusually prolific in violent storms and inundations destructive to life and property. Earthquakes are frequent, and the shocks, though at present comparatively slight, seem by their ubiquity to betoken a widespread disturbance in the bowels of the earth, which may culminate in some appalling catastrophe. Famines, too, have occurred in divers places; in different parts of India, in Persia, in China, in Morocco, and in several other countries, while various kinds of sickness and disease seem to be more than usually prevalent.

And there are scientific men who suppose that impending astronomical events will render the next few years dismally memorable, and by vitiating the atmosphere cause an outbreak of epidemics and pestilence, like the frightful visitation of the times of Justinian, or the murderous "Black Death" of the fourteenth century, which, as it swept through Europe, is said to have slain five-and-twenty millions of souls, and to have deprived Ireland of more than the half of its inhabitants.

PREMONITIONS OF THE GREAT TRIBULATION.

Now all these things—and many others which might be mentioned, do indeed forbode disasters and widespread distress, but not necessarily the last tribulation, the final throes of the world. For earth has had her times of convulsion, suffering, and change, in former days. God's sore plagues—war, famine, pestilence, and the beasts of the earth, have often desolated her lands in past years, and yet the end has not followed. Nay, were we to feel the solid ground trembling beneath us and behold the mountains lifted up and cast into the sea, even such a sight would not in itself prove that the great day of the Lord had come.

Men have often forgotten this, and, when appealing to Scripture, have too frequently drawn their inferences from an exaggeration of one or more detached texts, instead of carefully considering all that the prophets have spoken. Hence there have been many false alarms and panics.

A FALSE ALARM IN THE SIXTH CENTURY.

A remarkable instance occurred at the close of the sixth century. At that time men had become so accustomed to the domination of Rome that they believed her power could only perish with the world itself. And so, when they saw her apparently in the pangs of dissolution, with her lands wasted by war, famine, and disease, to such a degree that many once populous places had become pestilential through nelgect;* when they beheld her supplies cut off and not a few of her buildings destroyed by storms and inundations, they imagined that the world also had run its course, and that the last dread judgment was near at hand.

Gregory the Great was strongly imbued with this idea, and, in a letter to King Ethelbert, he thus expresses it: "We know from the Word of Almighty God that the end of the present world is now at hand, and that the reign of the saints, which can never be terminated, is about to commence. And now that the end of the world is approaching, many things will take place which have not happened before. For there will be atmospheric changes, terrors from heaven, deranged seasons, wars, famines, pestilences, and earthquakes in divers places."*

And since there was an Antichrist required for the last days, Gregory was sure he had detected him in the Patriarch of Constantinople, John the Faster, who had just irritated the See of Rome by proclaiming himself Universal Bishop.

GROUNDLESS PANIC IN THE TENTH CENTURY.

Again, in the tenth century, there was a still more general panic. It was imagined that Satan had been bound from the time of our Lord's first appearing, and that, since the thousand years were almost accomplished, he was about to be loosed as a preparation for the last judgment. As the supposed time of this event drew nearer the terror of men became piteous. Some handed over their property to the monkish foundations, and set out on a pilgrimage to Palestine, whither they expected Christ to descend. Many actually bound themselves by solemn oaths to be serfs to churches or monasteries, in the hope that, if they were found acting as servants to the servants of Christ, they would be more gently dealt with at the judgment. Buildings were allowed to fall into decay, since it was supposed that there would be but little further use for them. And if there happened to be an eclipse of the sun or moon, affrighted crowds would fly to the caverns of the rocks, or to any other places which they thought might shelter them from the glory of the dreaded appearing.† But the year one thousand passed by; nothing happened, and the excitement subsided.

Now these alarms, and many others, sprang from crude and baseless arguments which do not for a moment endure the test of intelligent investigation. And their result was something worse than the mere delusion of those who were affected by them, for they caused a general discredit of, and distaste for, the Prophetic Scriptures; since men are ever ready to cast upon the Word of God the blame of that failure which is due to shortsighted interpretation.

NEED FOR UNDERSTANDING PROPHECY.

Our duty, then, is to take heed that we be not carried away by vain excitements, of which there are too many in our day; but we must be still more careful to avoid the opposite extreme. It is better to be troubled by many false alarms than to be once taken by surprise. The inhabitants of earth must awake some morning to find that the day of the Lord is present; and as a snare will it come upon all those who have not understood the warnings of revelation. It is, then, our duty to pray for wisdom that we may understand, and for the power of the Holy Spirit that we may watch. Nor could words be stronger than our Lord's injunction upon this point: "Take ye heed," He said, "watch and pray; for ye know not when the time is. For the Son of Man is as a man taking a far journey, who left his house, and gave authority to his servants, and to every man his work, and commanded the porter to watch. Watch ye, therefore, for ye know not when the Master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock crowing, or in the morning; lest, coming suddenly, He find you sleeping. And what I say unto you I say unto all, Watch!"

THE NEXT EVENT TO BE EXPECTED.

If we discover that the revealed counsels of God place before us the translation of the Church as the next event to be expected; and, still further, that the present bent of human opinion, and the general condition and tendency of the world, are already in the direction of those apostasies, convulsions, revolutions, and judgments, which will affect men after the withdrawal of the Church; then we shall indeed have reason to believe that our age has entered upon its last days, and that those who would be Christ's at His coming have urgent need to keep their garments, lest He be suddenly revealed, and they be found naked, so that all men see their shame.

* In a speech delivered at Aylesbury, Sept. 20th, 1876, the late Lord Beaconsfield thus alluded to another formidable element of distraction: "In the attempt to conduct the government of this world, there are new elements to be considered with which our predecessors had not to deal. We have not to deal only with emperors, princes and ministers, but there are the secret societies—an element which we must take into consideration—which at the last moment may baffle all our arrangements, which have their agents everywhere, which have reckless agents, which countenance assassination, and which, if necessary, could produce a massacre."

* See Gregory's sermon on The Plague, and Gibbon, chaps. xliii. and xlv. From a passage of Procopius (Anecdote cap. xviii.), quoted by the latter, it appears to have been calculated, in regard to the times of Justinian, that no fewer than 100,000,000 of human beings "had been exterminated under the reign of the imperial demon."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Results of the Labors of the Forty-Seventh Congress have been elaborately summarized by a writer in the New York Times. It appears from his statement that during its existence 10,670 bills and joint resolutions have been introduced, of which 8018 originated in the House and 2652 in the Senate. A large majority of these measures fell still-born. The greater proportion of them remain with the committees to which they were respectively referred. Of the bills reported to the two houses of Congress, the larger part remained on the calendars when the session ended. These are dead. During the session just now concluded 1189 bills and joint resolutions were introduced; and it may give the casual observer some notion of the proportion which schemes of law bear to accomplished legislation to learn that only 163 of this number passed both houses and received the signature of the President. A great many bills of various degrees of importance failed before attaining completion. Among these are the French spoliation claims bill; the bill to limit the coinage of the silver dollar; the bankruptcy bill; the Nicaragua Canal bill; the Whiskey bonded warehouse bill; the "Dingley" shipping bill; the river and harbor appropriation; the bill to place General Grant on the retired list, and the bill providing for the performance of the Presidential duties in case of the vacancy of the offices of President and Vice-President of the United States. These are but a few of the measures commenced but left incomplete by the 47th Congress.

The Developments of the Star Route Trial last week were humiliating, even in comparison with former disclosures. The prosecution rested on March 6th. It is now asserted by the witness Rerdell that the $2000 cheque to Belford, the existence of which was denied both by Dorsey and Belford, was really paid by Dorsey to cover his losses at cards. If this is true it would appear that Dorsey was not straight, even in his dealings with his friends. If he had been, the $2000 would have been paid from his private account, and not from the joint account. The new version of the story is also denied by Dorsey. A peculiarly disgraceful circumstance in connection with the case was Dorsey's brutal assault last week on ex-Judge Lilley, a gentleman seventy years of age, who, while discussing the case with Dorsey, was set upon by him and struck and kicked, and so severely injured that he is confined to his bed. The Star Route defendant seems bent on increasing the unpopularity he now labors under throughout the country.

The New Postal Notes Are Expected to be ready for issue on July 1st. They are intended to take the place of the fractional currency for the transmission of small sums through the mails. They will be scarcely so secure as post-office orders, but it will be less difficult to obtain them as they may be bought in the same way as postage stamps, and will be payable to the bearer at any time within three months from the last day of the month of issue. The body of the note is a form stating the office at which it is issued and the office to which it is sent. When paid the person obtaining payment puts his signature upon the note. The cost of each note will be three cents, and they may be issued of any value from one cent to five dollars.

The Report of the Court of Inquiry on the circumstances under which the Arctic Exploring Steamer, the Jeannette, was lost, is published. The weight of evidence, it says, shows that the vessel was seaworthy when she started. As to her management up to the time of her loss, the Court speaks in warm terms of the foresight and prudence displayed by Captain De Long, and the discipline maintained by him. As to the loss itself, the Court finds that she was crushed by the ice, in a position which would have caused the loss of any vessel, no matter what her model or strength. It also finds that every provision was made for the safety of the men on their leaving the wreck, and warmly praises De Long and Melville for their behavior throughout the voyage and retreat.

At an Inspection of the Indian School at Carlisle, Penn., on March 6th, by the Secretary of the Interior, very satisfactory results were shown in all departments. The greatest progress, however, was displayed in the workshops. Boots and shoes, clothing, tinware, wood work, bedding and harness of the coarser qualities were all in process of manufacture. The young artisans went about their work with the ease of accomplished workmen, and the results were substantial and neat. In one department, where wagon-making was carried on, several finished ambulances painted and varnished, not distinguishable to the untrained eye from the products of the best workshops, and others in process of manufacture, were exhibited, the entire work, excepting the springs and portions of the wheels being the production of the Indian youths.

Money is Still Sorely Needed by the Sufferers from the western floods. The fund started by the New York Herald amounted at the close of last week to forty-one thousand dollars, but in the face of widespread suffering there should be no diminution in the contributions. A physician who has journeyed through the afflicted districts reports the discovery of frequent cases of pneumonia, bronchitis and catarrhal fevers, caused by exposure and wettings, while hundreds of people were found huddled together in warehouses and public buildings under the most unfavorable sanitary conditions. The slime and débris left by the floods, together with the fact that the water has covered, and in many places still covers, wells, cisterns, cellars and cesspools, induce grave apprehensions of a pestilence. The force of the floods themselves was expended chiefly upon property. Their after effects bear directly upon human life.

The Funeral of Gov. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, on March 8th, was an event, the like of which has never been witnessed in the State. Fully 50,000 visitors were in Atlanta, and every one by gravity of demeanor evinced the high respect in which the great Commoner was held. The funeral procession was a mile and a half long. Rev. William Adams, assisted by Dr. Talmage, conducted the proceedings. Senator Colquitt introduced the speakers. General Toombs delivered a eulogy on his friend, the eloquence and pathos of which were not diminished by the emotion of the speaker. When he arose to speak he was completely overcome. He bowed his head on his hand and the tears trickled through his fingers. For fully two minutes he could not say a word. The silence was oppressive, and men and women in the audience all through wept as they saw this knightly old man so overcome. In the course of an interesting address, full of personal reminiscences of Governor Stephens, Justice Crawford said that Mr. Stephens had out of his limited means educated 122 poor young men, and that a green country boy sent to Crawfordsville to solicit aid from Mr. Stephens, and forgetting his name, asked, "Whar does the man live that eddicates poor boys?" Every hand in the crowd addressed pointed the boy to Liberty Hall.

The Effort to Check the Evils of Intemperance in New York City, now being made by Mr. Robert Graham and the Committee of Temperance Reformers, meets with but little encouragement from the authorities. At an interview with Mayor Edson and the Excise Commissioners, held last week, the committee called their attention to three glaring evils in the present licensing system: The number of boarding-houses and third class hotels licensed to sell spirits which is far too large for the wants of the travelling public; the 3336 places licensed to sell malt liquors, of which a large proportion sell spirits without a license; and the large number of places where liquor is sold after a license has been refused, and no steps are taken to bring the proprietors to punishment. It is admitted that in more than 1000 places liquor is sold without a license, and of these drinking-places a large proportion are notorious as dens of vice and disorder. Yet they are not closed. The Excise Commissioners disclaimed responsibility for these evils, and practically referred the committee for redress to the Legislature and the police.

Distressing News from the Banks of the Mississippi arrived every day last week. From Vicksburg it was reported that the Delta Levee was almost surrounded by back water, and was undergoing a fearful strain. The Ellislee Miss. Levee broke in three places on March 7th, one of the gaps being seventy feet wide. A Globe-Democrat correspondent, who reached Helena the following day from Memphis, gives the following view of the situation along the river bank: "There are not more than two or three spots of ground between Memphis and this point. Scores of the best farms in Arkansas and Mississippi are completely ruined, and most of them are abandoned, the owners and laborers having fled to higher ground. In many places the cattle are standing in water, which overflows the platforms, and almost every gin house is filled with colored people. There is not a foot of dry land in forty miles. Skiff-loads of colored people with their household goods are to be seen at various points seeking ground to rest on. At Sterling, colored people, houses, and cattle are indiscriminately huddled in the upper story of the only store there."

The Annual Reception of the Young Women's Christian Association was held at No. 7 East Fifteenth Street, New York, on March 6th. The association, it was stated, has been in existence twelve years, and during that period has accomplished much good in various departments for the class whose benefit it seeks. The treasury is entirely dependent upon the voluntary contributions of those interested in the work, no fees being charged in any of the departments. The receipts for 1882 were $7542.76, and the expenses $7265.90. Great interest has been manifested in the free educational classes, of which there are a large number, under the charge of competent teachers. The association had succeeded in finding situations for 1231 girls during the past year. It was stated that the great want now felt is of a large boarding house specially established as a home for girls who are earning their livelihood as clerks.

An Ark Large Enough to Carry Himself and family was built by a Californian citizen who was alarmed by the prediction of a violent storm, made by Professor Wiggins, of Canada. It will be remembered that Mr. Wiggins advised President Arthur and the owners of shipping to keep all vessels in safe quarters from March 9th to 11th, as a storm of unusal violence accompanied by huge tidal waves might be expected. The Californian citizen paid attention to the warning, and in order to secure his own safety and that of his family built an ark in which they might escape, in the event of the flood inundating the neighborhood. The event proves that the labor was unnecessary, but he and others will do well to remember that a warning of coming trouble has been given by infallible authority when an ark will be needed and has been provided (1 Pet. 3 : 20, 21).

Three Notable Pearls Have Recently Been found by the fishers near La Paz, Lower California. One of these, a gem weighing seventy-five carats, was sold by the fisherman on the spot for $14,000, which, however, was an insignificant sum compared with its real value. It is now announced that one of the fishermen has discovered a finely tinted and perfectly formed pearl weighing forty-seven carats, and valued at $5000; while yet another pearl was found about the same time, smaller than the former, but of perfect shape, weighing forty carats and valued at $3000. The fortunate fishermen are envied by all the people around the coast, and there are many fashionable ladies in higher station who share the feeling. Yet of these admirers of the gem how comparatively few seek to secure an entrance into that twelve-gated city of which we are told each gate is one pearl, or learn the lesson our Saviour taught concerning the pearl-seeker (Matt. 13 : 45).

A Noble Act of Filial Devotion was Witnessed at a fire in an apartment house in New York on March 7th. The fire broke out in the night, and a young lady sleeping on the third floor was aroused by the noise, and on opening her chamber door, at once realized her peril. There was plenty of time, however, for her to secure her retreat by the fire escape. But on the same floor her mother, who was paralyzed, and an old nurse lay asleep. She could not leave them to perish. She aroused them with great difficulty, and assisted them to descend the stairs. Eventually the nurse succeeded in reaching the street in safety and entreated the firemen to go to the assistance of the aged lady and her brave daughter. But it was too late; the firemen found the bodies of the two ladies close together. They had both beeen asphyxiated by the smoke. It is by reflecting on such an instance of self-sacrifice for others as this that we are able to approach a conception of the vicarious sacrifice of the Redeemer of the world (Rom. 5 : 7, 8).

A United States Consul Who Held Office for only forty-eight hours died recently in Western New York where he edited a daily journal. Not long ago he obtained through the influence of the Representative of his district in Congress the appointment of Consul in the Phillipine Islands. The journalist had sought this appointment for some reason not known, and after it was made it was suggested to him that another and better office might be obtained for him, but he expressed his preference for the Phillipine Islands. His friend in Congress wrote him urging him to change his views, and warned him that the Phillipine Islands were subject to frequent earthquakes. He telegraphed to Washington in reply a profane message expressing his contempt for earthquakes, and the commission was accordingly issued. He proceeded on his official mission, and duly arrived at his destination; but he had hardly touched his foot upon the shores of the far Pacific island before it was visited by a peculiarly violent earthquake shock, and the consul, having had practical experience of his serene philosophy, packed bag and baggage immediately and fled westward—his entire residence in his official capacity being less than forty-eight hours. Unhappily the same man expressed a similar disregard of the miseries of the impenitent after death, and left explicit instructions as to the services at his funeral, the observance of which, a few days ago, shocked the community. It is melancholy to reflect that the result of his temerity in the one case did not operate as a warning to him in the other and more serious one. But in spiritual matters such men are generally slow to learn (Jer. 12 : 5).

An Interesting Express Package was Brought from Dalton, Ga., to New York last week. The Adams Express messenger, travelling between this city and Washington, was puzzled how to act in the case of one of his consignments. It was entered as a young lady, and the terms were cash on delivery $35. There appeared to be some mistake in the entry, but to the messenger's surprise the young lady appeared, wearing the company's tag duly marked C. O. D. $35. The messenger was stupefied, but signed the receipt for the young lady, and finally delivered her duly at her destination in New York. It appeared that having to travel to this city, and being terrified lest in her inexperience of railroad travelling she should go astray, she chose to make the journey under the care of the Adams Express Co. Some little amusement was caused on board the train by the singular consignment, but the young lady arrived safely, which after all was the object of the arrangement. Happy are they who, in the journey of life, rely not on their own understanding, but commit all their ways to Him who will direct their steps (Prov. 3 : 5-7).

A Maniac Obtained Control of a New York ferry boat on Sunday, March 4th. The boat was secured in its Jersey City slip on the night before, and the crew went to sleep in their bunks. Before daybreak on Sunday morning they were startled by finding the boat in motion, and the engineer, pilot, and two deck hands were quickly in the engine-room. There they found a young man with his hand on the lever. He had unfastened the chains, removed the hawser, and had started the engine as well as an experienced man could have done it. It was only after a desperate struggle that he was dragged out of the engine-room, and then he broke from his assailants and jumped into the river; a boat was obtained and he was rescued, but his clothes were frozen solid to his body when he was taken ashore and sent to the hospital. He seemed sane, but said he was prompted by the devil to run the boat. It is remarkable that so many demented people ascribe their actions to Satanic influence. There may be more truth in their statements than is generally supposed. In this case the madman whether moved by the devil or not was doing with the boat as many people are with their lives. He was running it recklessly and without a pilot (Eph. 2 : 12).

The Presence of Mind and Promptitude of action of an employé in some works at South Bend, Ind., saved a fellow-workman from a horrible death a few days ago. He is a Polander and a very intelligent workman. As he was passing through the rooms of the Oliver Chilled Ploughworks, where he is employed, he saw a man who was working near the huge belt of the polishing-room caught up by it by his clothes and dragged toward the ceiling with frightful velocity. The Polander realized the peril of the struggling man, and whipping a large jack-knife out of his hip pocket, opened it and severed the belt, which is about a quarter of an inch thick, at one draw of the knife, and the man dropped to the floor. Had the Polander carried the knife in any other pocket where it would have taken an instant longer to get it, or had he made the least false motion, the man would have been pounded to a jelly over the shaft. Under other circumstances the severing of the belt would have been a serious offence, but a life in peril was ample justification for the act. It would be well if parents and others realized that when the eternal safety of children is in jeopardy the sacrifice of worldly position or worldly gain is often a duty which cannot be too quickly performed (Mark, 8 : 36).

"HEREIN IS LOVE."

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins. Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another."—1 John 4 : 10, 11.

Love Enjoined in the Law—The Distinguishing Mark of Christians—I. The Infinite Spring—Two Emphatic Words—II. The Marvellous Outflow—In Sending an Ambassador—His Own Son—As a Propitiation—III. The Consequent Outflow of Love from Us—The Water in the Fountain—Love to All Sorts of Men—Like God's Love—For the Same Reasons—An Abominable Spirit—Love Must be Practical—In Promoting Reconciliation—No Room for Boasting—The Useless Pipe of a Waterworks.

THE law commands love; indeed, all its precepts are summed up in that one word "love." More widely read it runs thus: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself;" yet all this amounts only to "Thou shalt love."

But the law by reason of our depravity never produced love. We were commanded to love, but we did no such thing. The spirit that is in us is selfish, and it lusteth to envy and to enmity. Whence come wars and fightings among us? Come they not from our lusts? Since the Fall man has become man's bitterest foe upon the earth, and the world is full of hating, slandering, struggling, fighting, wounding, and slaying; all that law can do is to show the wrong of enmity, and threaten punishment; but it cannot supply an unregenerate heart with a fountain of love. Man remains unloving and unlovable till the Gospel takes him in hand, and by grace accomplishes that which the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh.

Love is winning many hearts to the kingdom of God, and its reign shall extend till love shall rule over the whole earth, and so the kingdom of God shall be set up among men, and God shall dwell among them. At the present moment love is of the people of God. Jesus said, "By this shall all men know that ye are My disciples, if ye have love one to another;" and John said, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." The man whose spirit is selfish has not the spirit of Christ, and "if any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of His."

The saints begin with love to God. That must ever hold the highest place; for God is the best and noblest being, and we owe Him all our hearts. Then comes, for Jesus' sake, love to all who are in Christ. There is a peculiarly near and dear relationship existing between one child of God and all the rest. Loving Him that begat, we love all them that are begotten of Him. Should not a child love his brothers with a tender, peculiar affection? This principle of love, once implanted, induces in the heart of the converted man a love toward all mankind. Not that he can take any complacency in the wicked; God Himself cannot do that; His holiness abhors all iniquity.

The love desired is not the love of complacency, but the love of benevolence; so that we wish well, and to the utmost of our power would do well, unto all those that dwell upon the face of the earth. In this holy charity, this unselfish love, be ye imitators of God as dear children. Our heavenly Father is kind to the unthankful and to the evil, and so must we be; desiring that even the most abandoned may yet be rescued and made right and good. Love desires to create that which is lovable even in the most unlovable of mankind, and God helping the effort, she succeeds.

I hear one say, "This is a vast idea. Are we to love at this rate? Where is the love to come from? Our hearts are narrow, men are unworthy, provocations are numerous, another spirit is abroad in the world: where is this love to come from? Where is the unfailing motive of love? For love is tried, and hardly put to it to hold her own. Can we find a motive that will never fail even toward the most provoking of mankind? Can we find an argument for affection which shall help us in times of ingratitude, when base returns threaten to freeze the very heart of charity? Yes, there is such a motive; there is a force by which even impossibilities of love can be accomplished, and we shall be supplied with a perpetual constraint moving the heart to ceaseless charity.

Come with me, then, in the first place, to notice the infinite spring of love—"Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that God loved us;" secondly, let us observe the marvellous outflow of that love—"God sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins;" and then, thirdly, let us notice the overflow of that love in us, when it fills our hearts and runs over to others—"Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another."

I. First,

of love. Our text has two words upon which I would place an emphasis—"not" and "but."

The first is "not." "Herein is love, not"—"not that we loved God." Very naturally many conclude that this means "not that we loved God first." That is not exactly the truth taught here, but still it is a weighty truth, and is mentioned in this same chapter in express words—"We love Him because He first loved us." Take a second sense—that is, not that any man did love God at all by nature, whether first or second; not that we, any one of us, ever did or ever could have an affection toward God while we remained in our state by nature. Instead of loving God, man is indifferent to God. "No God," saith the fool in his heart, and by nature we are all such fools. It is the sinner's wish that there were no God. We are atheistical by nature, and if our brain does not yield to atheism, yet our heart does. We wish that we could sin according to our own will, and that we were in no danger of being called to account for it. The unregenerate heart is, as to love, a broken cistern which can hold no water. In our natural state, there is none that doeth good, no, not one; so is there also none that loveth God, no, not one.

We come nearer to John's meaning when we look at this negative as applying to those who do love God. "Not that we loved God," that is, that our love to God, even when it does exist, and even when it influences our lives, is not worthy to be mentioned as a fountain of supply for love. The apostle points us away from it to something far more vast, and then he cries, "Herein is love." I am looking for "the springs of the sea," and you point me to a little pool amid the rocks which has been filled by the flowing tide. I am glad to see that pool: how bright! how blue! how like the sea from whence it came! But do not point to this as the source of the great waterfloods; for if you do I shall smile at your childish ignorance, and point you to yon great rolling main which tosses its waves on high. What is your little pool to the vast Atlantic? Do you point me to the love in the believer's heart, and say, "Herein is love!" You make me smile. I know that there is love in that true heart; but who can mention it in the presence of the great rolling ocean of the love of God, without bottom and without shore?

Let me use another figure. If we had to enlighten the world, a child might point us to a bright mirror reflecting the sun, and he might cry, "Herein is light!" You and I would say, "Poor child, that is but the light is not there, but yonder, in the sun; the love of saints is nothing more than the reflection of the love of God. We have love, but God is love. When I think of the love of certain saints to Christ, I am charmed with it; for it is a fruit of the Spirit not to be despised. When I think of Paul the Apostle counting all things but loss for Christ; when I think of our missionaries going one after another into malarious parts of the African coast, and dying for Christ; and when I read the Book of Martyrs, and see confessors standing on the faggots, burning quick to the death, still bearing witness to their Lord and Master, I do rejoice in the love of saints to their Lord. Yet this is but a streamlet; the unfathomable deep, the eternal source from which all love proceeds, infinitely exceeds all human affection, and it is found in God, and in God alone. "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that God loved us."

When we love God it is an honor to us; it exalts a man to be allowed to love a Being so glorious. A philosopher once wrote that for a man to speak of being the friend of God was too daring, and in the reverence of this thoughtful heathen there was much to admire; for indeed there is an infinite difference between the glorious God and the sinful creature man. Though God in condescension allows us to call Him friend, and Jesus says, "Ye are My friends!" yet this is beyond reason, and is a sweet revelation of the Holy Spirit. What an uplifting there is in it for us! On the other hand, God's love to us can add nothing to Him; it gives, but receives not. Divine love can have no recompense. That he, the Infinite should stoop to love the finite; that He, the infinitely pure should love the guilty, this is a vast condescension. See, moreover, what it involved; for this love rendered it necessary that in the person of His dear Son God should be "despised and rejected of men," should make Himself of no reputation, and should even be numbered with the transgressors. "Herein is love!"

I have thus pointed out

THE WELL-HEAD

of love; let us draw from it, and from none other. If you go into the world and say, "I am to love my fellow-men because I love God," the motive is good, but it is questionable, limited, and variable. How much better to argue—I am to love my fellow-men because God loves me. When my love grows cold toward God, and when by reason of my infirmity and imperfection I am led even to question whether I do love God at all, then my argument and my impulse would fail me if it came from my own love to God; but if I love the fallen because God loved me, then I have an unchanging motive, an unquestionable argument, and a forcible impulse not to be resisted; hence the apostle cried, "The love of Christ constraineth us." It is always well for a Christian to have the strongest motive, and to rely upon the most potent and perpetual force, and hence the apostle bids us look to divine love, and not to our own. "Herein is love," saith he, "not that we loved God, but that God loved us." So far the "not."

WHO LOVES US.

Let us turn to the "but." "But that He loved us." I have nothing new to say, nor do I wish to say anything new; but I should like you to meditate on each one of these words: "He loved us." Three words, but what weight of meaning! "He," who is infinitely holy and cannot endure iniquity, "He loved us;" "He," whose glory is the astonishment of the greatest of intelligent beings, "He loved us." "He," whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain, "loved us." "He" who is God all-sufficient, and needs nothing of us, neither can indeed receive anything at our hands—"He loved us." What joy lies sleeping here! Oh, that we could wake it up! What hope, too, for hopeless sinners, because "God loved us." If a man could know that he was loved of all his fellow-men, if he could have it for certain that he was loved by all the angels, doted on by cherubim and seraphim, yet these were but so many drops, and all put together could not compare with the main ocean contained in the fact that "God loved us."

Now ring that second silver bell: "He loved us." It has often made me rise from my seat to think that God loves me! I could not sit still and hear the thrilling truth. Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high, I cannot attain unto it. It is sweet to be loved even by a dog; it is sweet to be loved by a babe; it is sweet to be loved by a friend; it is sweet to be loved by God's people; but, oh, to be loved of God, and to know it! this is paradise. Would a man want any other heaven than to know for certain that he enjoyed the love of God?

Note the third word. "He loved us,"—"us"—the most insignificant of beings. There is an ant-hill somewhere; it is no matter to you where it is. It teems with ants. Stir the nest, and they swarm in armies. Think of one of them. No; you do not need to know anything about Him! His business is no concern of yours; so let him go. But that ant, after all, is more considerable to you than you are to God. "All the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing." What are you even in this great city! one man, one woman in London, in England, in the population of the world,

WHAT A CIPHER YOU ARE!

Yet what is the population of this world compared with the universe? I suppose that all these stars which we see at night, all the countless worlds within our range of vision, are but as a little dust in a lone corner of God's great house. The whole solar system, and all the systems of worlds we have ever thought of, are but as a drop of a bucket compared with the boundless sea of creation; and even that is as nothing compared to the infinite God: and yet, "He loved us"—the insignificant creatures of an hour. This is marvellous.

Observe that the previous verse speaks of us as being dead in sin. "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent His only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through Him." Then we were dead, dead to all goodness, or thought or power, of goodness, criminals shut up in the condemned cell; and yet God loved us with a great love even when we were dead in trespasses and sins. He was wroth with us as a Judge, but yet He loved us: He was determined to punish, and yet resolved to save.

This is a world of wonders! I am utterly beaten by my text. I confess myself mastered by my theme. But who among us can measure the unfathomable? "Herein is love," that God freely, out of the spontaneous motion of His own heart, should love us. This is the argument for love; this is the inexhaustible fountain out of which all love must come. If we desire love, may we come and fill our vessels here and bear it out to others. Love springing from our own bosoms is flat, feeble, and scant; but the love of God is a great deep, forever fresh, and full and flowing. Here are those springs of the sea of which we spake; "Herein is love!"

II. I want your attention a little longer while I speak as best I can upon of that love. "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins." Beloved, the love of God is seen in creation; he that studies the mechanism of the human frame and of its surroundings will see much of divine kindness therein. The love of God is to be seen in providence; he that watches the loving hand of God in daily life will not need to look far before he sees tokens of a Father's care. But if you want to know when the great deep of God's love was broken up, and arose in the fulness of its strength to prevail over all; if you would see it revealed in a deluge, like Noah's flood, you must wait till you see Jesus born at Bethlehem and crucified on Calvary; for His mission to men is the divinest manifestation of love.

Consider every word: "He sent His Son." God "sent." Love caused that mission. If there was to be reconciliation between God and man, man ought to have sent to God; the offender ought to be the first to apply for forgiveness; the weaker should apply to the greater for help; the poor man should ask of him who distributes alms; but "Herein is love" that God "sent." He was of peace. To-day "we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God." Oh, the wonder of this, that God should not wait till rebellious men had sent to His throne for terms of reconciliation, but should commence negotiations Himself!

Moreover, God sent such a One: He "sent His Son." If men send an embassy to a great power they select some great one of their nation to wait upon the potent prince; but if they are dealing with a petty principality they think a subordinate person quite sufficient for such a business. Admire, then, the true love of the infinitely gracious God, that when He sent an embassy to men He did not commission an angel nor even the brightest spirit before His throne; but He sent His Son—oh, the love of God to men! He sent His equal Son to rebels who would not receive Him, would not hear Him, but spat upon Him, scourged Him, stripped Him, slew Him! Yes, "He spared not His own Son, but freely delivered Him up for us all." He knew what would come of that sending of Him, and yet He sent Him.

"Jesus, commission'd from above,
Descends to men below,
And shows from whence the springs of love
In endless currents flow.

"He, whom the boundless heaven adores,
Whom angels long to see,
Quitted with joy those blissful shores,
Ambassador to me!

"To me, a worm, a sinful clod,
A rebel all forlorn:
A foe, a traitor, to my God,
And of a traitor born."

Go a step further. "God sent His Son to be a propitiation," that is, to be not only a reconciler, but the reconciliation. His sacrifice of Himself was the atonement through which mercy is rendered possible in consistency with justice. I have heard men say with scorn that God required a sacrifice before He would be reconciled, as if that were wrong on the part of the Judge of all. But let me whisper in their ears: God required it, it is true, for He is just and holy; but God found it Himself. Remember that—Jehovah found the ransom which He demanded. It was Himself, His own Son, one with Himself, that became the propitiation and the reconciliation.

There was no other way by which you could be reconciled to God, for had He reconciled you to a part of Himself and not to His justice, you had not been in very truth at all reconciled to God. It is now to God completely just, holy, whose anger burns against sin; it is to Him that you are reconciled by faith in Christ Jesus, through the laying down of His life for men. Oh, that God would bless this to all who hear the glad tidings!

III. We come at last to think of the consequent

OUTFLOW OF LOVE FROM US—

"Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another." Our love then to one another is simply God's love to us, flowing into us, and flowing out again. That is all it is. "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that God loved us," and then we love others. You have seen a noble fountain in a continental city adorning a public square. See how the water leaps into the air; and then it falls into a circular basin which fills and pours out its fulness into another lower down, and this again floods a third. Hear the merry plash as the waters fall in showers and cataracts from basin to basin! If you stand at the lower basin and look upon it and say, "Herein is water;" that is true, and will be true of the next higher one, and so forth; but if you would express the truth as to where the water really is, you may have to look far away, perhaps upon a mountain's side, for there is a vast reservoir from which pipes are laid to bring these waters and force them to their height that they may descend so beautifully.

Thus the love we have to our fellow-creatures drops from us like the descending silvery cataract from the full basin, but the first source of it is the immeasurable love of God which is hidden away in His very essence, which never changes, and never can be diminished. Herein is love? If you and I desire to love our fellow-Christians and to love the fallen race of man, we must be joined on to the aqueduct which conducts love from this eternal source, or else we shall soon fail in love.

Your love will respect the same persons as God's love does, and for the same reasons. God loves men; so will you; God loves them when there is no good in them, and you will love them in the same way. Sometimes the wickedness of men kindles in the heart of a true Christian a stronger affection for them. The deeper down they are the more they want a Saviour. Did not our Moravian brethren feel when they went out as missionaries that they would prefer to go first to the most barbarous tribes? for they said, "The more degraded they are the more they need a Saviour." And should not the missionary spirit make believers feel, if men are sunk until, they are as low as brutes, and as savage as devils, that this is the stronger reason for our being eager to bring them to Christ?

I hope

which used to come in among Christian people has been kicked away to its father the devil, where it ought to be: I mean the spirit which despises the poor and the fallen. When I have heard people say, "What is the good of looking after such riff-raff?" I have been saddened. The Church of God feels that the souls of the meanest are precious, that to save the most foul, the most ignorant, the most degraded, the most brutalized man or woman that ever lives is an object worthy of the effort of the whole church, since God thought it worthy of the death of Jesus Christ that He might bring sinners dead in sin to live unto Himself.

Brothers and sisters, we shall not have grasped the truth unless we feel that our love to men must be practical, because God's love to us was so. In the gift of the Lord Jesus we behold the reality of divine love. When we see the poor we must not say, "Be ye warmed; be ye filled; I am sorry for you;" but we must let our love relieve them from our stores. If we see the ignorant we must not say, "Dear me, the church is neglecting the masses; the church must wake up;" but we must bestir ourselves and struggle ourselves to win sinners. If there be any near you who are degraded, do not say, "I wish somebody would go after them." No; go after them yourself. We have each one a mission; let that mission be fulfilled.

Our love ought to follow the love of God in one point, namely, in always seeking to produce reconciliation. It was to this end that God sent His Son. Has anybody offended you? Seek reconciliation. "Oh, but I am the offended party." So was God, and He went straight away and sought reconciliation. Brother, do the same. "Oh, but I have been insulted." Just so; so was God; all the wrong was toward Him, yet He sent. "Oh, but the party is so unworthy." So are you; but "God loved you and sent His Son." Go you and write according to that copy.

I do not mean that this love is to come out of your own heart originally, but I do mean that it is to flow out of your heart because God has made it to flow into it. You are one of those basins of the fountain; love has poured into you from above, let it run over to those who are below. Go forth at once, and try and make reconciliation, not only between yourself and your friend, but between every man and God. We need never think that we shall meet with men to whom God will not consent to be reconciled. The propitiation is such that whosoever comes to God shall be received through it. God is always within to receive every soul that comes to Him by Jesus Christ.

When we have done all, what then? We shall have nothing whereof to glory. Suppose a man should become so loving that he gave himself wholly up for his fellow-creatures, and actually died for them, would he have anything to boast of? Read my text over again. "Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another;" so that if you get to the highest point of self-sacrifice you will never be able to boast, for you have only then done what it was your duty to have done. Thus you see excludes all idea of salvation by works, for when we come up to its utmost pitch, if we give our body to be burned for love, yet still we have done no more than it was our duty to have done, considering the tremendous obligations under which the love of God has laid us.

If you had to manage waterworks for the distribution of water all over this city, and there was a certain pipe into which you poured water, and none ever came out at the other end, do you know what you would do? You would take it out and say, "This does not suit my purpose; I want a pipe that will give out as well as receive." That is exactly what the Lord desires of us. Do not selfishly say, "I want to sit down and enjoy the love of God. I shall never say a word to anybody about Christ. I will never give a poor creature so much as a brass farthing; but I want to sit down and be solaced with the love of God." If you think thus, you are a pipe plugged up; you are of no use; you will have to be taken out of the system of the church; for the system of love-supply for the world requires open pipes, through which love divine may freely flow. May the Lord clear you, and fill you, so that out of you there may continually flow rivers of living water. Amen.

REV. HENRY AND MRS. CRAVEN.

Pioneer Missionaries on the Congo.

(See Portraits on page 172.)

THE Rev. Henry Craven who is now with his devoted wife laboring in the Dark Continent in the region opened up by Dr. Livingstone and the American explorer, Mr. H. M. Stanley, is an Englishman. He was born in the year 1855, near Birkenhead. His father died while Henry was a child, and for many years the boy, though very fond of his widowed motner, led a life of frivolity and sin.

He was residing in Liverpool in the year 1873, and there he was persuaded by an acquaintance to attend just for once a Baptist church, to witness the immersion of some young people he knew. He went and was deeply impressed. The Holy Spirit touched his heart, and he went again and again until finally he was led to give himself wholly to the Saviour and consecrate his life to His service.

He at once commenced to labor earnestly for the Lord, holding cottage meetings and special services. At this time he joined with several of his companions in renting a little chapel, in which to conduct evangelistic meetings, and assisted as well by teaching in the Sunday-school, and promoting the cause of temperance in connection with the Band of Hope.

ENTERS THE MISSIONARY INSTITUTE.

After laboring in this way for more than two years, he applied to Mr. H. Grattan Guinness for admission to his East London Institute for Foreign Missions, a picture of which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 19th, 1882, and was received as a student. Here he remained in training for two years and a half.

During this period his interest in the foreign mission field continued to increase, and on hearing of the proposed mission to the Congo, he was one of the first to volunteer for this important service. After due consideration of his case he was accepted to go forth as the pioneer missionary of the Livingstone Inland Mission, to tell of Jesus in a part where the Gospel had never been heard of, and where no white man had been before.

In January, 1878, he sailed for the Congo in company with one colleague. Little did he then think of the great door God was about to open up in that vast region, or that in less than five years more than thirty other missionaries would follow him up that great river, or that eight should be called upon to lay down their lives for Christ's sake.

The first object of the mission was to found a station at Wabuama, a distance of 500 miles up the Congo. In May, 1878, Mr. Craven and his companion left Masuka (which was then the highest point occupied by a white man) in a large canoe. After rowing a day and a half up river they were stopped by the Yalala cataracts, and were obliged to return a short distance and land on the south bank of the Congo at a place called Matadi. Here Mr. Craven was left with one black boy, while his companion went to seek carriers. For two days he lived on the beach without being visited by a single native.

ALONE AMONG NATIVES.

On the third day, at sundown, a deputation consisting of some fifty persons came from the king of the country, wishing to know who the strangers were and what they wanted. Mr. Craven briefly explained in Portuguese the object of their visit. After receiving a present for their king, the deputation withdrew, leaving three of their number to watch the movements of the missionary. The same night the canoe which had taken Mr. Craven's companion down river, returned without him, and as the men who had charge of the canoe were of the most reprobate and degraded character, Mr. Craven knew that neither life nor property was safe from their attacks.

After earnest prayer for guidance and protection, Mr. Craven retired for the night in his tent, first taking the precaution to fix a gun in such a position that on the door opening, it should go off. In the middle of the night an attempt was made to enter the tent, when the noise of the gun frightened away the thieves and aroused the inmates. But God mercifully preserved his life, and he was soon enabled to commence work.

HIS AUSPICIOUS MARRIAGE.

In February of 1879, Mr. Craven was married to Miss Bosson, of Willaston, who joined him at Banana, and became in every respect a most valuable helpmeet in his future labors. Miss Bosson had been missionary-spirited from her youth, and her union with Mr. Craven only brought about the accomplishment of long-cherished desires.

The trials and adventures of these pioneer missionaries on the Congo have been numerous and interesting. Several times they have been on the brink of the grave through the fevers which in the space of four years have carried off eight of their number, and compelled others to retire from the mission and return to England. Three times Mr. Craven

NARROWLY ESCAPED DROWNING.

On one of these occasions, while proceeding from Boma to Banana on board a steamer of the Dutch Trading Company, the vessel running upon a bank, was thrown by the current upon her beam-ends and filled with water. All on board rapidly undressed and were proceeding to launch a surf-boat as a last means of escape when the vessel herself suddenly righted and floated off the bank in safety.

Mrs. Craven, who is not physically strong, has bravely struggled with the difficulties of the climate, nursing the sick, teaching the native children, and managing the domestic arrangements of the station at Palaballa, although for weeks at a time she has been confined to her bed through fevers and sickness.

In August, 1881, Mr. and Mrs. Craven returned to England to recruit their health, which had become shattered, bringing with them three native children, two boys and a girl who were baptized on a profession of their faith in Christ. They are the

FIRST-FRUITS OF THE CONGO VALLEY.

In that valley containing millions of inhabitants, is now being preached the salvation of Jesus Christ. During their residence in England, these boys, by their blameless lives, won the affection of all with whom they came into contact, proving beyond doubt that they had been made new creatures in Christ; the change was remarkable, considering how short a time they had been under Christian influence.

They also rendered Mr. Guinness the most valuable aid in the preparation of a grammar and dictionary of the Congo language, which have recently been published, and are now in the hands of the missionaries on the Congo, as well as numerous portions of Scripture for use in the native schools. These native children have also been successful in arousing public interest in the people of the Congo, showing as they have done, that the race is capable of a high degree of mental and moral culture.

After spending more than a year in England, Mr. and Mrs. Craven recently sailed from Liverpool to resume their important work at Palaballa.

MISS LYDIA C. WILLIAMS.

Of the China Inland Mission.

THE young lady, whose portrait appears on this page, is one of the missionaries sent to China by the China Inland Mission, conducted by Rev. J. Hudson Taylor. She was born in August, 1854, and is therefore now in the twenty-ninth year of her age. The early part of her life was spent under the care of her Christian parents from whom she received a fair general education, and came under the saving influences of the Gospel of Christ.

When Miss Williams was seventeen years of age, she was brought to see her need of a Saviour, and the satisfaction and peace which are associated with His service. Yielding herself to Him without reserve, her loyal and ardent love for Him soon manifested itself in constant efforts for the advancement of His kingdom. As the child of a Christian household, it was her privilege to have opportunities of intercourse with many of the Christian workers of the locality, and these cordially and gratefully ACCEPTED HER CO-OPERATION.

Previous to her conversion to Christ, Miss Williams had shown a very high-spirited and lively temperament, and those who knew her best in her early girlhood days are most surprised at the choice of her future life-work as a missionary of the Cross among heathen peoples. But God who with unerring wisdom governs all the earthly affairs of His children, and holds in His own hand the helm of their destiny, has been pleased to endow His youthful messenger with a strong, bold spirit, which, changed in its aims and tendencies by the power and working of the Holy Spirit, will be of inestimable value to her in the distant field of arduous labor which has been assigned her.

Miss Williams had, from the very dawning of her spiritual life, been animated by a desire for foreign mission work, and her previous impressions were deepened and strengthened by her visit to the annual Mildmay Park Conference, in 1878, when at a prayer-meeting for China, at which the Rev. Mr. Stott, of the China Inland Mission, was present, she was led to say from the depths of a full heart, in response to the question—"Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?" "Lord, here am I, send me."

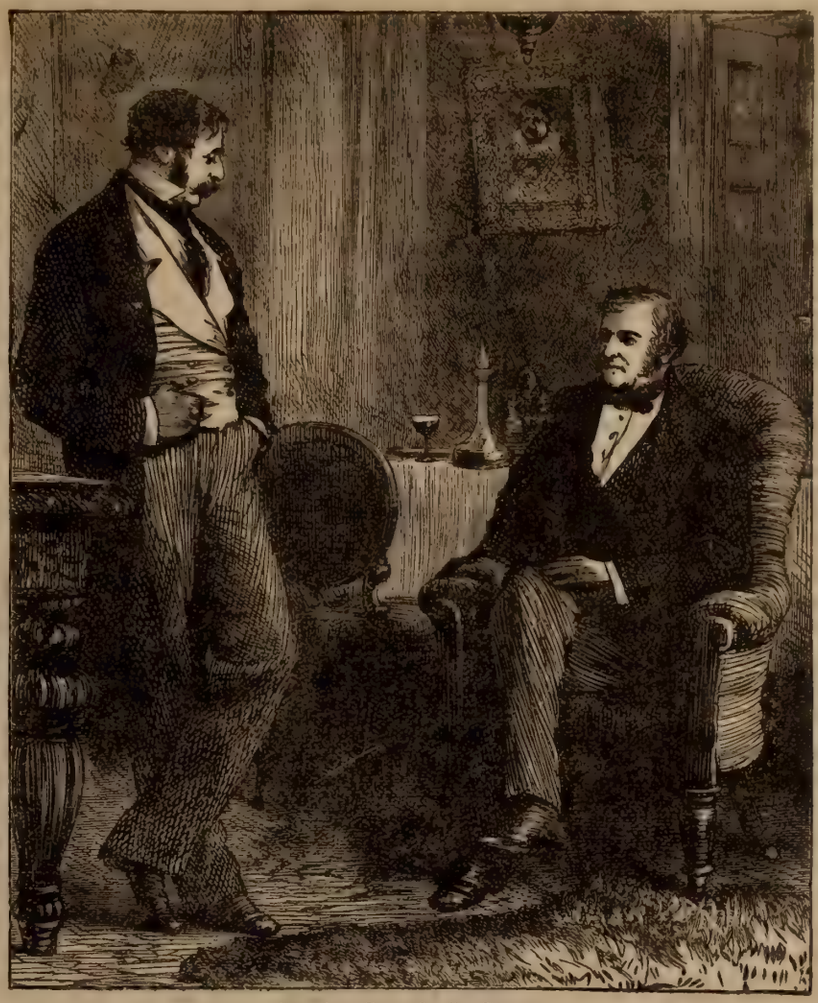
HOW SHE CAME TO THINK OF CHINA.

The special claims of China did not at that period present themselves to her mind, for she was willing to go anywhere, if God would only lead her. Some time afterward, in conversation with the Rev. M. Baxter, he spoke to her of the magnitude of China's needs, the comparative fewness of missionaries in that ample and deeply interesting field, and suggested that she should think of the Christless millions in that mighty empire, whose ears have never been charmed with the music of the Gospel, and upon whose countenances the benignant rays of divine mercy and love have never fallen. She accordingly did so, pondering and praying over the subject for months, and possessing herself of all the available information respecting it, with the result that two years later, i.e., in 1882, Miss Williams offered herself to the Council of the China Inland Mission, and was most cordially accepted.

She sailed for Shanghai on January 31st, by the P. and O. steamship "Peshawur," and is accompanied on her voyage by three other sisters in the Lord, the Misses Carpenter and Miss Kate Goodman, the latter of whom will be stationed, for a time at least, with Miss Williams at Nanking. In devoting themselves to the work of the Lord in this dark land where millions of people sit in darkness, these young ladies voluntarily leave their native land and subject themselves to dangers and hardships of a serious character. They are animated by love to their Saviour, and an earnest desire to serve Him. They establish by their effort a claim on the prayers of the Church in all lands; for in the kingdom of God there is no question of nationality, but all those who love and serve the Saviour are our brethren and sisters indeed.



Charles Crawford's Story.

CHARLES CRAWFORD'S TAINT.

"A GENTLEMAN wishes to speak to you, sir," said an office boy to a well-dressed man of some thirty years of age, who was walking with rapid, elastic step along Broadway, New York.

The man stopped, looked down at the bright face of the lad, and said, "Are you sure I am the person you want?"

"Yes, sir, he said he could not overtake you, but he knows you and would like to speak to you if you would come with me."

"Who can it be?" said Charles Crawford to himself, as he turned and accompanied his little guide. Immediately his hand was grasped and a cheery voice said, "Crawford, my boy, I knew it was you when you passed the window just now. I am very glad to see you. How have you been this long time? Where are you living? Are you prospering? Can you come and dine with me to-night?"

"I will say yes to your last question, Mr. Brown, and as to the others let me answer them then. I have an appointment now, and if you will excuse me I should like to hurry away. I meant to look you up after I had finished my business here. It is ten years since I was in New York, and I am staying but a short time now. But I should not have left the city without seeing you."

"I should think not, Crawford. I would not have forgiven you if you had. But business is business, and must be attended to; so I will not keep you now. Don't forget though; seven o'clock this evening, and there's the place," said Mr. Brown, handing him a card.

That evening Charles Crawford was ushered into a room handsomely furnished but evidently a bachelor's sanctum. A bearskin rug lay in front of an open fire grate, and the comfortable armchairs and every arrangement about the room betokened that its occupant understood and practised the art of making himself comfortable. The cloth was spread for dinner, and, as Crawford entered, his host came from an inner room, and extending both hands gave him a cordial welcome and then rang the bell for the meal to be served. During the dinner the conversation was on the topics of the day, but afterward when the wine was placed on the table and the two gentlemen were alone, Mr. Brown wheeled his chair around to the fire and said, "Now, Crawford, I want to hear your story. You are a puzzle to me. I have wondered about you ever since you left us, and have been worried many a time by thinking you had fallen into trouble. Now, fill your glass and tell me your story."

"I will tell you my story without filling my glass, Mr. Brown, and, in fact, the question of the glass is the point of my story. Ten years ago, as you know, I was in the employ of your firm, and I may say without vanity was one of the most promising young men in the place. I could see that I not only enjoyed your favor, but that of your partners, and that I might count on a very bright future. Then when you sent me to establish the branch house in the West I had a practical proof of your confidence, and I looked upon it as the stepping-stone to fortune."

"So it might have been, my boy," interjected Mr. Brown; "so it might have been, and I have never been able to understand why you did not put your foot upon it and mount. Why, you might have been a partner in the house, sir, before you were forty."

"I know, I know," continued Crawford, "but I will tell you how it slipped from my grasp. You remember that the night before I started for Chicago you invited me to dine with you, and I was proud to accept your invitation. I looked upon you as my best friend, as you had been ever since I entered the employ of the house, and I knew it was mainly owing to your influence that I was appointed. Well, sir, you gave me some very good advice that evening, and I meant to follow it. When I was leaving, something occurred which you have probably forgotten, but which had consequences that make it very memorable to me. You invited me to share a bottle of some wonderful champagne with you, and drink success to the new enterprise."

"Yes, I remember it very well," said Mr. Brown, "it was some I had kept for twenty years; I have some of it now."

"Well, sir, I was a different man after I had tasted that wine. My father, I have heard, died of delirium tremens when I was a boy, and I suppose my blood must have had a taint. It was like blood to a tiger. I was mad. I hurried from your place and the next day started for Chicago. For several days I tried to attend to business, but the craving for wine like that was intolerable. I could do nothing as I was used to do, and finally I telegraphed you resigning my position, and before night I was intoxicated for the first time in my life. After that my downward course was rapid. I had saved nearly a thousand dollars, and I spent it all. I was not riotous nor vicious when I was drunk; I was simply heavily, dreamily happy. The next morning after a debauch, I was intensely miserable, and then I rose and drank myself into insensibility again. This continued as long as my money lasted, and then I procured work enough to keep me from starvation and to pay for liquor. I sank into a position more degraded than a beast. I was following rapidly in the footsteps of my father, and should before this have come to the same end had not God in His mercy interposed. He sent one of His servants to me, and though I had no hope then of rescue, he never lost hope. One memorable day I put away the liquor from me, and from that day to this, more than eight years now, I have never tasted it. I soon began the ascent of worldly progress, and have succeeded well through God's help. This is my first visit to New York since I left it ten years ago, and I promised myself that I would come and tell you my story so that you might never again through motives of kindness and hospitality unintentionally kindle such a flame in another breast."

TRUE, THOUGH TRIED.

A Tale of the Seventeenth Century.

By Marie Hall

Release and Immigration.

WHEN Captain Butler spoke of selling Margaret's miniature, it was no idle threat, only he had not stated the truth when he insinuated that it was to be used in a manner objectionable to her feelings. It had come about in the following manner. The day after Margaret's arrest, Captain

Butler met a number of guests at the house of a friend living at some distance from Deerham. Among these guests was an Italian nobleman, who had long been an English resident, and secretly a convert to dissenting principles. He was far advanced in life, but still enthusiastically attached to everything connected with his youthful days. On the subject of music and painting he waxed quite eloquent, and spoke warmly in admiration of some sketches that his host produced, by Meyers, the artist.

"Have you not a finished painting by this genius?" he asked, at length.

It was then that Butler produced his case, with its exquisite enclosure. The Italian went into raptures; he had seen nothing so lovely since he left the land where Raphael wrought and dreamed.

"Would Captain Butler sell the picture?" he asked, hesitatingly; not knowing how it was regarded by the soldier, for he had exhibited it with a mixture of pride and indifference.

"No, he did not feel disposed to part with it then; but if ever he felt inclined, the seignor should have the opportunity of purchasing it."

So the matter rested, until after Margaret's trial; and then, meeting the nobleman one day in London, the captain gladly accepted a handsome sum for the thing he had once coveted so earnestly to possess. The Italian treasured it as a mere work of art; he knew nothing of the original; her strange history had never reached his ears, and his search after Meyers had been unsuccessful.

On learning the Puritan maiden's sentence, which had been brought about indirectly by his means, the artist had left that part of the country, full of remorse.

When formerly asked to paint a picture of the Virgin for Lyndhurst, he, thinking she would never see it, and at least have no serious objection in case she did, he made some additions to the copy he had preserved of her picture, and presented it to the chapel. Of such a result as followed he never dreamed; and ever afterward felt himself to blame for the evils that befel Margaret.

The nobleman admired his purchase, but did not worship it; and often he wondered what was the fate of the fair woman it represented, for the captain's mysterious manner had rather awakened his curiosity and interest.

At the end of April, in the spring we have alluded to, Butler and seignor chanced to visit again at the same house, and during the captain's stay he accepted a challenge to fight a duel with an individual of similar character to his own, to wipe off with his sword a tarnish on what he called his honor. In the duel, the captain was dangerously wounded. He was a miserable and pitiable object, unfit for death, his conscience laden with unpardoned sins. His life as a soldier had been such as he could not dare to think upon; but nothing lay so heavy on his heart as the remembrance of the blight he had cast on the "White Rose." She haunted him day and night, either as meekly standing before Jeffries, or dying a lonely and lingering death in that miserable cell.

So it ever is. The sins bad men commit with a light heart, the wrongs they do heedlessly or with a powerful vindictiveness may slumber for years and never trouble them by day or night, but when sickness comes, and they stand on the threshold of death, there often rises before them the image of their victim as if reproaching them with the evil done, and threatening retribution. The victim may have been, as in this case, gentle and forgiving, having neither desire nor disposition to avenge the wrong suffered, but the evil-doer imagines them malignant and revengeful. He judges them by his own heart and expects that when he meets them in the world to come he will suffer the penalty of his deeds. This was the condition of Captain Butler as he thought of Margaret and the foul wrong he had done her. Well was it for him that in the Italian nobleman he had a friend better instructed than himself.

The Italian, who was a kind-hearted Christian man, felt the greatest concern for the unhappy sufferer.

He seldom left his couch, and when the captain was sensible, tried to speak to him of the Saviour as a Mediator and Sacrifice for sin; but as soon as the patient's mind wandered again, he talked perpetually of Margaret, sometimes asking her to forgive him, sometimes railing at her, and threatening her with tortures. Once he spoke confusedly of a picture he had sold, and the Italian guessed that he must be referring to the original of the portrait he had purchased; and from further hints, he fancied she belonged to the same sect to which he was secretly attached himself. That the girl had been wronged he could not doubt—perhaps she was still suffering; and as the seignor thought of the sweet, fair face, he shuddered at the idea of her ever being at the mercy of such a profligate.

There was no hope of the captain's recovery; but a few days before his death he was quite sensible, and able to converse at intervals. After receiving a few last directions concerning his affairs, the Italian asked:

"Is there nothing else you wish to speak of?"

"Nothing," replied the sick man; adding, with a sigh, "it is too late now to alter things."

"Is there anything you would like to alter, if you had time?"

"Yes, man, a hundred things. I wish I could blot out more than half my life."

"It may not be too late to remedy some of the evil; even now perhaps justice might be done, and you would surely die happier."

"What do you mean? What do you know of my past life?" said the captain, looking surprised.

"You have spoken pretty freely while you have been lying here, and I could not help hearing."

"What have I said?" cried Butler, excitedly, half raising himself, and then sinking back, with the pallor of death on his face.

"Don't be afraid, my poor fellow," said the Italian, soothingly. "Whatever I have heard is sacred; only there is one thing I should like to ask, if you will pardon me."

"Say on," gasped the dying man, "and be quick, for my strength is going fast."

"Perhaps you may remember selling me a picture last year."

"Well!" said the captain, looking excited again.

"The original of that miniature—is she living?" asked the noble, cautiously; for he feared to agitate the dying man, and thus hasten his end.

"Why do you ask? What do you know of her?"

"Nothing but what you have let fall while you were delirious. I am interested in her fate, and fear that in some way you have injured her. This, I am sure, must be heavy on your conscience. Is she living, or is it indeed too late to undo the past?"

The captain would not reply to the question: he began to swear at the Italian for listening, and getting to know his private affairs in such a mean way. But the seignor stopped him, and threatened to leave him, if he persisted in injuring himself by giving way to passion, even on the very brink of the grave. Then the poor wretch wept, and clung feebly to his friend.

"Don't leave me: I shall not trouble you much longer; only why do you now rake up all these things to torment me?"

"I shall stay if you will compose yourself, and believe that I do not willingly pain you by awakening sad memories; but you must let me say that in the next world you cannot escape the stings of memory if you die impenitent, and with sins unconfessed. I do not ask you to confess them to me—I have no power to forgive; but is all the evil you have done past recall? Why should not your last act be one that will follow you with a blessing, and not with a curse?"

Too weak to resist, the soldier reluctantly told the story of his love, and hatred, and subsequent revenge.

"And is she still in Deerham Prison?" asked his listener, at length.

"Yes;" and real penitence softened the soldier's face for the first time; "yes, but she was ill when last I heard. I should not like to know that she died there. I never meant to be so bad. I thought, to be sure, she would yield in the end; and just before I got my death wound I meant to have done something to get her a release. But now what can I do?"

"Tell me how to act, and I promise never to rest until the lady is set free."

"But what will become of her then? She is ill, and an orphan. You will find plenty of money in my leathern bag for her present wants; but after that is gone she may want friends." The captain seemed bent now upon acting generously as well as justly.

"She shall not want a friend while I live," said the kind old man.

After this conversation the soldier sank rapidly, and died with a penitent prayer on his lips.

We leave him and his sins, as the Italian did, to the mercifulness of the Saviour. The nobleman did not lose an hour in setting about the fulfilment of his sacred trust; but it was not until the month of June, that, after immense trouble, and with the assistance of those high in office, success crowned his efforts, and Margaret was released from prison on condition she would leave England.

On the deck of a small Dutch vessel, a little group of passengers were watching the fast receding shores of England.

"Lift me up once more, Rebecca," said a low soft voice; and Rebecca, the ever-faithful attendant, tenderly lifted up an emaciated form, that acquaintances of former days would hardly have recognized as belonging to the fair and stately Margaret Desborough. Her languid eyes rested lovingly on the distant cliffs, until the blinding tears hid sea and land from view.

"Lay me down again, please. I shall never see the dear island again—never;" and the maiden turned her face away and closed her eyes, as if to sleep. But one stood near who was not to be deceived; he saw her bosom heave, and her hand clasp, as if in silent prayer. He bent down and whispered:

"'We seek a better country, even a heavenly.'"

The girl faintly smiled. "Yes, my journey will not be a long one. It seemed as if my spirit never could get free in that narrow cell; now I can die happily, with the glad breezes that fill our sails singing of liberty, and the wild waves dashing round our little bark. It makes me long for wings like yonder sea-birds, to 'fly away and be at rest.'"

"Hush, child!" said the old Italian nobleman (for it was he who had spoken), "hush! you must not talk of dying now; these breezes will soon bring strength to your limbs, and color to those white cheeks. You look better this moment than you did before we set sail; does she not, Master Pelham?"

The gentleman appealed to was resting his arms on the bulwarks, lost in thought. He keenly felt that it was a bitter necessity that drove him as an exile from his native land. Hearing his name, John Pelham turned round, and soon forgot his sad reflections in an earnest discussion with Margaret's guardian on the life that lay before them; and while Margaret listened to them, laid bright and hopeful plans for the future in the new world. A faint desire for life quickened the failing springs of existence. Almost reluctantly she admitted the hope of recovery; she had so long contemplated death as the only possible termination of her sufferings, that life was regarded as little else than a burden, to be borne patiently as a cross, and laid down cheerfully and thankfully.

By the time the vessel reached Holland, Margaret had perceptibly improved, and before they left that country, in company with many other emigrants for the new world, her kind guardian's heart was at ease concerning her. Her health was gradually restored, and among friends of the Puritan faith, and in married life with Pastor Pelham, she found a happy resting-place away from the uncongenial Roman Catholic atmosphere of Deerham Court, and in a land "far kinder than her own."

THE END.

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSON.

S. S. Lesson for March 25. Golden Text, Acts 4: 33. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Characteristics of the Primitive Church—Great Power and Great Grace—Present Low Standard of Christianity—The Perilous Times of the Last Days—The Apostles Sustained by Faith—Men Thoroughly Surrendered to God—Holiness and Healing Always Connected — The Church at Its Best—Noxious Weeds Rooted Out—First Indications of Declension—The Results of Dispersion.

"AND with great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus; and great grace was upon them all." This, our golden text, contains in a few words the most complete description of the primitive church. "Great power" and "great grace," these were their characteristics, and these might be ours, if we were as fully surrendered to the Holy Ghost. Little power and little grace mark the Christians of our day. Like Samson, shorn of his strength, we are become a mockery and a by-word to the world and to professed unbelievers. Worldliness and sin hide under the cloak not only of religion, but of conversion and sanctification, and the fearful anomaly of professed witnesses for Christ who possess the spirit of the world, has become not only a possibility, but a common thing among us.

The standard of Christianity has fallen so low that men who name the name of Christ without departing from iniquity (2 Tim. 2 : 19) are allowed to passed for saved men, and earnest honest seekers after truth are often driven into infidelity, for want of seeing something real, something genuine, among professors. The perilous times of the last days are upon us, and the prophecy of Paul to Timothy has become fact. "For men shall be

LOVERS OF THEIR OWN SELVES,"

(what a contrast to the early church when "neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own,") "covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, trucebreakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of Godliness, but denying the power thereof." Without grace and without power, yet having a form of godliness! O my God, how many thousands are self-deceived and are going forward blindfold to the judgment seat!

Our lessons for the past quarter have given the history of the early church in its first beginnings. We began with our Lord's ascension into heaven that He might from thence pour out the Holy Ghost, and baptize His people for the work which lay before them. And even before the descent of the Holy Ghost we find the disciples lifted by faith so entirely above the circumstances in which they were placed, alone, bereaved of their Lord, in the midst of an adverse world which had crucified Him, what had they beyond faith to sustain them? Commissioned to go into all that world which was in deadly enmity against God, and to preach the Gospel to every creature, having no conscious power, and nothing further than the promise of Jesus to sustain them, yet they found cause to rejoice and to be continually in the temple praising and blessing God.

"Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen" (Heb. 11 : 1). To them the power was as good as their's; the promissory note bore the signature of Jesus, Jesus the crucified, but also the risen Jesus, the ascended, the glorified, the all-powerful Jesus. And they were not disappointed, the Holy Spirit did descend upon them, the tongues of fire did come and sit upon them, and the mighty power took possession of them, so that, seeing from henceforth things and people in the light of God and of eternity, living nearer to heaven than to earth, they could speak with an irresistible power and authority, and men could not but feel it. But these men were no particle of self-interest was left within them, they had stood the test of their faith which came upon them through the death of Jesus, and they had not gone back into the world. Regarded as madmen or as impostors, they still held on until the power came.

Those who would be possessed by the Holy Ghost as these men were, must be similarly surrendered. No considerations must stand in the way. If a consecrated life demands the giving up of business let business go. When consecration necessitates the renunciation of the claims of position and society, let them go. A man of God is not saved and consecrated that he may be offered on the shrine of business, or society, or social position; but on the altar of the living God. Let the world count him dead and ignore him, let his friends cast him out, let him be given a position in society equal to the Carpenter of Nazareth, it is all glorious, for God can meet him there. He can dwell in the humble and contrite spirit (Isa. 57 : 17).

We considered in our course of lessons, the believing people and the healing power.

HOLINESS AND HEALING

from the earliest times have stood connected in the economy of God. In the Old Testament, healing was always promised to those who hearkened to and obeyed the voice of the Lord (Ex. 15 : 26 ; 23 : 20–25 ; Deut. 7 : 12–15) and sickness was among the judgments which were pronounced against disobedience (Lev. 26 : 14–16 ; Deut. 28 : 15, 21–61). In the New Testament, the healing of the sick is included as part of the preaching of the Gospel in the commands of Jesus to His twelve disciples and to the seventy, and yet again in His last directions before His ascension. No wonder then that as soon as the people began to believe in the risen Jesus, as soon as the gladness and singleness of heart which accompany the grace of God commenced to manifest themselves, the power of healing was also developed. And we have seen how God in His wise and loving providence made this an unanswerable argument to prove the truth of Christ's resurrection. How could the name of an evildoer have this marvellous power? It was "in the Name of Jesus" that the lame man had arisen and walked; the unbelieving Jews had to learn their guilt in having crucified the Prince of Life, whom death had no power to hold, and the authority of whose very name, when He Himself was absent could accomplish such marvels.

Three witnesses of His life-giving power were probably still living, the daughter of Jairus, the son of the widow of Nain, and Lazarus; surely the story of their resurrection had reached Jerusalem. But we find that those who were convinced against their will, when they "could say nothing against it" still determined to do all they could against Jesus of Nazareth. We have seen how personal interest inspired them, and how in their attempt to secure their own power and prestige, the priests and elders of Jerusalem were let into cowardly and unjust persecution of the apostles. We have seen how threatenings were powerless to hinder men who were sent of God to preach the Gospel; how these first disciples, regardless of life, comfort, or any other consideration, prayed for nothing but boldness to preach the Gospel, and for the healing power to attest that the work was of God; a prayer immediately answered by a renewed filling with the Holy Ghost.

The church was now at its best; from that day to this the tone and the power have never been so high. Things were then in their normal condition; the church was as it should be, every member presented then a Christian could not be mistaken; the things which most men lived for were disregarded, sold and given away by these early Christians; the reproach of men, which most men fear was loved by these single-hearted followers of Christ, who "rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for His name." There was nothing in them that worldlings could appeal to, neither fear, nor shame, nor loss could touch them; they lived above it all.

When evil did arise among them, as in the case of Ananias and Sapphira, instead of spreading, like a noxious weed, it was instantly rooted out, not by church discipline but by the immediate intervention of the Holy Ghost. In such a state of things neither half-hearted nor had any object to gain in uniting themselves with the church; they could not do so without bringing down judgment on themselves, and a false professor dreads nothing so much as being found out. A half-hearted man would never feel at home where every one around him was denying himself, taking up his cross.

Often the question arises, how make the church pure? There is one answer, Let the standard of holiness be the true scriptural one, and "wolves in sheep's clothing" will naturally fall out of the ranks; there will be nothing to attract them; only such as are fully satisfied with Jesus will join those who are like themselves, truth will out, and the unsatisfied heart will soon manifest its dissatisfaction, and seek for itself things which are outside and more congenial. The very purity of the church, however, and the manifestation of the power of God in the glorious conquest of sin and of disease, and of the power of Satan, stirred up the jealousy and deadly enmity of the priests who threw the apostles into prison. And although God intervened so marvellously and opened the prison doors, liberated His servants, and gave them boldness to speak in the temple for His name, the chief priests and rulers, who could not have accounted for this deliverance in any but a supernatural way, yet did not bow before the manifest power of God which was with His servants; but "took counsel to slay them." The very fearlessness, the indomitable courage of the apostles seemed only to increase their thirst for vengeance, until God, through Gamaliel, interfered for the protection of His servants.

We then marked how the first indications of declension commenced in the early church; how self-interest and dissatisfaction crept in where formerly all was gladness and singleness of heart. And then how God overruled this in adding to the number of His ordained apostles the seven deacons, of whom Stephen was one. We learned from the history of Stephen, the power of "a man full of faith, and of the Holy Ghost" and well versed in the Word of God, a man in whom fear had no place, but who sealed his testimony with his blood, maintaining to the very last a face shining in the light of God, and a spirit which was like that of his Lord.

Great power and great grace were manifested by all these precious witnesses of Christ. And

THE RESULTS?

As yet it was only in Jerusalem and the immediate neighborhood that the Gospel had spread, but the number of the disciples was counted by thousands, "a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith." Those who did believe were ready to make any sacrifice for God, and to live or die as should be most for His glory. And we in this day have the same living God, the same "Jesus at the right hand of God," and dwelling also within us, we are the temples of the same Holy Ghost, we have the same glorious salvation. All which is lacking is that there should be the same self-surrender that we may have the same results. Christian brethren, shall we hold back anything? Shall we not now and fully yield all we are and have to Jesus?

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Demonstration in Paris against the Government was made on March 9th. It was headed by the notorious anarchist, Louise Michel, whose inflammatory speeches and writings exercise a disturbing influence on the French communists. The demonstration was professedly composed of working men who were in abject poverty, but observers state that in the crowd there were very few, if any, working men. The police arrested some of the rioters, and on searching them found that though they were shabbily dressed they had each about one hundred francs ($20) in their possession. About three thousand persons took part in the proceedings. They assembled near the Palace of the Elysée and attempted to enter. They were dispersed by the police, but Louise Michel mounted a bill-poster's ladder and delivered a violent harangue; whereupon the crowd made another attempt to enter the palace, but on being charged by cavalry armed with drawn sabres, they fled in all directions. Later, an attempt to erect a barricade was defeated by the police. Louise Michel waved a black flag while her companion, Felix Pyatt, flourished a revolver.

A Second Demonstration Was Made on Sunday, March 11th. The crowds were composed of Socialists who congregated about the Hôtel de Ville. The cavalry were called out and charged the mob, which dispersed before them only to form again in another neighborhood. Other charges were made in which several men and boys were wounded or crushed under the horses' feet, and about twenty persons arrested. At a meeting of Socialists held at the headquarters of a communistic club, it was determined to invite all Socialists to a great meeting in the Champs de Mars on the 18th inst. Violence toward the police and troops was urged. Louise Michel is in hiding to avoid arrest. It is believed that both Legitimists and Bonapartists are indirectly responsible for the outbreak which, it is said, they have encouraged with the object of discrediting the government. If the government becomes unpopular with the lower orders, and the middle classes become alarmed, there is a possibility of a cry being raised for some strong man to take and hold supreme power. This will not be the first time that the fears of the property-holding classes have been excited in order to advance ambitious schemes in France.

Prince Gortschakoff, the Veteran Statesman of Russia, died on Sunday last at Baden-Baden. He was eighty-five years of age, and has taken a prominent part in Russian Government since the year 1824. From that time until April of last year he has occupied the chief place in Russian diplomacy. Though of insignificant appearance, closely resembling, in fact, M. Thiers, of France, he gained a powerful ascendancy in the court of the Czar. By his skill and tact he kept Austria from interfering in the Crimean War, and when after the Congress of Paris peace was declared, Gortschakoff was intrusted with the seals of the Foreign Office, and from that time forward he personally directed the foreign policy of the empire. His skill in diplomacy was unequalled in Europe, and he succeeded on several occasions, when war seemed inevitable, in averting the dreaded calamity. After the tragic death of Alexander II. his health completely broke down, and he reluctantly retired from public life, though his advice was sought to the last by his successors.

Patrick Egan, the Ex-Treasurer of the Land League, has taken flight from Dublin. The police had him under surveillance, but he pretended to be sick and escaped in the garb of a priest. The reason for his sudden and secret departure is not disclosed. Rumors have, during the past few days, been in circulation that the government have obtained important evidence proving the complicity of the Land League in the outrages of the Invincibles, and it is suggested that Egan became alarmed for his personal safety. Another reason assigned is that an examination of the Land League accounts reveals a serious discrepancy. Lady Florence Dixie, in a letter to the Times charges that Messrs. Biggar and Parnell, as trustees of the Land League fund, have not accounted for $760,000 of the money with which they were intrusted. She claims, therefore, that while this money is unaccounted for, Mr. Parnell and his followers have no right to mock the sufferings of the distressed people in Ireland by their sham championship of the starving peasantry. The London Times, in an article based on official information, says that the investigations now in progress will implicate the Land League in immediate patronage of crime, and perhaps establish a direct connection between it and the "Invincibles." Egan's flight is believed to have been due to a dread of this last danger. Sundry prominent Land Leaguers are expected to follow him. The Times plainly points to Mr. Parnell and to other members of Parliament as probably included in the presumption of guilt afforded by Egan's flight, a presumption involving the whole organization of the Land League and every one of its authorities. Egan had still another reason for flight in a lawsuit in which one of the Irish members of Parliament was involved, and in which Egan was to have appeared as a witness.

The Death of M. Coumoundouros, the Celebrated Greek patriot and statesman, is announced in a cable despatch from Athens. M. Coumoundouros was seventy years of age. His origin was humble, his parents raising with difficulty the funds necessary to give him the education necessary to enable him to practice the legal profession. He studied politics, and under the corrupt reign of King Otho became a popular leader. When Otho was expelled in 1862, Coumoundouros accepted office, and since that time has practically directed the policy of the Greek Government. It was mainly due to his tact and energetic persistence that Greece was able to obtain from Turkey the accession of territory assigned her at the Conference of Constantinople.

The False Prophet of the Soudan, in the heart of Northern Africa, is continuing his career of conquest. His personality is, however, still shrouded in mystery, and it is affirmed at Cairo that scarcely anything more is known there about his character, views, and pretensions than in other countries. The important fact that he is advancing, and is at the head of a considerable force, is the theme in every circle, but as yet he is a long distance from Cairo. Whether this aspirant to mixed temporal and spiritual power will be crushed with his army, or be suffered to do mischief and extend his power as the real El Mahdi, is still matter of doubt; but no thoughtful mind, whether Christian or Mohammedan, doubts that his appearance is one of the signs of the latter days foretold in the sacred pages of the Word of God.

American Missionaries in Bulgaria Have been compelled by the Bulgarian Government to close their schools and churches. For many years the Wesleyans have carried on a successful work in the Principality, and have given an impetus to general education and to the dissemination of wholesome literature. Last year, it appears, a Bulgarian priest was among their converts, and his superiors became so incensed at his conversion that they incited the people to attack the mission, and a riot ensued. The missionaries applied for protection to the American Minister at Constantinople, who made an appeal to the Prince of Bulgaria. The Prince protected them for a time, but latterly he has fallen more completely under the influence of his cabinet, which is composed in equal proportions of Russians and Bulgars. Both nationalities were incensed against the American missionaries, and eventually the schools and churches are closed and the native converts imprisoned.

A Destitute Duchess Died Recently in Paris. Her story is of the saddest character. The Duchess de Chaulnes, one of the most beautiful women of the age, for a long time past in litigation with her mother-in-law for the restoration of her children, ended her days in extreme poverty. A princess in her own country, married to a duke in France, brought up and bred to affluence, the poor woman died in a room which she shared with three other people—a man, his wife, and his grown-up daughter. Her death is said to have been caused by the habit so prevalent in all our great cities on this side the Atlantic of hypodermic injection of morphia. The duchess retained her great beauty to the last, although her golden hair had been cut off and sold to buy bread. Her life had been one of gaiety and frivolous amusement. It ended, while she was still young, in poverty and neglect. What a commentary on God's warning! (Isa. 47 : 8–11.)

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Terminated Their mission in Belfast on Sunday, February 18th. The English journals describe the success of the meetings as complete. At least 12,000 people were daily brought within the sound of the Gospel at the various places in the city at which meetings were held. The largest church in the city, St. Enoch's (Presbyterian), was densely crowded at the daily Bible-readings. Two large meetings were held each evening, with overflow meetings from each, and the numbers who remained night after night for the inquiry meetings were most gratifying. The scene at St. Enoch's, at one of these meetings, is thus described in the columns of the Northern Whig: "At the close of the service, when the usual after-meeting was announced, the numbers waiting were something unusual. No one seemed to want to go away. At length a move was made, and only inquirers and 'workers' left. Then pew after pew was filled with anxious ones, until over 150 men were kneeling side by side there, while a large number of lads, whom we could not count, were drafted off to a separate room to be spoken to. It was a most solemn scene—not soon to be forgotten. After prayer, and the quoting of the texts, the men still on their knees, they were taken in hand by ministers and others, and their difficulties dealt with." The services at Manchester commenced March 1st.

Eddystone Lighthouse, the Famous Light on the south-eastern shores of England, has just furnished a story of suffering unparalleled in the whole history of the building. For more than eight weeks the recent furious gales cut off all communication with the mainland; fuel and provisions both ran short; and the lighthouse-keepers, with only a few biscuits left, were forced to fall back upon their store of colza oil, and to warm themselves by the flame of the lamps. When relief came at last they had been reduced to so weak a condition they could scarcely speak.

The Princess of Wales has Caused a Monumental cross to be erected over a grave in Brompton Cemetery, London, on which appears the following inscription: "In memory of Elizabeth Jones, who died May 13th, 1881, for fourteen years the faithful servant and friend of Alexandra, Princess of Wales, by whom this monument is erected. Life's race well run, life's work well done, life's crown well won. Now comes rest. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of The Christian Herald, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE success with which God has honored the work of Miss Jennie Smith among the employés of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, has made her name widely known among the Christian churches of the land. Details of that work have frequently been published in these pages, and a deep interest has been excited in respect to this honored servant of God, so strangely afflicted and so wonderfully healed. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is enabled this week to gratify the general desire to know more about Miss Smith by publishing her portrait and a brief sketch of her life.

Jennie Smith was born August 18th, 1842, at Vienna, Clarke Co., Ohio. She was the eldest of nine children, and during her early years, while the family enjoyed temporal prosperity, all her childish wants were gratified, and her education and mental training carefully attended to. In her published work "The Valley of Baca," * she relates an incident which shows that even at an early age her mind was drawn in the direction of believing prayer. Her was made in childish sport, but the fact that it was answered left an impression on her youthful heart that after years deepened rather than effaced. It is as follows: "I became much interested in the story of a little girl who went to the Lord with her childish troubles, and found relief in times of distress. I soon felt a desire to follow her example. One lovely summer afternoon I went with some playmates to a beautiful meadow. I remained by the mill-dam alone, while they returned for some playthings we had forgotten. As I stood on the bank and watched the rippling water as it plunged down the steep descent into the meadow below, and beheld the lovely landscape that spread out before me, I wondered if God, who made all of these beautiful things, would really love a wicked little girl like me. I had often tried to fish, but never caught one. I thought of the little girl, and such a desire stole over me that I kneeled down upon the mill-dam, and asked God to let me catch just one fish. I then knew nothing about faith; but I baited my hook, and as I threw it in, I set my eye upon the cork, expecting to see it dip. In a few moments I drew out a large fish. This affected me very much. It was my first answered prayer."

The incident may cause a smile to pass over the features of the incredulous who will naturally regard it as a coincidence unworthy of attention, but the fact remains that the child drew a lesson from it which, in after years, led her in more serious matters to apply for help to the same Source and never without receiving aid and succor.

It was in the year 1856, when she was fourteen years of age, that a momentous event in her spiritual life occurred. Naturally thoughtful and observant, her mind had been led by an illness to reflect on her condition before God. The death of a dearly-loved brother and of an aged relative had solemnized her still more, and an incident connected with an approaching camp-meeting, added to the serious impressions she had received. A schoolmate, speaking to her of the camp-meeting announced his intention of giving himself publicly to the Saviour at that meeting, and there commencing a new life. He urged his friend Jennie to do so too. Before the meeting was held, the boy had fallen sick and died. The thought that an opportunity was granted to her which the poor boy had not been permitted to enjoy, powerfully affected her mind, and she went to the camp-meeting with a heart solemnized by the sad event.

The meeting was held near Degraff, Ohio, and there Jennie Smith went with her family and friends. The services seem to have been of a very earnest and solemn character, but for several days Jennie, though drawn by the Spirit, was the subject of a severe conflict. "The evil spirit," she says, "seemed to take possession of me, and I tried to resist all religious influences." Providentially, however, a sermon was preached near the close of the exercises specially adapted to her case, and was followed by the earnest private pleadings of a Christian friend. Light broke in on the tempest-tossed soul, and she publicly confessed Christ at the closing service.

FROM AFFLUENCE TO POVERTY.

The home to which Jennie Smith returned from the camp-meeting was not a home in which religion held the chief place. Though nominally Christian, her father had suffered business cares and the affairs of the world to engross his attention, to the injury of his spiritual life. The change in his daughter's life could not pass unobserved, but it does not appear to have received from him any direct encouragement, though it was evident that he was pleased she should in early life consecrate herself to the Master's use.

The following year, a severe trial fell upon Mr. Smith and his family. He was a prosperous dry-goods merchant, and his business had until that year been uniformly successful. But 1857 was a year of commercial disaster for many merchants, and the tide which swept away many larger fortunes overwhelmed him too. There was a general tightening of credit, business decreased in volume, and the securities he held proved worthless. He was obliged to dispose of his stock and real estate for what they would bring, which in the sudden depreciation of all values was far below their worth, and he removed with his family into a little cottage in the village. He was at that time suffering from asthma, and the loss of fortune aggravated his sufferings.

In that crisis the ruined merchant learned, as many before him have done in similar circumstances, the worth of womanly help and sympathy. Mrs. Smith and her daughter Jennie came to his aid, and by their economy and actual labor succeeded in bringing the expenses of the household down to the lowest conceivable point. It was from that period that Jennie Smith dates the which for many years held her powerless in its grasp. She was one day in 1857 engaged in her household duties, when a load of hay arrived at the house, and her father sent her to find a man to put it away. The man for whom she was sent was not on the premises, and Jennie stood a few minutes considering what she should do. As she meditated she thought of the many girls in the country who were able to do such work for their fathers, and she determined to undertake the task. Saying nothing to her parents of her intention, she went to the barn and set to work. Unaccustomed as she was to the labor, it was necessary to put forth all her strength to keep pace with the strong farmer's man on the wagon, who threw down the hay so fast that she had much ado to keep from being buried under it. Before half the hay was in she felt her back give way, and turning sick and faint she had to call for assistance. She recovered somewhat after a rest, but later in the day attempting in the course of her household duties to lift a heavy weight, she completed the injury her back had suffered in the barn, and she fell prostrated by severe sickness. After lying helpless for many weeks the physicians pronounced her malady one of

CONFIRMED SPINAL DISEASE.

During the next six months Jennie kept her room unable to stand or change her position without excruciating pain. But during that period her spiritual progress, in spite of physical suffering, appears to have been rapid. She induced her father to commence the practice of family prayer and affectionately impressed upon him the necessity of a closer walk with God than he had hitherto enjoyed. The poor man wearied with illness and misfortune admitted his unsatisfactory state, and humbly sought reconciliation with his God. Jennie had the satisfaction of observing the peace of mind which followed this act, and when three months afterward her father lay on his death-bed, she heard with joy his assurance that he was dying in certain hope of a joyful entrance into the rest God has provided for those who love Him.

A HARD STRUGGLE

now lay before the bereaved family. The mother, herself an invalid, with her family of little children, was without a business, yet she had to provide for her family, and Jennie, her eldest daughter who should have been her chief help in this bitter struggle, and who would have been heartily glad to render that help, was pronounced an incurable sufferer. A darker prospect it would be difficult to imagine, but God, in whom the widow and her children trusted, was faithful to His promise, and during all the gloomy years that followed, we find no record that they ever wanted bread. There were, however, many times when the last cent was expended, but in every case that statement is followed by the record that either by the loving gift of some sympathizing Christian friend or by compensation for labor, the exhausted treasury was replenished.

Soon after her father's death Jennie Smith enjoyed a brief period of convalescence. She was able to walk, though with great difficulty and in constant suffering. She immediately commenced work in school, hoping by that means to aid her mother in supporting the family. It was soon evident that the hope was futile. One day she fainted in the school, and had to be carried to her home. She was laid on her bed, and for eighteen months was unable to put her feet to the ground. Many efforts were made to effect a cure, and like the woman in the Gospel, Jennie "suffered many things of many physicians," but only a little temporary relief was obtained. At length, through the kindness of an uncle, she was conveyed on her couch to Columbus where she was placed under the care of an eminent physician under whose treatment she so far benefited as to be able to walk with crutches. She then returned home to attend to her brothers and sisters whom the mother was forced by the urgent needs of the family to leave practically unprotected while she earned a poor subsistence in nursing the sick.

It was with a glad heart that Jennie once more commenced work. Her younger sister was sent to school, and the household duties were once more performed, though in pain and weariness. This state of things continued for a few weeks only. Increasing weakness and the former symptoms of her painful malady again appeared. She gradually grew worse, until on February 24th, 1862, on attempting to dress in the morning she staggered back helplessly and was carried to her bed. That was the last time she stood on her feet for until that glad day in March, 1878, when in answer to earnest believing prayer she arose and walked.

It is impossible even to summarize in the space at our disposal the events of those years of suffering. The eloquent yet modest record of those years, full of patient endurance, of deep spiritual experience, of efforts to win for Jesus the souls of those who visited the sick room, and of continuous persevering endeavor, now in one way, now in another, to lighten the mother's cares and anxieties in her pitiful struggle for bread, is a record that will well repay perusal. It is contained in the two volumes to which reference has already been made, "The Valley of Baca" and "From Baca to Beulah." A few incidents extracted from these volumes must suffice.

On one occasion the wants of the family were supplied in a most remarkable manner which illustrates the watchful care God exercises over don't know,' he responded. This was almost the invariable reply to the last question, whenever I put it. Many people are like this soldier. They get up in some way or other, rising above one bad habit after another, until they are almost Christians, then the enemy of souls knocks them over, and in falling they get wounded sorely. Their only hope is the Ambulance called Repentance, and confession to God of sin and need, and trust in the merits of Christ's atoning death. Then Satan loses dominion, and sin forfeits its sting. 'None but Jesus can do helpless sinners good.'"

An Unexpected Death-Warrant.—The Rev. Mr. Ewing said: "Some days ago I was talking to a gentleman, and, as is customary, inquired after the state of his health. 'Till a few days ago,' was his reply, 'I thought I was all right; but as I did not feel very well, I consulted a celebrated physician, who examined me very carefully. When he had finished I said, "Now, doctor, tell me the plain truth; is there anything serious the matter with me?" "Well, to tell you the truth," replied the doctor, "your heart has done its work."' The doctor's reply was eventually my friend's death-warrant; till he heard it, he was quite ignorant of the disease which was preying upon him. All impenitent, unforgiven, unawakened sinners are in the same condition; search, and see; inquire of God and learn what He calls a sound man. Salvation is spiritual health; sin is spiritual death. Only Christ can save, and give the life you need."

GOD'S PURPOSES CONCERNING ISRAEL.

By the Rev. W. J. Adams, D.C.L.

The Call of Abraham—Its Twofold Purpose—Unconditional Promises to Abraham—Conditional Promises to His Descendants—A Fresh Covenant with David—Partly Conditional—The Ten Tribes Lost—Warning to the Other Two—The Babylonian Exile an Epoch—Three Disasters—Christ's Work for Israel—Are the Promises Annulled?—Six Cogent Reasons—Appeal to the Jews.

Two things are obvious with reference to the call of Abraham: First, that the nation of which he was the founder was designed to be a standing witness against idolatry. And, secondly, was intended to furnish an illustration of the happiness and prosperity of a nation living under the Divine protection and enjoying the Divine favor. Such being the purpose of Jehovah with reference to the people of His choice, let us now consider for a moment the way in which He has brought about the accomplishment of His purpose.

First of all, we find that God made a choice of Abraham as the father of the nation of His choice, and made to him certain unconditional promises, which promises He even confirmed to him by an oath, and repeated to Isaac and Jacob. Afterward He redeemed the nation out of Egypt, and brought them with signs and wonders to Mount Sinai, where He gave Israel a law which they promised faithfully to keep as the condition of His continued protection. When they broke His law, He bore patiently with them, giving them a priesthood and sacrifices and services, raising up judges and kings and prophets to maintain His connection with them. He sorely chastised them, but He did not forsake them; for He had purposes with regard to them which must be accomplished. Royalty was to be established in Israel, and David, a man "after God's own heart," was raised up to succeed him whom God had "given in anger and taken away in wrath."

With him God made

A FRESH COVENANT.

In this covenant some things were conditional, others unconditional. That he was to have a son to succeed him on the throne, was an unconditional promise; but the Divine dealings with the son were made dependent upon his conduct: "If he commit iniquity (said God) I will chasten him." (2 Sam. 7: 14.) And in this respect the covenant with David was conditional. Yet notwithstanding, God's mercy and favor toward the house of David were not to be utterly forfeited. For after the threatened chastisement in case of the disobedience of David's heir, it is immediately added, "My mercy shall not depart away from him, as I took it from Saul whom I put before thee." And the reason is given—"Thine house and thy kingdom shall be established forever before thee; thy throne shall be established forever." Observe the twofold character of the Davidic covenant. Unconditionally, there were pledged to him and to his seed a sure and unfailing house and a kingdom which should never pass away. And conditionally, punishment and displeasure were to befall any of his offspring who should commit iniquity. Alas! the conditional part of the covenant had soon to be enforced. The promised son departed from his father's God and was visited by a righteous retribution; while no sooner does he die, than ten of the tribes were torn away from the house of David. Yet, even then, God remembered the unconditional part of the covenant, and said, "Unto his son (that is Rehoboam) will I give one tribe, that David, My servant, may have a light alway before Me in Jerusalem, the city which I have chosen Me to put my name there." And when afterward God made a conditional promise with Rehoboam, He used these remarkable words—"I will for this afflict the seed of David, but not forever."

THE TEN TRIBES

are carried away captive to Assyria, the kingdom of Judah continues; but even there one king succeeds another of whom it is emphatically recorded, that they were not like David. Meanwhile the prophets were warning king and people of the sure consequences of increasing wickedness, generally predicting, first, the judgments which were nigh at hand, and then foretelling those greater calamities of which these were the type, and which are to go before and accompany the Second Advent of Jesus Christ. This advent they foretell in all its stages, beginning with His first coming to suffer and to die, and then passing suddenly on to His second glorious appearing to punish the nations which have been the scourge wherewith He has afflicted Israel, and to introduce His glorious reign. At length, judgments long threatened begin to fall, and in the days of Nebuchadnezzar, the house of David being utterly corrupt, the conditional part of the covenant comes into requisition and to captivity. The captivity in Babylon marks an epoch in Israel at which commenced that loss of national privilege and spiritual blessing which is without a parallel in their previous history, and which has characterized their condition ever since. Since that period, three tokens of a disastrous change in their state have been clearly manifest. One feature has been the withdrawal of the visible manifestation of the Divine presence. The glory which had dwelt between the cherubim in the temple, which had been as it were the throne and dwelling-place of Jehovah, now removed from Jerusalem and forsook the nation. Ezekiel (who prophesied among the captives by the river Chebar) saw in vision, the departure of the Shekinah, first "from off the threshold of the house" (chap. 10: 18), and then from the city altogether. "And the glory of the Lord went up from the midst of the city and stood upon the mountain which is on the east side of the city." (Chap. 11: 23.) A mournful sight! The prophet Hosea, referring to Israel's condition thus deprived of the symbol of the Divine presence and glory, declares that it should be of long continuance: "The children of Israel shall abide many days without a king and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim." (Chap. 3: 4.)

The second thing which has marked the condition of the Jewish people since the captivity has been that, though not utterly, yet in a very awful sense,

GOD HAS DISOWNED THEM

as His people. "Then," said God, "call his name Lo-ammi (that is, not My people) for ye are not My people, and I will not be your God." (Hosea 1: 9.) In all their previous chastisements, they had still been owned of God as His people, and He had acknowledged Himself to be their God; and this exalted privilege constituted the great distinction between them and other nations. But now Israel was to be abandoned and set aside.

The third feature in their altered condition was the overturning of the throne which God had set up in Jerusalem, and the removal of the house of David. Henceforth the chief power in Jerusalem was to be exercised by a Gentile king, who was, in the first instance, the king of Babylon. It is true, he did not inherit the throne of David, for that throne was overturned, but the dominant power was no longer theirs, it was given to the Gentiles (Dan. 2: 37, 38), "Thou, O king, art a king of kings; for the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power and strength and glory. And wheresoever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field and the fowls of the heaven, hath He given into thy hands and hath made thee ruler over them all. Thou art this head of gold."

And observe, these three features have characterized the condition of Israel ever since, and are visible at this very hour. The return from Babylon did not alter, did not cancel, any one of them. The cloud of the Divine presence never again descended upon Jerusalem, the sentence "Lo-ammi" has never been remitted, and "the times of the Gentiles" are not yet fulfilled. Their "house left to them desolate," their temple destroyed and their city "trodden down," the "kingdom of God taken from them and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof," while a veil of spiritual blindness rests upon their hearts; these are the mournful features in which the New Testament finds them and leaves them. In the Son of David appears, the last Heir of the royal line is born in the land from which He is yet to reign over a regenerated world. The great purpose of His coming was, unquestionably, to work out human redemption and to die for men—"to make an end of sin, to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in an everlasting righteousness." But while His advent had a merciful design toward the whole human race—toward men as men—yet beyond all that, it had a mysterious reference to one particular nation. He came to be "the glory of His people Israel."

And what if they had been prepared to receive Him? What if they had had eyes to see and to discern the day of their visitation? What if they had had ears to hear the message which He brought to them? Might not the marks of their degradation to which we have referred, have been taken away, and the Divine favor and presence restored? What else can we gather from His broken cry? "And when He was come near He beheld the city and wept over it, saying, If thou hadst known, at least in this thy day, the things which belong to thy peace, but now they are hid from thine eyes." "If thou hadst known." He does not say indeed what would have happened had they known. And we must not dare to speak where He was silent. But would it be wrong to imagine what He would have said had not His utterance been choked by His tears of pity? Does He not leave us to infer that the whole condition of things would have been reversed had Israel known the day of their merciful visitation? But they did not. And "the promises made to the fathers" must now again wait for their fulfilment until a distant period.

I say "until a distant period," for Israel's rejection of the Messiah does not annul these promises. By their rejection of Him, the nation as such is put on one side during the remaining "times of the Gentiles," during which the church is to be gathered in by the preaching of the Gospel to men of all nations—Jews and Gentiles alike.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Reduction of the Public Debt during the month of February was between $7,500,000 and $8,000,000. The reduction in January was $13,500,000. The principal cause of the difference is the large quarterly payment for pensions to be made early in March. The amount, which has been forwarded to the pension agents, is $9,781,418.47—the largest sum in any month of the present fiscal year. The ordinary payments from the Treasury for the month have been rather smaller than usual.

The Statistics of Immigration Published by the Bureau give the following figures. In January of this year there arrived in the customs districts of Baltimore, Boston, Detroit, Huron, Minnesota, New Orleans, New York, Passamaquoddy, Philadelphia, and San Francisco, 20,940 passengers, of whom 17,065 were immigrants. Of this total number of immigrants, there arrived from England and Wales, 2802; Ireland, 1542; Scotland, 486; Austria, 317; Belgium, 187; Bohemia, 146; Denmark, 147; France, 206; Germany, 5044; Hungary, 244; Italy, 1592; Netherlands, 173; Norway, 182; Russia, 118; Poland, 30; Sweden, 289; Switzerland, 820; Dominion of Canada, 2564, and from all other countries, 176. In the eight months ended February 28th, 1883, there arrived in the United States 300,484 immigrants, against 375,093 for a like period of the previous year.

The Malagasy Envoys now Visiting this country to exchange ratifications of the new treaty between our Government and that of Madagascar had an interview in Washington on Tuesday, March 13th, with the Christian pastors of the city. The Rev. T. S. Wynkoop, speaking on behalf of his brother ministers, expressed the deep interest felt by all in the religious progress of the inhabitants of the island. In the course of his address he said: We have learned with deep regret that the peace and prosperity of Madagascar are imperilled by the present aggressive policy of the Government of France, which must, if persisted in, lead to a disastrous war in which the highest interests of religion, civil order and education will suffer unspeakable damage. We request the embassy to convey to the government and Christian people of their country our salutations and sympathies, uniting with Christians in Great Britain and the continent of Europe in the earnest prayer to Almighty God, in whose hand are the hearts of men, that this disaster may be averted, and the peace and prosperity of Madagascar assured.

Complaints as to the Appointment by General Keifer on the last day of the session of his nephew as official stenographer are raised in all sections of the country. They are based on the fact that the appointment was made at a time when there would be for several months little, if any work to do. The stenographer whose "resignation was requested" had peformed the arduous work of the session, and according to custom would have continued to receive pay through the summer at the rate of $5000 a year. This it appears is regarded in the profession as compensation for the period when the remuneration is inadequate for the work performed. That a change should have been made at that particular time by the Speaker, in order to find a place for his nephew, is therefore condemned as an act of injustice to Mr. Tyson, the late stenographer.

The Application of the Prohibitionists of Iowa to the Governor asking him to call an extra session of the Legislature to rectify the informality in the amendment recently carried has been rejected. Governor Sherman refused to accede to the request, on the ground that an examination has convinced him that constitutional amendments can be proposed only at regular sessions. As such a one does not meet until next January, the Iowa people will have the question of Prohibition to decide at the Presidential contest, which will seriously complicate the issue.

The Responsibility for the Immunity Enjoyed by liquor dealers in New York who defy or evade the law is likely to be fixed shortly. Recorder Smyth, of the General Sessions, has announced that he will be ready to hear Excise cases early in April, and will sit until the list is finished. It has hitherto been alleged by the District Attorney's office that the courts would not try the cases even if they were presented, but this notification by the Recorder pledges him at any rate to give the cases a hearing. There are now over three hundred indictments in the District Attorney's office awaiting prosecution.

The Welcome Intelligence of a Subsidence of the floods in the South was published last week. A newspaper correspondent telegraphing at the end of the week from Memphis, Tenn., said: "The guage to-night registers thirty-one feet eight inches, a total decline of four feet from the highest mark of this year. The river is now two feet eight inches below the danger line and falling at the rate of three-fourths of an inch every hour. Its fall, though rapid, will be even more so from now on, and everybody is correspondingly elated. The banks on the Arkansas shore opposite this city which were covered with water on Thursday are now plainly visible, and it is the same of all the country between here and Cairo." At Helena, Ark., there is still considerable water out, and the suffering is intense. In all the places inundated severe sickness is reported, and many people are destitute. The Herald fund is being distributed by a commissioner who is travelling down the river on the government steamer Lily which will stop at all points between Cincinnati and Shawneetown and distribute relief. The fund at the close of last week amounted to $48,147.64.

The Desire to Perpetuate the Memory of the late Mr. William E. Dodge, the Christian philanthropist, whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of February 22d, has been generally expressed by his fellow-citizens. The Chamber of Commerce last week appointed a committee to take the question into consideration. The committee held several meetings, and on Monday reported in favor of a simple bronze statue with a granite pedestal, to be placed in some prominent part of the city. It recommended that subscriptions should be invited from all persons in sympathy with the movement in this city or elsewhere in sums, however small, in order that the expression of public regard for the memory of Mr. Dodge might be as widespread as possible.

Mr. Salmi Morse, Who was Arrested for Attempting to produce the Passion Play without a license in New York recently, was discharged last week by the Court of Special Sessions. The two questions submitted to the court were whether the performance was a play within the meaning of the law, and whether the dress-rehearsal was a public performance. Justice Smith said that there was no question that "The Passion" was a play; but the performance in question could not be held to be a public one. Mr. Morse was therefore discharged. Justice Kilbreth said that he did not agree with his associates, and gave it as his opinion that Mr. Morse had merely endeavored to evade the statute.

The Revival Services at Decatur, Ill., Conducted by Rev. Thomas Harrison, continue to attract large congregations, and numerous additions are being made to the churches of the city. The Rev. J. A. Adams, writing of these services to the Chicago Advance, says that the converts come from all classes, but they are principally young men. "Some hard cases have been brought in. Two men started to a free lunch at a saloon, and stopped in here a few minutes to see 'the fun.' They were at the altar that very night, and have not reached the lunch yet. One saloon-keeper says this meeting has cost him fifteen dollars a day in his receipts. It is not yet known how long the meetings will be continued, but it is expected that the close will come early in April. In a private conversation Mr. Harrison said that after a rest at his home in Boston, he will go to Jacksonville, Ill., to conduct a camp meeting, and in the fall he hopes to begin work in St. Louis. He pronounces the Decatur revival the greatest of all those in which he has been engaged.

Messrs. McAll and Saillens, of the McAll Mission in Paris, who are now on a visit to this country, received a warm welcome last week in Philadelphia, where there is an auxiliary of the McAll Mission. The reception meeting was held at the residence of the venerable Dr. Lea. Addresses of welcome were made by Rev. Dr. Breed, and Honorable John Welsh. Rev. R. McAll, and his associate, Rev. Mr. Saillens, gratefully responded to the kind wishes expressed. M. Saillens, although a Frenchman, speaks English idiomatically and fluently. The delegates intended to remain two weeks in Philadelphia, and to speak in many of the churches.

A Sad Scene was Witnessed in Jerry McAuley's Mission in New York on March 5th. It was a funeral service over the remains of Ella de Pattie, one of the converts of the mission. Mrs. de Pattie's story was sad in the extreme. It was one of birth in a respectable family; of sin in youth and of consequent drifting downward through all the grades of crime and misery to the police station and the penitentiary. About six months ago she came to the mission and begged piteously for consolation and spiritual help. She was converted, and work was found for her in a branch of the Magdalen Home in Twenty-second Street. She was a constant attendant at the mission and earnestly warned the young people who came there to beware of her example and not to waste their lives. Not long ago she caught a severe cold which led to quick consumption and caused her death. Her sad story drew a large attendance to her funeral, and not a few women, old and young, who knew the deceased, were present and listened attentively while several speakers pleaded with them to abandon their lives of sin. A good work among these unhappy women is in progress through Mr. McAuley's agency.

A Fatal Accident Occurred in Philadelphia on March 14th, involving the death of a workman. A six-story building is in course of erection on Walnut Street for an insurance company. The scaffolding covers the wall to the roof cornice, and on the day mentioned a carpenter named Draper was at work on the highest level. While engaged there he appears to have forgotten for a moment the dizzy height of his position. He made a misstep and was instantly precipitated to the ground. His comrades saw him clutch convulsively at the joists as he disappeared. The descent was made with frightful velocity. Once his body struck a projecting beam and spun round, and then was projected with frightful momentum through a shed, breaking the boards to fragments. When the workmen went to him they found him still alive but insensible, and he was suffering from horrible injuries. A wagon was procured, and the sufferer was removed to the Pennsylvania Hospital, where he died the same evening. One moment's lapse of watchfulness cost him his life. So we have recently read of men respected in society and holding office in the church whose moral fall has shocked us and has brought reproach on religion, and when we have traced them back along the road of their shame we have found that it commenced in a single misstep made in a moment of unwatchfulness. For divine protection in such moments we have all need to pray (Psa. 119 : 116, 117).

A Remarkable Case of Hydrophobia was reported last week by a physician in New York. In his certificate of death the physician certified that the deceased, a boy nine years of age, died of hydrophobia on Sunday, March 11th. Appended to the certificate was a note to the effect that two years and nine months ago the boy was bitten by a spitz dog, and the wound, in his left hand, was a lacerated one. It healed, and the boy enjoyed good health up to the time of his attack on Tuesday, March 6th. Investigation of the case elicited the information that after the boy was bitten the wound was dressed with a flax-seed poultice. When the injury healed the occurrence was, in a measure, forgotten, and was never talked about. On Tuesday he was taken sick, and the physician was summoned who detected a tremulous contraction of the muscles and the dread of fluids. The boy craved fluids, but was unable to swallow. In his last moments he did not appear to suffer pain, and there was no barking, champing of the jaws, or excessive foaming. The physician decided that the boy suffered from hydrophobia before he knew that he had been bitten by a dog. This knowledge was arrived at with difficulty, for the boy's parents had forgotten about the spitz. It is remarkable that so long a time should elapse between the injury and its fatal results, and it appears that the accuracy of the diagnosis of the physician is disputed by other doctors. There are, however, many sad cases known, of which this is typical, of an injury inflicted on a child's moral nature by a careless word or an evil example, which has been soon forgotten, but which years afterward has completed its fatal work in spiritual death (Prov. 29 : 5).

A Night Run of Cattle on the Drive is graphically described by General Brisbin in an Ohio journal. About two thousand fine steers were being driven across the country to a point on the Northern Pacific Railroad at which they would be taken on the cars for Chicago. On the road a halt was made near a creek for the night, but as a storm was rising the herd became uneasy. The cattle were very restless, getting up, lying down again, and shifting about as if uncomfortable. At last about midnight there came a sharp flash of lightning, followed by a heavy peal of thunder, and in an instant the whole herd was upon their feet and was soon in full flight. The herders made no effort to check or control them further than to keep them going straight. The run lasted about two hours when a gorge was being neared, in which the cattle would crowd and break their limbs. They were now quite tired, and the herders determined to stop the run. The head of the column was bent out on the prairie, and circled round and round until the cattle became tied up in a huge ball and could not move at all. In this way they were obliged to stand until morning, the herders riding round and round them, and keeping them completely tied up. At daylight they were allowed to "open out." First, the outer edge scattered, then layer after layer, until the whole herd was once more grazing as quietly as if nothing had happened. As we read this narrative we are impressed with the intelligence and tact of the herders in saving the cattle from destroying themselves. As we recall to mind scenes in our own lives and cases in history of which that of the confusion of tongues (Gen. 11:8) is a conspicuous example, in which human plans have ended in confusion and failure, we may reasonably ask whether God does not sometimes deal with men in a similar method (Psa. 33 : 8-11).

A Widow's Faith Discounted a Surprise prepared for her recently by her pastor and friends. At one of the churches in Columbus, Ohio, a few days ago, a subscription was taken up to make a present to a lady eighty years of age who, though known to be poor herself, was continually engaged in works of charity. The project was introduced at a prayer-meeting, and was well received. Thirty dollars were contributed, and at the conclusion of the meeting the pastor and a few friends went to the house of the lady with the money. The visitors were somewhat taken aback when the old lady, seeming to take the affair as a matter of course, exclaimed in her characteristic way: "Praise the Lord. I was expecting this. I am not ashamed to confess my poverty. I told the Lord I was needing a little money and didn't know where it was to come from, but I knew He would send it, and here it is" (Matt. 21 : 22).

A Western Miller has been Enriched by the floods according to a statement published in the Cincinnati Enquirer. It appears that amid all the ruin and desolation the deluge has caused, one man is the richer for its incursion. A miller near Lawrenceburg owned about ten acres of barren rocky land around his mill. They were covered by the inundation, but when the waters retired the miller found that his bare rocks were covered to the depth of several feet with the richest soil in the valley, carried there by the powerful current, and his mill pond was filled to the level of the breast of the dam with the same rich deposit. Instead of being a loser by the flood he is ahead the value of ten acres of Whitewater Valley land, which, when there is any of it in the market, commands from $200 to $500 an acre. How often in Christian experience has a blessing, of which this miller's good fortune is a type, been received. Trials have come in like a flood, but when they are past soil ready for the Master's sowing is found to have been prepared (Psa. 119 : 67).

A Novel Method of Advertising is Described by a reporter of the New York Sun. He states that a lady residing in the city recently received by mail a missive from England enclosed in a special request envelope giving an address in London. On being opened it was found to contain the business card of a dry-goods firm in New York inviting the lady's attention to their goods. Being curious to ascertain the firm's object in sending such applications by way of England to persons living in the same city as themselves, the reporter called on the firm to make inquiries. He was informed that the method was found to be one of the best for ensuring attention. Undisguised circulars were apt to be crumpled up and cast aside unread, while an envelope that has crossed the Atlantic is sure to receive notice and arouse curiosity. The firm sent the lists of names to an agent in England who had the cards printed and mailed there, and it was stated that the scheme had succeeded. These communications from a distance, though obviously a mere trick, appear to receive attention, while the Divine voice from heaven offering eternal treasure without money and without price often passes unheeded (Rev. 3 : 17).

THE HOLY SPIRIT'S THREEFOLD CONVICTION OF MEN.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And when he is come, he will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment: of sin, because they believe not on me; of righteousness, because I go to my Father, and ye see me no more; of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged."—JOHN 16 : 8-11.

A Stern Task—Weighted with the Death of the Leader—His Absence Their Gain—The Spirit to Come—I. To Reprove Men—The New Righteousness—Coming Judgment Revealed—II. To Convince Men—A Necessary Work—The Fashionable Theology—Men Never Convinced Without the Spirit—III. To Convict the World—The World at the Bar—No Agnostics at Last—The Sure Medicine.

THE Apostles had a stern task before them. They were to go into all nations and proclaim the Gospel to every creature, beginning at Jerusalem. Remember that only two or three years before they were simple fishermen engaged upon the Galilean lake—men of little or no education, men of no rank or standing. At best they were but Jews, and that nation was everywhere despised, while these peasants were not even men of repute among their own nation. Yet these men were to turn the world upside down. They were told by their Lord that they would be brought before rulers and kings for His sake, and that they would be persecuted wherever they went. They were to proclaim the Gospel in the teeth of the imperial power of Rome, the ancient wisdom of Greece, and the fierce cruelties of barbaric lands, and to set up the kingdom of peace and righteousness.

At the very time when they were about to receive their commission, they were also to lose the bodily presence of their great Leader. While He was with them they had felt no fear. If they were puzzled at any time by the Scribes and Pharisees, they resorted to Jesus, and they were rescued from bewilderment. Never man spoke like that man; never did such wisdom and prudence dwell in any mind as dwelt in the mind of Christ. His presence was their ægis, the broad shield behind which they stood securely, whatever shafts might be shot at them by their adversaries. But now that He was to depart out of the world unto the Father they would be deprived of their fortress and high tower; they would be as children bereft of their father, or, at best, as soldiers without a general. Here was a sad case. Work given, and power withdrawn: a battle beginning, and the conquering Captain leaving.

How happy was it for these disciples that our blessed Lord could tell them that His going away would be for their gain rather than for their loss; for when He was gone to be an advocate for them and with them, and by His power they would be able to silence all their enemies and achieve their mission. The Holy Spirit was to be their Comforter, that they might not be afraid, and their Advocate, that they might not be baffled. When they spoke, there would be a power within them suggesting their words, a power with those words convincing their hearers, and a power in their hearers causing the word spoken to abide in their memories; that power would be divine, the power of the Holy Ghost, who is one God with the Father and the Son.

THE SPIRIT OF GOD WOULD COME

It is one thing for men to speak, and quite another thing for God to speak through men. The work of proclaiming the Gospel to the world was far too great for the twelve; but it was by no means too great for the Spirit of God. Who can limit His power? Is anything too hard for the Lord? The Holy Spirit being their helper, these feeble men were equal to the task which God had committed to their trust. The presence of the Holy Ghost was better for them than the bodily presence of the Lord Jesus. The Lord Jesus could only have been in one place as to His corporeal presence, but the Holy Ghost could be everywhere; the sight of Jesus would but appeal to the senses, but the power of the Holy Ghost touched the heart and wrought spiritual life and saving faith; thus, by His own withdrawal and the sending of the Spirit, our Lord furnished His servants for the conflict.

We will at this time observe what the Holy Spirit did as an Advocate. The passage cannot be fully understood except we give it three renderings; and I do not pretend that even then we shall have pressed from this choice cluster all the generous wine of its meaning. To my mind, it is a compendium of all the work of the Spirit of God. By our three readings we shall see much: first, the Spirit of God goes with the preaching of the Gospel to reprove men of sin, and so to abash them in the presence of the preacher of righteousness; secondly (and this is a much more blessed result), to convince men of sin, and so to lead them to repentance toward God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ; and, thirdly, the ultimate result of the Holy Spirit's work will be to convict men before all intelligent beings of having been guilty of the grossest sin, of having opposed the most perfect righteousness, and of having defied the most glorious judgment. We shall try to see the meaning of the passage through these three windows.

I. First, we believe that a promise is here made to the servants of Christ, that when they go forth to preach the Gospel the Holy Ghost will be with them

TO REPROVE MEN.

By this is meant, not so much to save them as to silence them. When the minister of Christ stands up to plead his Master's cause, another advocate appears in court, whose pleadings would make it hard for men to resist the truth.

Observe how this reproof was given with regard to sin. On the day of Pentecost the disciples spoke with divers tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance. Men from all countries under heaven heard themselves addressed in their native tongues. This was a great marvel, and all Jerusalem rang with it; and when Peter stood up to preach to the assembled multitude, and told the Jews that they had crucified the Holy One and the Just, the signs and wonders wrought by the Spirit in the name of Jesus were a witness which they could not refute. The very fact that the Spirit of God had given to these unlettered men the gift of tongues was evidence that Jesus of Nazareth, of whom they spoke, was no impostor.

Do you not see, too, dear friends, how the working of the Holy Spirit with the apostles and their immediate followers was a wonderful rebuke to the world concerning the matter of righteousness. Jesus was gone, and His divine example no longer stood out like clear light reproving their darkness, but the Holy Spirit attested that righteousness, and compelled them to feel that Jesus was the Holy One, and that His cause was righteous. The teaching of the apostles, sealed by the Holy Spirit, made the world see what righteousness was as they had never seen it before. A fresh standard of morals was set up in the world, and it has never been taken down; it stands in its place to rebuke, if not to improve. The world was then sunken in the uttermost depths of vice, and even its good men were loathsome; but now another kind of righteousness was exhibited in the teachings of the Lord Jesus, and the Spirit came to set the seal of divine approval thereto, so that if men continued in sin it might be against light and knowledge, for they now knew what was righteousness, and could no longer mistake upon that point.

These twelve fishermen could not of themselves have exhibited a new standard of righteousness among men; they could not on their own account have set before all nations a higher ideal of moral excellence; but when the eternal power and majesty of the Godhead vouched for the righteousness of the Lord Jesus, the course of the apostolic church became like that of the sun in the heavens. "Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world." None could stand against them; for, as when the morning breaks, the darkness flies and the bats and the night-birds hasten away, so when the messengers of mercy proclaimed the righteousness of God, man's hypocrisy and self-glorying fled away.

Then, too, they were made to feel that a judgment had come; that somehow the life and the death of Jesus of Nazareth had made a crisis in the world's history, and condemned the way and manner of the ungodly. All historians must confess that is the cross of Christ. It would be impossible to fix any other hinge of history. From that moment the power of evil received its mortal wound. It dies hard, but from that hour it was doomed.

Moreover, the thought flashed upon humanity more clearly than ever it had done before—that there would be a day of judgment. Men heard and felt the truth of the warning that God would judge the world at the last by the man Christ Jesus. The dim forms of Rhadamanthus on a cloudy judgment seat, and of the assembly before His throne, and of the crowds divided according to their lives, now began to assume another and far more definite shape. It was written on the heart of mankind that there is a judgment to come! Men will rise again; they shall stand before the judgment-seat of Christ to give an account of the things done in the body, whether good or evil. The world heard this, and the tidings have never been forgotten. The Holy Ghost has reproved men by the prospect of judgment.

Brethren, does not that put the apostles in quite a different position from that in which they appeared to be? If we judge according to sense and carnal reason, their adventure was Quixotic, their success was impossible. Everybody would have said to them, "Go back to your nets and to your boats. What can you do against the established system of Judaism in your own country? And if that be too hard for you, what will you be able to do in other lands?" Would not prudence agree with this? Ay, but if God is in these men, if He that dwelt in the bush at Horeb, and made it burn, though it was not consumed, will dwell in them, and each one of them shall be gifted with a tongue of fire, this is a different business altogether. Surely, he that made the world, could new-make it. He that said, "Let there be light, and there was light," could command light to shine upon the moral and spiritual night.

II. The Holy Spirit was to go with the preaching of the word of three great prominent truths. This was to be a saving word: they are to be so convinced as to repent of sin, to accept of righteousness, and yield themselves to the judgment of the Lord. Here we see as in a map the work of the Spirit upon the hearts of those who are ordained unto eternal life. Those three effects are all necessary, and each one is in the highest degree important to true conversion.

First, the Holy Ghost is come to convince men of sin. It is absolutely necessary that men should be convinced of sin. The fashionable theology is—"Convince men of the goodness of God; show them the universal fatherhood and assure them of unlimited mercy. Win them by God's love, but never mention His wrath against sin, or the need of an atonement, or the possibility of there being a place of punishment. Do not censure poor creatures for their failings. Do not judge and condemn. Do not search the heart or lead men to be low-spirited and sorrowful. Comfort and encourage, but never accuse and threaten."

Yes, that is the way of man; but the way of the Spirit of God is very different. He comes on purpose to convince men of sin, to make them feel that they are guilty, greatly guilty—so guilty that they are lost, and ruined, and undone. The Holy Ghost does not come to make sinners comfortable in their sins, but to cause them to grieve over their sins. He does not help them to forget their sin, or think little of it, but He comes to convince them of the horrible enormity of their iniquity. He comes to wound so that no human balm can heal; to kill so that no earthly power can make us live. To-day we have so many built up who were never pulled down; so many filled who were never emptied; so many exalted who were never humbled; that I the more earnestly remind you that the Holy Ghost must convince us of sin, or we cannot be saved.

This work is most necessary, because without it there is no leading men to receive the Gospel of the grace of God. We cannot make headway with certain people because they profess faith very readily, but they are not convinced of anything. "Oh, yes, we are sinners, no doubt, and Christ died for sinners"; that is the free-and-easy way with which they handle heavenly mysteries, as if they were the nonsense verses of a boy's exercise, or the stories of Mother Goose. This is all mockery, and we are weary of it. But get near and you have found a man you can deal with; I mean the man who is a sinner, and no mistake, and mourns in his inmost soul that he is so. In such a man you find one who will welcome the Gospel, welcome grace, and welcome a Saviour. Your sham sinner is a horrid creature; but a man truly convinced of sin by the Spirit of God is a being to be sought after as a jewel that will adorn the crown of the Redeemer.

Note here, that the Spirit of God comes to convince men of sin, because they never will be convinced of sin apart from His divine advocacy. A natural conscience touched by the Spirit of God may do a good deal in the way of showing a man his faults; it may thus make him uneasy, and may bring about a reformation of life; but it is only the Spirit of God that to the full extent convinces a man of sin so as to bring forth repentance, self-despair, and faith in Jesus.

The Holy Spirit dwells upon one point in particular: "of sin, because they believe not on Me." None see except by His light. For a man thinks, "Well, if I have not believed in Christ, that is a pity, perhaps; but still, I was never a thief, or a liar, or a drunkard, or unchaste. Unbelief is a matter of very little consequence; I can set that square at any time." But the Holy Spirit makes a man see that not to believe in Christ is a crowning, damning sin, since he that believeth not hath made God a liar; and what can be more atrocious than that? He who believes not on Christ has rejected God's mercy, and has done despite to the grandest display of God's love; he hath despised God's unspeakable gift, and trampled on the blood of Christ. In this he has dishonored God on a very tender point; has insulted Him concerning His only-begotten Son.

The next work of the Spirit is to convince men of righteousness; that is to say, in Gospel terms, to show them that they have no righteousness of their own, and no means of working righteousness, and that apart from grace they are condemned. Thus He leads them to value the righteousness of God which is upon all them that believe, even a righteousness which covers sin, and renders them acceptable with God.

Lend me your ears a moment while I call your attention to a great wonder. Among men, if a person is convicted of wrong-doing, the next step is judgment. A young man, for instance, has been in the service of an employer, and he has embezzled money; he is convicted of the theft by process of law, and found guilty. What follows next? Why, judgment is pronounced, and he must suffer penalty. But observe how our gracious God interpolates another process. Truly, His ways are not our ways! "He shall convince of sin—". The next step would be judgment; but no, the Lord inserts a hitherto unknown middle term, and convinces "of righteousness."

BE AMAZED AT THIS.

The Lord takes a man, even when he is sinful and conscious of that sin, and makes him righteous on the spot, by putting away his sin and justifying him by the righteousness of faith, a righteousness which comes to him by the worthiness of another who has wrought out a righteousness for him. Can that be? Brethren, this seems to be a thing so impossible that it needs the Spirit of God to convince men of it.

I may now set forth the great plan whereby the Lord Jesus is made of God unto us righteousness; I may show how the Son of God became man that He might fully keep the law of God for us, and that having done so, and having added His passive obedience to His active service, He presented to His Father a complete vindication of His injured law, so that every man that believeth on Him shall be delivered from condemnation, and accepted in the Beloved. I might also tell how Christ's righteousness is set to our account, so that faith is reckoned unto us for righteousness, even as was the case with faithful Abraham. Yet all my labor will be in vain till the Spirit shall make it plain.

Note well the great point of the Spirit's argument—"Of righteousness, because I go to my Father, and ye see me no more." Our Lord was sent into the world to work out a righteousness, and here He says "I go"; but He would not go till He had done His work. He says also, "I go to my Father"; but He would not go back to His Father till He had fulfilled His covenant engagements. "I go to my Father"; that is, I go to receive a reward and to sit upon my Father's throne; and He could not have received this glory if He had not finished

HIS APPOINTED WORK.

Behold, then, Christ has finished a righteousness which is freely given to all them that believe, and all those who trust in Christ are for His sake regarded as righteous before God, and are in fact righteous, so that Paul saith, "Who is he that condemneth?"

I know that many will say, "This is making people righteous who are not righteous," and hence they will raise many objections. Just so! This is the glory of God, that He justifieth the ungodly, and saves sinners by Christ. "Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity." "I do not see it," cries one. And our answer is, "We know you do not; we are not in the least surprised that you reject our testimony; we never expected you to receive it unless the arm of the Lord should be revealed, and the Holy Ghost should convince you of righteousness." No man comes to Christ who is not drawn of the Father and enlightened by the Spirit; but if the Spirit convinces you we shall soon hear you sing:

> "Jesus, thy blood and righteousness
> My beauty are, my glorious dress;
> Midst flaming worlds, in these arrayed,
> With joy shall I lift up my head."

Dear people of God, pray hard that the Spirit of God may even now convince unbelievers that the only true righteousness for mortal men is that which comes not by the works of the law, but by the hearing of faith.

But then comes a third point, the Spirit of God is to convince men of judgment. To whom is this judgment committed? "The Father hath committed all judgment unto the Son." The true penitent feels that if he had all his sins forgiven him yet it will not serve his turn so long as he lies wallowing in sin. He feels that the great enemy of his soul must be dethroned, or else forgiveness itself will afford him no rest of heart. He must be as well as from the guilt of sin, or else he abides in bondage. He must see the power of evil hewn in pieces before the Lord as Samuel hewed Agag of old. Hearken, O troubled one! You shall be set free, for "the prince of this world is judged." Again, I say, believest thou this?

Christ is made of God unto us sanctification; He saves his people from their sins; He makes them holy, and so breaks in pieces their enemy. Though it will cost you many a conflict, and the beaded sweat may in the hour of temptation stand upon your brow, as you fear that you will fall from holiness, yet the Lord shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly, for He has already bruised him under His own feet on your behalf. The Spirit of God is needed to convince our unbelieving hearts that it is even so. Most men dream that they must overcome sin by their own strength. Alas, the strong man armed still keeps the house against our feebleness. You have a pretty piece of work before you if in your own strength you venture on this conflict. I can hear the devil laughing at you even now. This leviathan is not to be tamed by you. A power divine is needed, and that power is ready to display itself if it be humbly sought.

III. Last of all, let us read our text by rendering it "convict"—"The Spirit of God of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment." There is the world. It stands a prisoner at the bar, and the charge is that it is and has been full of sin. In courts of law you are often surprised with what comes out. You look at the prisoner, and he seems to be a quiet, respectable person, and you say, "I should not think he is guilty." But the advocate who has engaged to plead the cause of righteousness stands up and gives an outline of the case; and you speedily change your mind, until as the evidence proceeds you say to yourself, "That is a villain, if ever there was one."

Now hear the Spirit of God. The Spirit came into the world to make all men know that Jesus is the Christ, and He attested that fact by miracles that could not be questioned, miracles without number: He has moreover attested the truth of the Gospel by the conversion of myriads, whose happy and holy lives have been a proof that Jesus Christ was indeed sent forth from God. But what did this wicked world do with Christ? They gave Him a felon's death: they nailed Him to a cross. By this the world is condemned! We need no further evidence. The world is convicted; self-condemned by the slaughter of Him who was incarnate goodness and unbounded love. The world is base enough to desire to slay its God even when He comes on an errand of love. Take the accused away! The world's guilt is proven beyond question. The wrath of God abideth on it.

What follows upon this? The trial is viewed from another point. The world has declared that the Gospel is not righteous, that the system which our Lord has come to establish is not true. Up to this day the world is continually raising objections, trying to confound believers, and, if possible, to defeat our most holy cause. But the Spirit of God by His teaching proves that the Gospel is full of righteousness; and by all His operations through the word He proves that the Gospel is holy, and just, and good, and tends to make men pure, godly, peaceable, and holy. By sanctifying men through the Gospel so that they lead gracious lives, the Holy Spirit proves that the Gospel is righteous.

This process grows more and more complete as time rolls on. Were not the world unrighteous it would long ago have yielded to the holy message and its holy Messenger. But it will be forced to own the truth one day. The Holy Spirit makes the world know that Christ is righteous by flashing into its face the fact that Christ has gone, gone up to glory, at the right hand of God, and this could not have been had He not been the righteous One.

When the world shall see Jesus enthroned at the last, and all mankind shall behold the Son of man on the clouds of heaven, what conviction will seize on every mind! There will be no agnostics then! Not a sceptic will be found in that day! Christ seen at the Father's right hand will end all unbelief!

And then the Spirit of God shall make men see the judgment. Before the day actually comes, they shall perceive that since Christ has judged the devil, since Christ has cast him down from his high places, and his power over the world is already broken, assuredly He will smite all that are in the dominion of Satan, and will not allow one of them to escape. The cause of evil is judged, and its case is desperate. Oh, how the Spirit of God will convict men at that last day when they hear the Judge say, "Come, ye blessed of my Father," or "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire."

Men and brethren, will you be convinced by the Holy Spirit now, or will you wait till then? Shall it be the convincement of grace or the conviction of wrath? The Spirit bears witness still with us who preach the Gospel; will you yield to that Gospel, and believe it now? or will you wait until the blaze of the last tremendous day? Which shall it be? I think I hear you say, "The Gospel is true." Why, then, do you not believe it? If you confess "sin," why are you not washed from it? If there be "righteousness," why do you not seek it? If there be "judgment," why do you not ask to be so cleansed that you need not be afraid of it? O sirs, the most of men act as if they were born fools. If they were sick, and we had a sure medicine for them, they would rush to us for it. If they were poor, and we brought them gold, they would tread us down in their vehemence to snatch at wealth. But when there is Christ to be had, the divine remedy for sin, Christ to be had as a perfect righteousness, Christ to make them stand securely at the last dread day, they turn their backs upon the heavenly boon. O Spirit of God, win these madmen; bring back these fools and make them sane and wise, for Christ Jesus' sake. Amen.

ATTACK UPON MISSIONARIES IN CHINA.

Mr. Henry Soltan, a missionary connected with the China Inland Mission, has sent the following narrative of an adventure which occurred on his journey from Burmah to China:

Nothing of importance occurred until the noon of Wednesday, December 1st, when we came to a halt on the summit of a hill which formed a plateau, surrounded on three sides by still loftier hills. It was intended to rest here for an hour or so, and make a further journey before night. The caravan had now quitted the territory belonging to the Cowrie tribe of Kah-ch'ens, and had entered that of the La-hums, two or three of the great leading chiefs of which were also great friends of ours. Arrived at this plateau, one of the La-hum chiefs with us bade us dismount, which we did, and were preparing to find a good place in which to rest, when two Kah-ch'ens, whose faces were familiar to us, stepped forward, and, taking the reins of our ponies, commenced to lead them off, bidding us follow, saying, "Come this way, teacher." Not suspecting anything, Stephenson allowed his pony to be taken off, and I was just following behind mine, when, looking round, I noticed that our Cowrie guides would not let these men take away our pack-pony and mules. Suspecting that all was not right, I rushed up to my pony "Jet," and seized his bridle, saying to the Kah-ch'en, "Wait a little, don't be in a hurry." He at once began to pull violently at the reins, and on my pulling in the opposite direction, became very angry. With eyes flashing with rage and teeth clenched, he drew his sword, flourished it over my head, his face looking quite fiendish.

ATTACKED BY ROBBERS.

"Don't be in a hurry," I said, "I'm not afraid. Stop awhile and talk about it. There is no occasion to be angry." But he shouted and pulled, and five or six companions came to his aid, all of whom drew their frightful-looking sword-knives and flourished them over my head as if to cut me down.

The Lord kept me perfectly calm, and I never felt the least fear. Had I been flurried, and lost my temper, I doubt not the affair would have ended seriously. As it was, my composure baffled them, and they seemed afraid to strike. Unfortunately, Stevenson's pony had by this time been led away out of sight, and he had been following behind me, being likewise menaced by the Kah-ch'ens. Coming up to me he said, "Let the pony go, for my sake; don't let them take your life." However, as "Get" resisted splendidly, and stuck to me, I was not going to give him up to these robbers unless compelled. Just then a party of our friends, Cowries and La-hums, rushed up, and drawing their "dahs" (sword-knives), ensued, which looked terrible enough, though happily the blows on both sides were given with the backs and not with the blades of the "dahs," so that no blood was drawn. "Jet" was rescued, and led off to the rear of the camp. The packs were jerked off the pack animals, and they, too, were conveyed to a place of safety. We were conducted to the further end of the camp. In the midst of the fight one of our chiefs ran up the hill, and seizing the man who had stolen Stevenson's pony, threatened to cut him down if he did not at once yield him up; and soon he was seen triumphantly returning with his recaptured prize, his "dah" drawn and his long black turban trailing behind him.

Our adversaries finding they were beaten, became more angry than ever. They fired off guns, leaped about, cursed the Cowries and the La-hums, men of their own tribe, who had aided us, taunted them with being descended from Christians, pointed their fingers at them in an aggravating way, and hooted and yelled in the wildest manner. All the camp was in a state of great excitement. Had the Lord not inclined the hearts of our friends to interfere on our behalf, we should have lost everything, and should have been unable to recover our animals or goods without payment of a heavy ransom. Taking the settlement of the affair entirely out of our hands, they told us not to be alarmed, as they would make it all right.

The Moung-wai villagers, on seeing us two foreigners upon the hills, determined to take advantage of our presence to make some money out of us, and therefore organized this attack, entirely ignoring the solemn covenant into which they had entered with Major Sladen.

Although the arbitrators were themselves a source of danger, being of drunken and predatory habits, the caravan started the next morning, and we passed on without a word from any one, and met with no further trouble for the remainder of the journey.

A LITTLE BROUSSA ORPHAN.

THE picture of the little waif on this page is the portrait of one of the orphans received into the Orphanage Mrs. Baghdasarian has established at Broussa in Asia Minor. A portrait of that lady and a sketch of the history of the homes appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 6th, 1881. Broussa is the capital of Bithynia, the country in Asia Minor of which the Apostle Peter speaks (1 Pet. 1:1). The city is situated on the slope of Mount Olympus.

During the terrible famine which raged in Asia Minor during the years 1874-75 the people became so destitute that they were obliged to eat the grass of the field like cattle, and many were the victims to the cruel ravages of famine. The sympathies of American and English Christians were roused, and liberal help was dispensed through the agency of the missionaries. Despite the heroic efforts and aid which came from every quarter, the famine spread like a terrible fire, consuming man and beast alike. It was computed that the famine extended over forty thousand square miles, and that one hundred and fifty thousand persons perished. Hundreds fled to the capital and other large cities, and many orphans were left destitute. Broussa was one of the cities of refuge for poor, famine-stricken people.

At the end of the year 1874, when the famine was at its height, and Broussa was filled with refugees, the Rev. M. Baghdasarian accepted an invitation to the pastorate of the Evangelical Church in the city, a professorship in the New Evangelical Seminary, and the charge of the day-school. Seeing the terribly neglected condition of the female children who came to Broussa in search of food, his heart yearned to do something for them, especially when a number of these wretched little starvelings ran after him, crying, "Bread! bread!"

After long consideration and prayer he resolved upon opening a Home in Broussa, where some, at least, of the little destitute wanderers might be gathered in and taught to know and love the God and Father of the orphan. On the 31st of July, 1875, the work was commenced, and the Home was opened with one little Armenian orphan girl four and a half years of age; but though the work was evidently of God, many difficulties and trials of faith were experienced before the home was fairly established.

In a very short time there were six Armenian girls and one Greek girl under the roof of the New Orphan Home, with twelve day pupils, so that a little mission work was going on, as all the girls belonged to the Old Oriental Church. Christians as well as others sympathized with the work when they saw the once dirty, neglected ones, neatly clothed and looking very happy, walking to the Protestant Church on the Sunday. There are now over fifty girls in the Orphanage. Here are specimens of what some of the girls once were, and portraits of what they now are:

Little Anna, seven years old, was found by a man on a heap of rubbish, eating whatever she could find. The poor little thing looked scarcely human; she was sewn up in rags. When the rags were cut from her it was discovered that her attenuated body was eaten into holes by vermin, and her head was covered with sores, which caused her hair to fall off. By patient nursing, after eight months' residence in the Home she had become a pretty, clear-complexioned, lovable girl, and her head is now covered with brown, curling hair.

Marian, another orphan, was found in the streets of Broussa begging. She had run away from one to whom she had been sold, and who had been in the habit of binding her to a pillar and whipping her most cruelly. She is a most clever girl, sews beautifully, and is gentle and obedient.

These are but samples of many cases which could be adduced; but enough has been said to commend the "Asia Minor Home for Orphan and Destitute Girls" to the sympathy and prayers of our readers.

FREDDY'S PICTURE.

"MAMMA, need I say my prayers to-night?" asked a bright, handsome boy, as he kissed his mother good-night. "I am so tired, and I can scarcely keep my eyes open, I'm so sleepy."

That clearly was not the time for an explanation, or to teach the weary boy the value of prayer. Marian Travers, earnest Christian and devoted mother as she was, had too much tact and sense to venture upon it then. She put down her work, and going up with her boy to his bed-room helped him to undress, and sat beside him while he offered up the few simple petitions she had taught him as soon as he was able to remember them. The boy, delighted by the rare treat of his mother's company in his own room, forgot his weariness, and would have kept her near him for hours, had not she deemed it wise to leave him to "tired nature's sweet restorer."

The next morning Freddy's first invasion of his mother's sitting-room revealed a change in its arrangements. On an easel near her work table was a tastefully framed picture of a fair-haired boy of about Freddy's age, on his knees.

"O mamma, how beautiful!" was the boy's exclamation. "Who is that?"

"Come here, my boy," said the mother, "I wish to speak to you. Let me tell you all about the picture. It is for your bedroom, and I have been out this morning to buy it for you, and we will hang it up over your bed so that you may never forget the little boy's history.

"Oh, thank you, dear, kind mamma," said the boy, throwing his arms round his mother's neck and kissing her over and over again. "Now I am quite ready to listen; please tell me the story."

"You remember last night, Freddy, that you asked me if you must say your prayers as you were so tired?"

"Yes, mamma, I was out skating until nearly bed-time, and I did not think it was so late until I heard the sunset gun, and then I ran all the way home. My feet and legs ached so when I came in I felt I should like to lie down and go to sleep right away. I thought it would not matter if I did not say my prayers just for once. But I did say them after all, you know, mamma, so it's all right, and you will tell me the story now, will you not?"

"If my little Freddy had wanted something very much, that his mamma could give him, would he have said, 'Need I ask mamma for it?'"

"Oh, no, mamma, I should come to you right away and ask for it."

"Well, my boy, your prayers are just that. You kneel down and ask God to give you something you need very much, and you thank Him for giving you many things which you would be very unhappy if you did not have."

"But, mamma, I do not want the things I ask God for, and besides do you think He can hear me all the way up in heaven?"

"Yes, Freddy, He does hear you and you do need the things you ask for. Suppose some morning you were told you must go away from home on a voyage to Europe, would you not say, I cannot go now, I shall need ever so many things for the voyage and while I am away. I wish I had known I was going, so that I might have been ready. And suppose you found that your papa had known all along about your going, and when you went to him you found that he had in his study every kind and description of article you would need, would not that be good? Well, prayer is something like that. You do not quite know what you will need when you grow up a big man like papa. You may have to do things you don't understand, and wicked men may try to persuade you to do things that if you did them you would be very miserable, but you cannot know that, and you do not know whether you should do them or not, and you wish you knew some one that could tell you. Now, God knows exactly how you will live and what you will need to make you happy and good and useful, and He can give you those things. So when you kneel down to pray, you ask Him to deliver you from evil and to bless you. So you see you do really need the things you ask for, though you do not know that you do."

"Yes, mamma, I understand now; but do you really think that when I say my prayers God hears me?"

"Yes, Freddy, I am sure He does, and I will tell you something that will astonish you still more. He once spoke to a little boy like you. He wanted some one to take a message for Him to warn some people of a great trouble that was coming, and He chose a little boy to go for Him. The little boy was afraid at first, but afterward he listened and promised to do it. God often spoke to him afterward when he grew up and became a great judge and a very good man."

"Oh, do tell me all about it, mamma," said the interested boy.

Then the mother took up her Bible, and read to him the story of Samuel, and before the picture of the little praying child was carried up to his bed-room she knelt with her son and entreated God that He would so call him and consecrate him to His service.

FETTERS OF FASHION.

By Miss M. A. Paull,

Author of "The Flower of the Grassmarket," "The Romance of a Rag," etc., etc.

Number Six.

Number Six was a very neat house, built of gray stone, and made tasteful by elegant curtains and beautiful flowers in its windows. It was situated exactly opposite the splendid old elm-tree which shelters and overshadows the ancient stone cross of the clean and respectable town of Moreton Hampstead. Beyond the cross and the elm are the churchyard and the handsome stone church, with its massive tower; and this being Sunday evening, the two girls in the window of Number Six are furtively engaged, scanning and criticising, from behind their respective screens of muslin curtains, the dresses, styles, and general appearance of the church-goers, as they leave the sacred edifice, in the soft yet brilliant light of this summer evening.

And lest any one should feel inclined to blame them for not being themselves among the worshippers, it will be best at once to state that the younger of the two is temporarily an invalid, and the other is therefore very properly her companion in order to release their attendant.

The young ladies might have found more profitable employment in their home on that Sunday evening. Seasons of quiet meditation and reflection are all too rare in this day of ceaseless occupation, and such a calm Sunday evening as that, when the sickness of one sister and the attendance of the other precluded their joining the company of public worshippers, would have been a blessed opportunity for study of God's Word and communion with Him. Unhappily, however, the two girls had been reared in an atmosphere of worldliness by an ambitious mother, whose desires for her family were centred in their earthly advancement. The hope of a brilliant marriage for her daughters was the one powerful attraction toward which all her thoughts were drawn, and for this she planned and schemed day and night. It was impossible that the girls should have lived with such a mother and not imbibed, to some extent, her ideas, and it was therefore not strange that they found congenial amusement in watching and criticising the attire of their neighbors as they wended their way homeward beneath the windows of Number Six.

"There comes Uncle Rege!" said Patty, the elder girl. "Whatever has made him go to church, I wonder."

"Why, Patty, he's been often lately; and Mr. Hollins has taken quite a fancy to him."

"Mr. Hollins!" echoed Patty, with an incredulous smile. "Nonsense, Loo; Mr. Hollins has too much sense to be taken up with any of his crotchets. What an unfortunate thing it is for us, situated as we are, that Uncle Rege is the kind of man he is. Now, some uncles that even have the misfortune to be tradesmen, are able to forget the fact occasionally, and so to make other people forget it too. Why, don't you remember Mr. Marley? He was quite a gentleman, though he kept a gin-palace somewhere. Aunt said, when we met him at Minehead, that nobody ever thought of snubbing him on that account, his manners were so good; and he had so much money. And just fancy! Uncle Rege would look askance at Mr. Marley; and would even refuse to sell him a pound of tea!"

Loo laughed merrily.

"You provoking old dear!" said Patty, pinching her sister's pretty cheek; "you never will see things about Uncle Rege as all the rest of us do. The whims that man has are enough to drive anybody distracted, even if they were no relations to him; and when, as in our case, we have the misfortune to be nearly related to him, it is so much the worse. Fancy him offering Fanny a place as his housekeeper at that shop, with only that old woman to help her do the work! I don't know what such men as Uncle Rege think elegance and beauty are made for!

And only think of his telling mamma that she would repent one day taking her glass of wine and offering strong drink to her guests! There is such a thing as teetotal insanity, and Uncle Rege is a victim—that's what I think;" and Patty smiled at herself complacently, as if conscious that she had arrived at a very just conclusion, and said quite a clever thing.

"There they come!" said Loo, as a handsome-looking, middle-aged lady, accompanied by two younger ones, all of them fashionably attired, made their appearance. "How well dear mamma is looking!"

"But not particularly amiable," said Patty; "something has ruffled her ladyship, I am afraid."

The three ladies, having crossed the road, entered the house, and came into the sitting-room of Number Six.

"What sort of a sermon, mamma?" asked Loo, affectionately turning to her mother.

"My dear, I am quite overcome with the heat," said Mrs. Sylvester. "I can say and do nothing till one of you get me a glass of wine. Really this heat is terrible!" and only staying to lay her lace shawl and bonnet on the table, she flung herself into an easy chair, and began to use languidly the fan she carried.

Patty went to the sideboard and poured out a glass of port wine, and handed it to her mother.

"Come, Clarie," she said then, "what's the matter? How solemn you all look. What has the sermon been about, to give you all the blues?"

"I think it has been a very nice sermon," said Clarie. "But very few liked it; it was preached by a stranger, called Spencer; and he spoke against drinking."

"Goodness!" said Patty, emphatically. "Then that accounts for Uncle Rege's churchgoing."

"My dear, it accounts for anything," groaned Mrs. Sylvester, pathetically. "It makes me ill to think of what the Church is coming to;" and then she went on between the sips of her wine in a languidly, genteel voice—"Such inroads; such innovations since my young days! Then at least one was safe to hear sound sermons, and not temperance trash, from the pulpit."

"I don't believe Dr. Blair liked it," said Clarie. "He was fidgetting all the time."

"Of course he didn't!" replied her mother. "What sensible clergyman would? Every one knows what a splendid cellar our respected vicar has; and every rightly constituted mind must feel for him in the indignity to which he was subjected to-night in his own church. Even your uncle, poor man, could hardly have said things more opprobrious concerning those who feel it necessary for their health to take a little wine."

"But we don't take it for our health, mamma," said Loo uncompromisingly, "four healthy girls as we are in a general way cannot possibly require wine as a medicine."

"Of course not," assented Clarie, "we take it simply because it is fashionable to do so."

"And for my part," said Fanny emphatically, 'I'd rather go out of the world, than be out of the fashion."

Loo laughed her sweet merry laugh. "I wouldn't, Fanny," she said, "I think it must be delightful to live in this beautiful old world without needing to worry about what is and what is not fashionable. I should like to be able just to put on my hat without thinking any more about dressing up, and go for a walk; and I think we four girls might do all the work of this house without a servant, and be all the better and healthier for doing it and not a bit less of ladies; and then we should have a little more money to spend for our poor neighbors."

"Louise," said her mother with much dignity and some little warmth, "I must beg of you to stop such vulgar discourse. How your Uncle in his family, and you in mine, are so fond of outraging all decency and propriety in your ideas is wholly beyond my comprehension. But at least, as long as I am mistress in my own house my daughters must submit to my regulations, and not outrun in action the limits which fashion very properly sets to the silly schemes and notions of young and foolish girls."

Thus set down, Loo, being as sweet tempered as she was outspoken, discreetly maintained for a little while a good tempered silence, and when she spoke again it was on a subject that could not offend her mother.

The family of the Sylvesters was like thousands of other families, cramped in its means of usefulness, and in its true enjoyment by the assumption of a false style, and of wealth which had no existence. Mrs. Sylvester was the widow of an officer with a just sufficient pension to maintain her and her four daughters in simple comfort. Unfortunately she had become imbued with a notion, common enough among other professions, but which clings with singular tenacity to both sexes connected with the army and navy, that trade is a degradation; and that those who are engaged defending their country by sea or land with carnal weapons, and who are taught the terrible lesson how to destroy the lives of others; are vastly superior in position to their employers—the tax-payers of the country.

She also had no will, perhaps no mind, to understand that the true greatness of a country, in which lies her real strength among other nations, are her honest industries, her cultured learning, and her religious principles; all of which may be developed and enjoyed by every inhabitant of the land.

Mrs. Sylvester on her widowhood had come to Moreton Hampstead to reside, because she knew from experience that she could live more economically, and be a greater person in the country on her very limited means, than in the gay resorts where she would have liked so well to reign. Power, and style, and fashion were her watchwords. She had also some thought of her brother, who with all his quaintness and peculiarities was generous according to the means of a country tradesman; and the large weekly parcel of groceries that was sent to Number Six from his store, and which she never hinted to any one was sent gratuitously, made a good show to the neighbors and also supplied many a gap that might otherwise have been disagreeably felt, either in the physical economy or the fashionable toilette of the mother and her daughters.

For the sake of dress and a wine-cellar, and the folly of keeping up appearances beyond her real ability, Mrs. Sylvester sacrificed true comfort, the power to help a poor neighbor, and mental culture. If ever a reduction in expenditure was found necessary, it was made not in wine and ale, not in fashion-books, ribbons, and laces, not even in the donation to be gracefully and ostentatiously laid on the plate in church for the restoration of a cathedral, or the spiritual education of the far-away heathen; but Loo was positively forbidden to give away anything more to Widow Maunder, or to dream of paying the school pence for the orphan family she had hitherto helped.

"O mamma," Loo would sometimes say, "give me the money for the wine I should drink in a year, and let me do with my last pair of gloves another three months, and then I could still do what I have been accustomed to for them."

But Mrs. Sylvester was imperative, and Loo would go away and ease her disappointment and sympathies for her proteges by a good cry, and try hard to devise other means to help them, by stinting herself without allowing her mother to know.

While she did not by any means forbid her daughters to visit their uncle, the elegant widow of the officer tried her best to make them feel that they were altogether out of place in the grocer's humble, though comfortable parlor; and she had so far succeeded that Fanny, Patty, and Clarie all felt considerably ashamed when duty or interest necessitated that they should bring their elaborate costumes into contact with soap, candles, and split peas, and pass through an avenue of molasses and sugar barrels to their uncle's sitting-room beyond the store, heralded by the aproned apprentice or assistant who, knocking at the old gentleman's door, announced them smirkingly or abruptly, as the case might be, as "Your nieces, sir."

But Loo neither felt nor showed any of this absurdly ill-timed affectation of superiority which her sisters manifested. The fetters of fashion, spite of the atmosphere in which she had been born and brought up, did not gall her young, free spirit, and her honest heart and quick wit made her both perceive their weight and resent their pressure. Louise Sylvester, bright, sweet, gay as a wood-bird, came alone, bounded lightly through the cumbersome adjuncts of her uncle's business premises, tapped for herself at his parlor-door, or if she found it open, entered, sure of a welcome, and awaited his coming, bringing sunshine into the somewhat shady room. And while she waited, she studied her uncle's favorite volume, or read his newspaper, till the old man entered, when she sprang up to greet him with the genuine affection and respect that his character deserved.

Reginald Courtenay, the uncle, was a man whom no one could pass without seeing him. He was above the average height of even tall men, and finely proportioned. His head was well-shaped, his face handsome and intelligent. His once dark hair had now become iron-gray; his eyes were gray also, shrewd and merry; his mouth was frank in expression, and revealed rows of fine, sound, white teeth whenever he gave his hearty laugh—a laugh that was infectious in its joyous ring.

"If only," as his sister often pathetically, and in a tone of injured innocence, remarked, "he would not dress in that absurdly old-fashioned style, and act and talk in such a ridiculously eccentric fashion, he might, with his fine natural appearance, have been quite useful to myself and the dear girls. But who could walk about with a middle-aged man who persisted in dressing in the fashion of his youth? What lady of taste could enjoy the conversation of a man, even her own brother, if he would be incessantly talking of his hobby, teetotalism, and using such fatigue-inspiring words as 'principles,' 'duties,' 'necessities.'"

There could be no doubt that Reginald Courtney had crotchets. As, to be a consistent teetotaller meant, in his estimation, an immense deal more than it does to most of us, he would not accept the custom of any of the townspeople who made their money by selling drink, and who were anxious to deal with so thoroughly respectable a tradesman, on whose goods more than on any other grocer's in the town, they could depend for prime quality, freedom from all adulteration in its most infinitesimal degree; and "weights" whose "justice" was unquestionable.

One or two of the landladies of Moreton Hampstead had actually undertaken to argue the point with him.

"I call it unneighborly and un-Christian of you, Mr. Courtenay, to act as you do; what is my money worse than other folk's money for?"

"Because you sell liquor, madam, and get the richer by the injury of others," said the grocer, "and that is what I never knowingly will consent to do."

"But I don't get all my money by drink," said his antagonist, who saw with her womanly quickness what she considered a weak point in his armor; "I'll pay at your counter what I get by the things my customers eat, and not the money I take for the drink."

"It is impossible, Mrs. Ireland, that you should separate them; my conscience will feel less disturbed if I have nothing to do with drink-money. I am obliged to you for your willingness to deal with me; against you, personally, I have nothing to say; against your business in that part where you supply the proper needs of men and women, I have also nothing to say; but when I think of the drink supplied in your house, my mind misgives me, my common-sense tells me it is a grievous wrong to the community that such articles should be sold, and I will not be in any way the better, the richer—I mean, for money so obtained."

Whereupon Mrs. Ireland in a "huff" left him abruptly.

(To be continued.)

SIMON THE SORCERER.

S. S. Lesson for April 1, Acts 8 : 9-25. Golden Text, ver. 21. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Disciples Prepared for Sacrifice—Preaching Backed by Disinterestedness—Philip's Mission to Samaria—God Prepared His Way—The Modern Methods—No Compromise with the World — Philip's Miracles Unmistakable — Simon's Spirit Still Rampant—The Self Forgetfulness of the Consecrated Worker—The Need of the New Converts—Simon's Desire for Apostolic Power—Peter's Scathing Rebuke—The Belief in Prayer not in God.

We have seen how the disciples who were scattered abroad in the persecution which commenced with the death of Stephen, "went everywhere preaching the Word." Pecuniary considerations had no weight with these temples of the Holy Ghost; all they were and all they had was invested for the glory of God and the salvation of souls; and therefore no consideration held them back. Should their testimony cost them their lives, as it had cost Stephen—they were ready to die; should it hinder them from obtaining employment—they had the promise of God, "Bread shall be given to them and their water shall be sure." "If ye seek first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness, all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. 6 : 33). Should they lose caste, and be despised—they had cast in their lot with Him who was "despised and rejected of men" (Isa. 53 : 3), and they had accepted from their Lord that "it is enough for the disciple that he be as his Master, and the servant as his Lord" (Matt. 10 : 25). What should be the result of preaching backed by such disinterestedness as this? God gives us a sample: "Then Philip went down to the city of Samaria, and preached Christ unto them.

And the people

WITH ONE ACCORD

gave heed unto those things which Philip spake, hearing and seeing the miracles which he did. For unclean spirits, crying with loud voice, came out of many that were possessed with them; and many taken with palsies, and that were lame, were healed." Philip made no attempt to gain the people by bringing some extraordinary attraction to bear upon them; he knew that he was sent of God, and he knew that God would take the responsibility of preparing the way for His own Word. The modern plan of attracting the people to the Gospel by pandering to their worldly tastes had not yet been invented by the devil. Philip neither got up concerts nor entertainments, nor bazaars, he only preached Christ. Oh, it is degrading to the very spirit of Christianity, when the professed winners of souls try to make up for their own lack of Holy Ghost power by this going down to Egypt for help, and use worldly and fleshly inducements to win men to the Saviour! What kind of converts are the result? Just such as themselves; and thousands of such will find at the last day that they have made an awful mistake and that they are not converted at all.

What, shall we win men from "this present evil world" (Gal. 1 : 3), by offering to them a portion of their loved pleasures in order to induce them to renounce the rest? Shall we countenance a kind of gospel which springs neither from God nor from the Bible, that if men only believe in the sacrifice of Christ for them, and become members of churches, they may live, talk, dress, do business, and act exactly as though they were unconverted, in fact, their chief aim must be to conceal from the world that they belong to Christ and make the Word of God untrue where it says, "If any man be in Christ he is a new creature; old things have passed away, behold all things are become new" (2 Cor. 5 : 16)? The early church understood the true relations between God and man, i.e., that man exists for God, not God for man, that man is created, redeemed, saved, sanctified, healed for God, not for himself.

One great instrumental cause of

was the miracles which Philip did, and these seem to have been chiefly in the line of healing; unclean spirits, crying with loud voice, came out of many that were possessed with them; there would be no mistake as to the deliverance, the departure of the evil spirits was a manifest fact. Paralyzed people regained the use of their limbs, and lame people began to walk. It is often said in this age of unbelief, that miracles are not needed nowadays. We believe the exact contrary, that miracles are more needed now than at any other time of the church's history; that amid the mass of religious confusion, amid the fearful hypocrisy which is abroad, there may be undeniable proof to convince puzzled but honest seekers after truth that the Lord indeed is still among us.

Even in these early times there were false disciples. One of these, Simon, an ex-sorcerer, had formerly obtained great power over the people through the spiritualism of those days; he had bewitched the people who looked upon him as the great power of God, for he gave "out that

HIMSELF WAS SOME GREAT ONE."

It is not unusual to hear Christian workers boasting of their overflowing meetings, and of the many souls they have been the means of leading to Christ, and of the power of their holiness meetings, and of their great faith, etc. Alas, alas, they are not free from the spirit which actuated Simon the sorcerer, in their eyes they themselves are great ones. When Peter and John had been used of God for the healing of the lame man, Peter took the greatest pains to turn the eyes of the people from him to Jesus, and this is the instinct of every man in whom God really dwells.

When we see a preacher looking round with evident disappointment upon a small audience, and seeking the first opportunity of telling what crowds have hung upon his lips elsewhere, it is evident that he believes that himself is some great one, and that he wants other people to believe it too. If few souls are brought to Christ, and in a spirit of self-justification he will tell of numbers having been saved through his instrumentality elsewhere, and he seeks to excuse his want of success by finding fault with the people or with the circumstances, it is clear that in his own eyes he is the great one on whom the success depends. And though in word he would ascribe it to God, yet in his own heart he believes that his services are not easily to be dispensed with. A man who lives and works in the power of God is conscious of God's power, but knows his own weakness and nothingness in such a way that he never feels able to speak or do anything else for God, but just simply trusts to the promise, "It shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak, for it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you" (Matt. 10 : 19, 20).

When Simon saw that all his followers were leaving him and that they believed in Jesus and were baptized, he believed also and was baptized. No doubt his conversion was just as real as any of the professed converts of our day whose whole soul and being have not been possessed by Jesus. But we never hear of Simon becoming active in winning other souls to Jesus, "he continued with Philip and wondered, beholding the miracles and signs which were done."

Tidings of this great work of God in Samaria reached Jerusalem, and the apostles sent down Peter and John, who on arriving found a deeper work of grace to be needful. True there was great joy, but in order to be useful there must be great grace and great power, so they prayed for them that they might receive the Holy Ghost. Some believers will argue themselves into a state of self-satisfaction that because "no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost" (1 Cor. 12 : 3), therefore they as believers are to be contented without that "power from on high" (Luke 24 : 49) which is the special promise of Christ to His Church. The converts in Samaria could not say that Jesus was the Lord but by the Holy Ghost, and yet when Peter and John came down, they found reason to pray that these new disciples might receive the Holy Ghost, and then they laid their hands on them and they received the Holy Ghost. Reader,

HAVE YOU RECEIVED THE HOLY GHOST?

Get away from the various and conflicting doctrines with which Satan is trying to throw dust in our eyes and frighten us away from the great and glorious reality, and ask yourself definitely and honestly if you have ever known anything in your experience which answers to the receiving of the Holy Ghost mentioned here. If not, seek this blessing as one which God is waiting to bestow upon every fully-surrendered soul.

This power of the Holy Ghost seems to have impressed Simon more than any of the miracles and signs which he had witnessed, thus showing that his conversion had gone far enough to give him a taste for spiritual things, but like many believers, self was his centre as much as it had been formerly, and it is sadly evident that he himself did not receive the Holy Ghost. Whether the apostles laid hands on him or not, we are not told, but if they did, and it is very probable that it was so, no laying on of hands could communicate the Holy Ghost to work under the dominion of a heart full of self. Where the Spirit of God comes, He comes to take control, and He can dwell only in a heart where self is renounced.

Simon saw an advantage for himself, a new opportunity, as he thought, to be again "some great one;" so he offered the apostles money, saying, "Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost." Poor unhappy man, the Spirit of God was all around him, in the disciples who had received Him; the atmosphere was so pure that every tainted breath must manifest itself, and the would-be apostle was shown up. "Thy money perish with thee," was

PETER'S INDIGNANT REPLY,

"because thou hast thought that the gift of God can be purchased with money." There are such as believe they can command the Holy Ghost, and by paying evangelists which are their own choice and not the choice of the Holy Ghost, that they can produce a work of God and get the credit for it. But no; the gift of God is not to be purchased with money; He may use us where He wills and for what He wills, but He is God, and He is not to be at man's disposal.

Peter continued, "Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter; for thy heart is not right in the sight of God." A man who believes, but who wants to make the Holy Ghost serve the purpose of his own ambition, has neither part nor lot in the Holy Ghost. "Repent therefore of this thy wickedness, and pray God if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee; for I perceive that thou art in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity." Poor wretched Simon, he had seen himself in his mind's eye "some great one," and now how small he must have felt. "Pray ye to the Lord for me," he replied. Simon had never lived in the conscious presence of God, and he believed in prayer rather than in God. He saw Philip's hand more than God's in the miracles which were done, Peter and John more than God in the giving of the Holy Ghost.

Many write to us at Bethshan as though the power to sanctify and to heal were with us, and cannot but meet with disappointment, because it is of the Lord to sanctify and heal; and they must themselves come empty to Him and not to us, if they would be blessed. Would that Simon's case were uncommon! We fear that in the present day many more Simons are to be found than Peters. Lord purify thy church. Amen.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

An Alarming Explosion Occurred on Thursday, March 15th, in one of the British Government Buildings near the Houses of Parliament. It was at first supposed to be due to an escape of gas, but an examination proved that it had been effected by dynamite or some similarly destructive agent, which there is reason to believe was placed near the building with malicious intent. The destruction of property will involve a loss of about $20,000, but happily no lives were sacrificed. The explosion was heard at a distance of two miles, and caused some alarm in the House of Commons where it shook the galleries and sent a vibration through the whole building. A newspaper correspondent, who visited the scene of the explosion, cables: "The neighborhood presents the appearance of a bombardment. The coping round the window balustrades in front of the office was hurled into the middle of the street, which runs on the south side of the building, where it lay a crumbling, powdered mass. The rooms adjoining the one in which the explosive was placed, was knocked to pieces and the furniture broken. The casements throughout the whole side of the block were blown out and the blinds and curtains torn to shreds. The damage in the surrounding locality is chiefly confined to broken windows, which completely litter the streets with fragments of glass. A stone weighing 200 pounds was projected against the police station in the next block, making a hole the size of a man's head. The excitement is intense." It is generally believed to have been the work of the Irish agitators who chose that way of expressing their resentment at a defeat Mr. Parnell recently suffered in Parliament. There is no direct evidence implicating Irishmen in the outrage, but the admissions made by O'Donovan Rossa, when interviewed in New York, tend to confirm the suspicion that the work was arranged by the managers of the skirmishing fund. The Government has offered a reward of $5000 for the apprehension of the perpetrators of the crime. An explosive machine with a lighted fuse attached was found on March 14th at the back of the office of the London Times.

A Brutal and Cowardly Attempt was Made on Saturday to Murder Lady Florence Dixie, the lady who has been engaged in relieving the distress of the poor in Ireland. She returned recently to her residence at Windsor, England, and published a statement that the funds intrusted to the Land League for distribution among the starving had never been applied to that purpose, and besides that the League had failed to account for a large sum of money missing from its treasury. On Saturday, as she was walking in the woods near her house, she was attacked by two men dressed in women's clothes who seized her by the throat and attempted to stab her. Happily the knives the miscreants used were turned aside by a broad steel corset-rib, and before they could make a second attempt, her St. Bernard dog came to her rescue and the cowards fled. Lady Dixie was only slightly wounded in the right breast, but her hands were badly cut in the struggle, and her clothing was pierced in several places. There is reason to fear that outrages so dastardly as this, will arouse indignation in England so fierce, that all hopes of further concession to Ireland will have to be abandoned.

The Preparations for the Coronation of the Czar of Russia are proceeding in spite of the warnings of the Nihilists that it will never be consummated. It is reported that the chief sovereigns and princes who were at Berlin during the celebration of the silver wedding of the Crown Prince and Crown Princess have agreed to be represented at the coronation of the Czar by ambassadors only. The arrangements made for the ceremony are of the most costly kind. The following is a description of the imperial garments ordered for the occasion: Two ermine lined purple coronation mantles have been ordered of the dealer in furs, of Moscow. These mantles are to be about seven yards in length, with an imperial eagle embroidered in gold on the back of each of them. The dress which is to be worn by the Empress on the coronation is being embroidered in the famous atelier of Loman, in Moscow. It will consist of finely woven silver cloth, all embroidered in silver, a garland of embroidery nearly a yard wide running around the bottom of the skirt and covering the train. The train alone, consisting almost entirely of silver, is to weigh more than twenty pounds.

The Irish Invincibles in Prison Charged with the murder conspiracy have been notified that their trial will be begun on April 9th. They will be tried on three counts, namely—the Phœnix Park murders, the attempted murder of Juror Field and conspiracy. Letters have been sent to James Carey, the informer, from all parts of the Kingdom, notifying him that there are plenty of men to take the places of those arrested. He is now not allowed to read the newspapers containing attacks upon him. It is stated that an important discovery has been made of cipher telegrams and letters to which the key has been obtained. These are expected to bring certain Irish-Americans within the operation of the extradition treaty.

The Resignation of M. Grèvy, the President of the French Republic, was reported last week, but was afterward semi-officially denied. The correspondent at Paris, of the London Times, speaking of the rumor, says the general political situation, the constant strides of radicalism, the chronic instability of Cabinets, the insults of reactionary organs and the threats made at anarchist meetings explain the desire of M. Grevy to resign the Presidency.

The French Movement, in Madagascar Becomes increasingly ominous. Advices from Tamatave, under date of February 26th, announced the arrival there of the French gunboat, Vaudreuil. The town had not yet been occupied, but four French men-of-war had arrived on the north-west coast of the island. The natives were excited, and were preparing to resist the French. There was no British war vessel present. A later despatch states that the people are determined, if the French make an attack upon them, to migrate to the interior. Fanatics are stirring up the people against the Christians.

The Emperor of Germany and the Crown Prince have promised to attend the Luther Celebration at Eisleben on the 10th of November next. The fourth centenary of the birth of the author of the Reformation, in the place where he was born and where he died, is to be observed with more than usual solemnity. Among other events by which the day is to be commemorated is the inauguration of a statue of Martin Luther, which his Majesty himself has promised to unveil. The interest of the announcement is enhanced by the news that the negotiations between Prussia and the Vatican have been broken off, although we must await confirmation of this intelligence before it can be accepted as correct, since it seems to be clear that the Pope is determined to close the breach with Germany with or without the approval of the Cardinals.

The Evangelistic Services of M. Pashkoff, the Russian Gospel preacher, have been interdicted by the Russian Government. The English papers state that the well-known converts of Lord Radstock, led by M. Pashkoff and other members of the aristocratic circles of St. Petersburg, will not be allowed to continue their Bible classes and prayer-meetings any longer this season. These evangelists have also been held up to ridicule in several organs of the press.

The False Prophet of the Soudan is Prosecuting the movement against the authority of the Khédive of Egypt. A correspondent of the New York Herald sends to that journal the following letter received from an officer in the Khédive's service: "The False Prophet has again stirred up matters in the Sennaar, which we believed to have been finally quieted. The Governor-General, Abd-el-Kader Pacha, has gone with all the troops that can be spared from the Kordofan expedition to try now for the fourth time to quell the Sennaar revolt. Our troops are thoroughly demoralized by the continued successes of the False Prophet, especially the surrender of the Egyptian garrison of Bara."

Important Discoveries in Egypt Recently made by M. Naville are described in a letter from Mr. Reginald S. Poole to an English journal. He states that the city discovered by M. Naville is the ancient Pithom built by the Israelites during their bondage in Egypt. Its identity with Succoth is proved by an inscription on a statue found in the sacred buildings now unearthed. Mr. Poole says: "The historical importance of Pithom is not limited to the identification with the strong city of Exod. 1:11. As Succoth, it fixes the site of the first encampment on the route of the exodus (Exod. 12:37; 13:20), the starting-point being Rameses, the sister town. Let us look for a moment at the consequences of this discovery. In the first place, we have found the very walls on which the enslaved Hebrews worked. We may reasonably hope soon to gain some positive evidence of the dates of the oppression and the exodus. Significant as is the determination of the site of any Bible city of remote age, the fixing of Succoth on the map is exceptionally important. It is the first step toward delineating the route of the exodus."

The Results of Temperance Agitation in England are becoming apparent in many localities. A recent issue of the London Gazette, the Government official organ, shows that hotel property in the large cities of England is rapidly depreciating in value. There were thirty liquor saloons within half a mile of Liverpool Custom House closed within the year, because they did not pay the cost of rent, taxes and license fees.

The Work of Revising the Old Testament is reported as approaching conclusion. The Dean of Peterborough, one of the English Company of Revisers, in a recent address, referring to the revision, said, there was a number of little questions cropping up which could not be decided at once, and were reserved for further consideration. One of these was, whether they were to render the sacred name of God in the Old Testament by "Jehovah" or "Lord." That question gave them a great deal of anxiety, and was not yet decided. Questions of that sort they were obliged to reserve, because if any alteration was made, the change, though it might be a desirable one, would be so great and important that they ought to be very careful to consider it, and not do it hastily by a bare majority. When they looked at the revision of the New Testament they would find that not only were there a great many changes in the translation, but they would find that many verses had disappeared altogether. They would not find it so in the Old Testament.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BINDER.

NUMEROUS applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case, in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding, at the end of the year. To meet this demand a stock of such covers has been prepared and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address in the United States on the receipt of one dollar. Applications should be made to THE MANAGER, 63 Bible House, New York.

The late LORD LAWRENCE, the Christian Ruler of India—Scenes in His Life.

THE LATE LORD LAWRENCE.

The Christian Governor-General of India.

His Birth in 1811, Family, and Education—Career in India from 1829 to 1849—Pursuit of a Robber—Swimming Across a River—Rescuing a Drowning Man—Perilous Encounter with a Bear—Administration Over the Punjaub from 1849 to 1863—Heroic Conduct During the Mutiny of 1857—Capture of Delhi—Christian Character and Beneficent Administration—Governor-General of India from 1863 to 1869—Illness and Death in 1879.

A RECENTLY published biography of Lord Lawrence has put the public in possession of information respecting his life and character which was until now unknown by all except his relatives and intimate friends. The incidents recorded show that Lord Lawrence was a man of eminent Christian character as well as a great statesman and administrator. An impression prevails, especially among young people, that a pious man is unfitted by his piety for active life in the world. The sooner such a notion is exploded the better, both for them and for the cause of Christ. The study of the life and character of such men as Lord Lawrence should convince any unprejudiced student that the notion is erroneous. Lord Lawrence was a shining example of a Christian man placed in circumstances of exceeding perplexity, difficulty, temptation and danger, maintaining his integrity and yet rendering brilliant service of inestimable value to his country. At the time of his death in 1879 THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published his portrait and life, but certain interesting facts not then accessible are now known, which render a fuller narrative possible.

The Right Hon. John Laird Mair, Baron Lawrence, late Viceroy and Governor-General of India, emphatically styled the savior of the Punjaub, was a brother of the late Sir Henry Lawrence, K.C.B., who fell heroically defending Lucknow during the mutiny of 1857. He was born in India on March 4th, 1811, and died in December, 1879, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. His family had long been connected with Indian affairs, and his father, Lieutenant-Colonel A. W. Lawrence, had won considerable reputation as an officer in the Mysore campaign and at the siege of Seringapatam in 1799.

The early education of the future Viceroy of India was conducted at Foyle College, Londonderry, Ireland, and completed at the East India College, at Haileybury, where he obtained many prizes. He was trained with a view to civil service under the East India Company, from whom he obtained his first appointment in 1829. He went out to India as a writer, and soon after his arrival he was nominated to the post of Assistant Commissioner and Resident at Delhi. In December, 1833, he was promoted to the situation of Officiating Magistrate and Collector at Delhi, and about twelve months afterward he was transferred to a similar appointment at Paniput, where he remained until 1836.

IN PURSUIT OF A ROBBER.

There was a notorious robber in the district of Paniput, whom John Lawrence was anxious to seize. The man had committed several murders, and one day Mr. Lawrence, receiving information that he was to sleep that night in a cottage not far distant, at once organized a party of horse and foot, and, without communicating his intention to any one, started about ten at night for the village. It was a fine moonlight night, and a few miles' ride brought them to a river, which they must cross. Lawrence had hoped to find boats on the spot, but they had been taken away to a neighboring fair, and only one small boat was left, which could be used only to carry the foot police across.

Time pressed. "We must swim it," said John Lawrence. His followers demurred; said there were quicksands; that the stream was too rapid, and that they would all be swept away. "Well, you cowards may do what you like, but I am going," said Lawrence, and in he plunged, and swam his horse out into mid-stream. The native officer, seeing this, took courage, said it was a shame to leave the Sahib to go forward alone, plunged in on horseback, and was followed by the others. The whole body was scattered. Some managed to ford over, some were thrown from their horses, and all was confusion.

RESCUING A DROWNING MAN.

Lawrence's horse was a powerful animal, and plunged so violently that his rider was thrown into the river, and with great difficulty reached the bank. There he found the horsemen all assembled, and said to them, "You see we are all safe, after all." "No," was the reply, "the russeldar is drowned." "What!" said Lawrence, "the bravest of the whole lot of you! Let us go in again, and see if we can save him." But none of them would stir; they looked on with that placid indifference with which Orientals often regard the fate of other people, and showed no intention of risking their own lives to save that of their comrade.

Once more John Lawrence plunged in on foot, and soon perceived the russeldar struggling at a short distance from the bank. He was under his horse, and though he managed to keep his head above water, he was evidently fast losing his strength and senses. Lawrence swam to him and supported him, though in doing so he received a severe kick from the struggling horse, till a rope was brought, and the drowning man was dragged to land. (Our picture to the left of the portrait, in the upper portion of the frontispiece, represents this episode.)

RETURN TO EUROPE, AND MARRIAGE.

Lawrence was employed during the following four years in various duties of a civil character which he discharged with conscientious care. He then proceeded to Europe on furlough in February, 1840, and was married, and did not return to India until December, 1842. The East India Company had discovered by that time that the young man was possessed of remarkable abilities and also that he was characterized by a quality which was even more valuable to them than that. He could be relied upon. He was conscientious, would not accept bribes, would not lie or prevaricate, and would not when separated from the society of white men commit any of those disgraceful acts with the natives which had in many cases brought reproach on the English name. He was as a consequence intrusted with commissions involving serious responsibilities, in which had he proved careless or faithless would have seriously endangered the Company's security. All of these commissions were faithfully executed and he received warm praise from his superior officers for his ability and integrity.

ENCOUNTER WITH A BEAR.

He was twice employed during 1846 and 1848 as acting resident at Lahore. In connection with this period, the following striking incident is narrated by his biographer. We give it in Lord Lawrence's own words: "In the year 1848 my brother Richard, my wife and children, went up into the hills to a place called Dhurmsala, near Kangra. There was first-rate bear-shooting to be had in the country round; so Richard, George, Christian, and I went off one day, accompanied by a number of attendants who were to beat the bushes and rout out the animals. It was not long before we discovered an enormous bear concealed in a cavern, but he was dislodged with difficulty. When at last he was forced to leave his lair, which he was ready enough to leave at night when he went out to prey on the cattle of the poor villagers, Bruin, goaded into fury, rushed out to attack his enemies. I fired the moment I got sight of him, but only succeeded in slightly wounding him. This made him more desperate. He rushed violently at me, and as I leaped back, my foot caught, and I rolled down the steep side of the hill among the thorns. In a moment the brute was upon me;

I FELT HIS HOT BREATH

upon my face, and thought it was all over with me. But my companions rushed to the rescue, and Bruin turned round, uncertain whom to attack. But before Richard could fire, he had singled out a tall, handsome Sepoy, had sprung upon him, and had torn his nose clean off his face. At this moment my brother fired, and again the bear was only wounded. Fortunately, I had reloaded, and soon put an end to his existence by lodging a ball in his brain." (The panel in the upper portion of the frontispiece, to the right of the portrait, illustrates this incident.)

In 1848 the district of the Punjaub fell into the hands of the British. The district was in the most deplorable state of misery owing to long years of native misgovernment and oppression. The first important step on the part of the Governor-General was to seek for men of administrative ability to bring the newly-acquired territory under British laws and rule.

ADMINISTRATOR OF THE PUNJAUB.

Sir H. Lawrence, who had filled the post of Resident at Lahore, and his brother, Mr. John Lawrence, the subject of this memoir, were nominated two out of three members of the Board for the administration of the Punjaub. The third member was Mr. Charles Grenvill Mansel. Some slight idea of the labors of this commission may be formed from the fact that the superficial area of the country is 50,400 square miles, and that it contains a population, partly military and partly agricultural, of various races and religious creeds, who all "hated every dynasty except their own, and regarded the British as the worst because the most powerful of usurpers." Under their former sovereign, Runjeet Singh, the administration was deplorable. There was scarcely a crime for which impunity could not be purchased by bribes; while the exactions of the provincial governors, who farmed the taxes, were unchecked. Such was the state of affairs when the British Government first interfered in the internal administration of the country.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE PROVINCE.

Much had been done by Sir H. Lawrence, when acting as Resident at Lahore, to ameliorate the condition of the people; but his endeavors were interrupted by the rebellion of 1848–49. The first labor undertaken by the Board appointed by Lord Dalhousie was to organize a comprehensive system of law and justice, and of social and financial improvement throughout the Punjaub. It was found necessary to disband the Sikh soldiery, though many of them afterward entered the British service, and an irregular force, consisting of ten regiments, was raised for the protection of the western frontier. In consequence of these measures, at the end of two years the Board was able to report to the Governor-General that "the entire British system and its institutions were thoroughly introduced into the Punjaub." One triumphant result of this consummation was shown in the fact that in the mutiny of 1857 that province remained faithful to British rule, and contributed largely to the preservation of the British power in India.

On the outbreak of

at Meerut, May 10th, 1857, his situation, like that of every Englishman in India, was one of extreme peril. A mere handful of men against their numerous enemies, they know not on whom they might rely. The native troops they had trained and armed and whose valor they had seen in the field, were eager to destroy them and put an end to British rule in India.

Sir John Lawrence in his position in the Punjaub, isolated and far from succor, with accounts continually pouring in of the bloody massacres of his countrymen, their wives and children, at Cawnpoor, at Lucknow, and at Delhi, might well consider his position critical in the extreme. His actions at the moment of peril were prompt, sagacious, and effective. Skilfully turning to account the natural configuration of his province, he isolated the Punjaubees from the mutineers by stopping all means of communication; he destroyed all the small, and placed efficient guards over all the large, ferries on the five rivers by which the Punjaub was reached from India, and despatched to the assistance of his countrymen at Delhi every soldier whose fidelity was assured. He thus left himself entirely at the mercy of the Sikhs, and voluntarily placed himself in the extremity of peril that he might having with something in the water. Quickly giving the order, the boat was pulled alongside the bird, and to the surprise of all, they saw their shipmate whom they had given up as lost, holding on firmly to its legs. In less than a minute he was safe in the boat. God has servants and ministers everywhere; He is the Lord of hosts, and angels, ravens, beasts of prey, the stars of heaven, and the very elements of air, water, and fire are prepared to do His bidding. How blessed are they who have in the God of all things a Friend and Father through His Son Jesus Christ!"

GOD'S PURPOSES CONCERNING ISRAEL.

By Rev. W. J. Adams, D.C.L.

THE God of Israel foresaw the rejection of His Son, and He has a purpose concerning Israel which even this their wicked act could not set aside. The promises referred to are included in the covenant made with Abraham, wherein the land was unconditionally given for an everlasting possession, and the people taken into perpetual covenant. Obedience, however to the conditional covenant of Sinai, was made the condition of uninterrupted possession of the land. The covenant of Sinai having been broken, the continued possession of the land has been interrupted. Nevertheless, the unconditional promises made four hundred and thirty years before, have not been annulled.

NOT TRANSFERRED TO GENTILES.

Neither have they been transferred to the Gentile Church in consequence of the rejection of Christ, who came to "confirm the promises made unto the fathers." These promises comprehend the following distinct particulars: (1) That Abraham's seed should become a great nation, and that in him should all the families of the earth be blessed (Gen. 12 : 2, 3); (2) that he and his seed should possess the land of Canaan for an everlasting inheritance (17 : 7, 8); (3) the extent of the land is specified (15 : 18)—viz., "from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates"; (4) the covenant was to be an everlasting covenant (17 : 8).

The important question is, whether the rejection of the Messiah has destroyed the perpetuity and universality of which God thus made with Abraham. We maintain that it did not. And our reasons for this conclusion are:

1. That the covenant with Abraham was absolute and unconditional.

There is in it nothing conditional, indefinite, or uncertain. We know that the promise to Abraham of a seed included the Saviour. And was His coming conditional? Yet is there no distinction made between this and the other parts of the covenant. The sinfulness of the world did not prevent the promised advent of the Saviour; so neither will the sinfulness of the Jew frustrate or disannul the promises made to the fathers, or affect the covenant made with Abraham.

2. We are told that "the gifts and calling of God are without repentance."

There can be no doubt that it is the call of Abraham that is here referred to; and that "the gifts" spoken of are nationality and the land. Has, then, God "repented" that He called Abraham to "a land which he should after receive for an inheritance"? Having repeated the promise to Isaac and Jacob, and actually bestowed it upon their descendants by a deed of gift, defining with the greatest exactness the extent of the land and the privileges connected with it—has He changed His mind upon the subject? Has He repented of His gifts? The words under consideration distinctly inform us that He has not.

THE PERIOD OF DESOLATION.

3. Our Lord Himself limits the period of Israel's dispersion and the desolation of the land.

He predicts the destruction of the Temple and of Jerusalem being compassed with armies, and declares that these are a sign, that its desolation is nigh at hand, and that the days of vengeance had come, and then adds, "And they shall fall by the edge of the sword and shall be led away captive into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." (Luke 21.) There is, therefore, a defined period during which Jerusalem is to be "trodden down," and at the close of which it shall be trodden down no more.

4. Let me now refer to the song of Zacharias, of whom it is written (Luke 1 : 67) that, "He was filled with the Holy Ghost and prophesied, saying, 'Blessed be the Lord God of Israel; for He hath visited and redeemed His people, and hath raised up an horn of salvation for us in the house of His servant David; as He spake by the mouth of His holy prophets, which have been since the world began; that we should be saved from our enemies and from the hand of all that hate us; to perform (not disannul) the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember His holy covenant; the oath which He sware to our father Abraham.'" This passage puts it beyond a doubt that the expectations respecting the coming Messiah and His great salvation are intimately connected with and by no means antagonistic to the covenant made with Abraham. How can we in view of this passage maintain that the covenant of the Gospel disannuls the covenanted promise made with Abraham?

RAISING UP THE RUINS.

The words in Acts 15 : 15, 16, the building up of the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down, and closing up the breaches thereof—the "raising up the ruins and building it as in the days of old," can only be fairly understood according to the letter of the prediction; for the prophesies foretelling the "falling down" and the overthrow were fulfilled literally; and being built "as in the days of old," cannot possibly be understood in a spiritual sense. The language of this text is very exact and clear. "After this"—we naturally ask, "after what?" and the answer can only be, "After I have gathered out, from among all nations, a people for My name (an expression equivalent to the 'fulness of the Gentiles,') then I will return." Return to whom? to where? Surely to the people and the place which He had forsaken and left. His departure was literal, and the angel distinctly announced that the Lord would "so come in like manner as they had seen Him go into heaven." After then the elect remnant have been gathered in from among the Jews, and the church through the preaching of the Gospel, has been gathered out from among the Gentiles, then the Lord will and His land, and will remember His promise to Abraham and the oath that He sware unto David, and will "build again the tabernacle of David that is fallen down and heal up the breaches thereof." And that for a mighty and a world-wide purpose, namely, "That the residue of men may seek after the Lord and all the Gentiles upon whom My name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things."

In the Epistle to the Hebrews (chap. 11) we are twice told that those whose faith is there recorded for our example "did not obtain the promises." "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims in the earth (that is in the Land of Promise). Now this passage is of itself abundantly sufficient to prove the truth we have in hand, and also to show that the "fathers" have never inherited the promised land, but died in the firm and unalterable persuasion that they and their posterity would one day inherit it.

Finally. We are told that, "Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers." Now with regard to this important passage, I would remark, that if it should still be insisted that "the promises made to the fathers" were conditional upon their obedience to the law of God, we must remember that Jesus Christ, being a lineal descendant of Abraham according to the flesh, rendered that obedience which the conditions required, and hence the condition (if any) annexed to the promises, having been performed by Him, the promises will be made good to all the seed, to vindicate "the truth of God," and to manifest His faithfulness to the long-slumbering promises.

We cannot doubt, then, that the spiritual blessings promised to all believers under the Gospel, leave entirely untouched the temporal blessings made over by a sure and inviolate covenant forever to Abraham and his natural seed.

I have endeavored to show from the sure Word of God that there is mercy in store for the Jewish people. In their restoration will be realized the description of the father in the parable, receiving and welcoming his long-lost son. "Israel," said God, "is my son, my first-born." And in the day when the glorious promises shall be fulfilled, He will say of them, "This My son was dead and is alive again, was lost and is found." The nations of the earth are called upon to express their delight in this glad event, "Be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create; for behold I create Jerusalem a rejoicing and her people a joy." "Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken, neither shalt thy land any more be termed Desolate; but thou shalt be called Hephzibah and thy land Beulah; for the Lord delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married."

GENTILE INDIFFERENCE.

In view of all this, can it be that any intelligent Christian withholds his interest from the Jewish people? Have such no sympathy with God in His purposes concerning Israel? Surely it is a reproach to the Christian Church to have shown such indifference to the Jews. The angels of God, although higher in rank and wisdom and power than we, yet take a profound interest in the welfare of mankind; how much more should we feel concerned for the human family of which we are ourselves a part, and for that branch of it through whom we have received all our spiritual blessings?

In conclusion. Am I addressing any of the house of Israel, who fail to see in Him whom we delight to honor, the promised glory of their nation? I would say to them, "Begin this fresh era of time by a solemn resolution in prayer and earnest study of God's Word, to so come to some settled conclusion respecting the question at issue between

JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY."

"Is there not a cause?" "Is it not your life?" Let me call your attention to one beautiful prophecy of the Messiah. I refer to Isaiah 11 : 6: "A little child shall lead them." True indeed it is that the circumstances under which that remarkable prediction are to receive their full accomplishment, are not those which we see around us now. For it is a state of unbroken tranquillity and harmony among men of which that chapter speaks; a period of peace extending even to the brute creation; the wolf is seen dwelling with the lamb; the leopard lying down with the kid; and the young lion and the fatling resting harmoniously side by side. Still, I say, have we not seen a partial fulfilment?

The great and prominent peculiarity of the influence of the Gospel of Jesus Christ is, that it is the Gospel of peace and love. Even amid the grievously disordered state of things around us, Christianity may fairly claim to have been the pacificator of the world. The "Little Child" has led more powerfully, and with greater internal energy the souls of men, than any legislator or ruler the world has ever seen. Oh, that He might become your Leader and Guide! He was confessedly the wisest and the best of men. When He dwelt among us, did not His influence and teaching make for righteousness and against iniquity? And since He ascended up on high, what is that power in the world which beyond all others is making for what is holy and just and good, but His power who said, "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Estimated Receipts of the Government are thus stated in a return recently prepared at the Treasury Department. The total estimated receipts of the government for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1883, under the operations of the new Tariff act, are $405,000,000. Of this amount $220,000,000 is the estimated revenue from customs; $143,500,000 from internal revenue, and $41,500,000 from miscellaneous sources. The revenues for the fiscal year ended June 30th, 1882, were as follows: From customs, $220,410,000; from internal revenue, $146,497,000; from miscellaneous sources, 36,618,000; total $403,525,000.

A Violation of the Principles Which the People, by their vote, have insisted shall govern the policy of Civil Service appointments caused general comment last week. Judge Wallace, a United States Circuit Judge in the State of New York, sent a letter to Mr. Bright, the clerk of his court, intimating that there must be a change in the clerkship. The extraordinary feature of the affair is that in acquainting Mr. Bright with the fact, the judge frankly said he was entirely satisfied with Mr. Bright's performance of his duties, but was so situated that he had no choice in the matter. The question asked by the public is, how it is that the judge should be in such a position that he has no choice in such a matter, and there are many speculations as to the source from which dictation comes of so imperative a character as to coerce a United States Judge in his own court.

The Manner in Which the Alabama Award is being distributed occasions regret among the friends of peace all over the world. It was hoped that when the two nations, the greatest on earth, the United States and England, agreed to submit their differences to arbitration an example was set that other nations might be induced to follow instead of resorting to war. The result, however, tends to the discouragement of the hope. The United States are now distributing the balance of the award among claimants whose claims were expressly rejected by the arbitrators. The government has an unquestioned right to give it to whomsoever it will, so far as England is concerned. But as a Christian nation, whose acts are known all over the civilized world, there is something more at stake than legal right. That is the influence of example. The money was awarded on the distinct understanding that it would be applied to the compensation of certain specified sufferers, and that other specified sufferers had no claims on a share of the award. Notwithstanding this clearly defined judgment, the government is now applying the money to the payment of the latter class, for whom it was not intended. The most serious aspect of the case is that this lack of high moral principle on the part of the successful litigant in the arbitration proceedings may deter other nations from appealing to the same remedy in international difficulty.

An Exposure of a Peculiarly Humiliating kind was made last week in connection with the receiverships of insolvent companies. In all countries the winding up of these huge estates has been accompanied by glaring irregularities, but the exposures of late years place the United States on a bad eminence in this matter. It appears that the investigation ordered by the Albany Legislature has disclosed the fact that the dividends paid out of the assets of eighteen insolvent insurance companies, investigated by the committee, amounted to $2,206,530, and the expenses of the eighteen receiverships to $1,754,072, or nearly ninety cents of "expense" to every dollar of "dividend." About two-fifths of the expenses were for lawyers' fees. The precise sum they absorbed was $737,101. The precise sum absorbed by the receivers themselves for their own fees and "miscellaneous" expenses was $1,016,971. In one case the proportion of expense to dividend was $17.44 to every dollar.

The Fund Raised on Behalf of the Sufferers by the floods by the New York Herald was closed on Saturday, March 24th. It amounted to $51,716.67. The distribution of the fund was carried on last week, and the grateful reception of money and supplies in the various cities visited proved how pressing was the need for the gifts of the benevolent. The great amount of suffering was in towns too small and localities too sparsely settled to receive much mention in news despatches. At the close of last week $32,100 of the relief fund had been expended, chiefly in helping homeless people to rebuild their houses and in furnishing those absolutely destitute with food and clothing. In some cases $1000 was placed in the hands of local committees for distribution, while in others the sufferers were relieved directly by the representative of the great metropolitan journal.

The Hon. Timothy O. Howe, the Postmaster-General, died suddenly on Sunday last. He was visiting his nephew at Kenosha, Wis., when he suffered a relapse in an attack of pneumonia, from which it was hoped he had recovered. Though sixty-seven years of age, Judge Howe was very active and energetic, and enjoyed moderately good health until a few days ago. It appears that he was troubled with a slight asthmatic affection for several years, but it was not regarded as dangerous. When, however, he contracted a severe cold during the recent severe weather his chronic trouble prevented his rallying. Judge Howe was a native of Livermore, Me., but removed to Wisconsin in 1846. He was elected Judge of the Circuit and Supreme Court of that State in 1855. In 1861 he was chosen United States Senator, and served in that capacity eighteen years.

The Remains of the Poet, John Howard Payne, who wrote "Home, Sweet Home," were brought to his native land on Thursday, March 22d, from Tunis, in Africa, where he died thirty years ago. The deceased poet's friend, Mr. W. W. Corcoran, oppressed by the thought that the author of the sweet poem, sung wherever the English language is spoken, was buried among strangers in a foreign land, resolved to make an effort to bring his bod-- home. The consent of the State Department was obtained, and the help of the British Consul at Tunis, and on the 5th of this month the poet's grave was opened and the remains exhumed. They consisted of a blackened skeleton, some shreds of cloth, and the brass buttons of the consular uniform in which he was buried. The dust was recommitted to a leaden coffin, this was encased in one of wood, and that surrounded by a stout box. This casket having been taken to Marseilles, was then shipped on board the steamship Burgundia, of the Fabre Line, which reached Quarantine at noon on Thursday. The remains, after lying in state in the City Hall of New York, were taken to Washington for interment.

One Hundred Dollars Have Been Placed at the disposal of the manager of The Christian Herald for the purpose of sending the paper to colored Baptist ministers, whose incomes are too small to allow of their obtaining a supply of good religious literature. A few names are still required to complete the list. If any of our Southern subscribers are acquainted with any ministers of the class named, they will confer a favor by sending them to the office of this journal. The donor of the money, who resides in Iowa, thus writes respecting his offer: "I am so well pleased with your paper that I enclose draft for $100 for which I would like to have The Christian Herald sent to colored Baptist ministers of Christ in the Southern States; especially to such who are unable to subscribe for it." There are many ministers laboring for the Master in the South to whom the privilege of reading the sermons, etc., published in these pages every week would be of great service.

A Remarkable Revival is Reported from Carthage, Mo. It commenced with the week of prayer and has increased in depth and earnestness every week since that time. Some remarkable experiences were related in the meetings, and the work has extended to homes where no religious influence had been felt for years. The pastors sent to the Rev. Mr. James, an evangelist laboring in Texas, a unanimous invitation to come to their assistance. He accepted and commenced meetings in the Opera House, which afforded larger seating capacity than any church in the city, and convenient inquiry rooms. The second week the Opera House was engaged by a theatrical company, but after a night or two of almost empty seats, they left, and the meetings were continued there. Large numbers have made a confession of Christ, and have united with the various evangelical churches of the city.

The Florence Night Mission is a New Society organized in New York last week to conduct mission work in New York City after nightfall of each day in the year. Its object is to labor for Christ by means of meetings held late at night, by tract distribution, and by personal conversation with individuals whose occupation or habits lead to their turning day into night and night into day. A missionary, in the employ of the association, is already at work. His hours of labor are from 9 P.M. to 5 A.M. For almost two years past he has been laboring, upon his own responsibility, among the most abandoned classes of the community, and his success warrants the expectation of large results for the future. A building has been secured in which prayer-meetings are to be held nightly.

Meetings in Aid of the McAll Paris Mission were held in Washington, D. C., last week. A large meeting was held on Monday in the Congregational Church to further the objects of the cause. Much interest was manifested. The friends of the mission propose to give the American support a more systematic character, and for this purpose favor a national organization which shall have the work in charge. One scheme proposed is to have a president and an executive committee of twelve, of whom eight shall be residents of Philadelphia and the others representatives of Washington, Brooklyn, Syracuse, and other cities which take especial interest in the work.

A Dog Saved a Child's Life in a Remarkably intelligent manner at Newburg, N. Y., on March 15th. A lady residing in that city having occasion to go downstairs from her nursery left her baby eighteen months old on the floor playing with its toys and a dog that is its constant companion. The mother was away just three minutes, but when she came back and opened the door her infant's head, arms, and shoulders were hanging beyond the stone sill of an open window, and near it, with its feet on a chair stood the dog holding on to the child's dress for dear life. Her child, unconscious of any danger, was crowing at some object in the yard, while the dog, holding on the dress, looked a mute appeal for haste and help. In an instant she was by her baby's side and the danger was passed. When the dog had been relieved of his burden he pranced around the mother and child with a delight that was almost frantic. How many people witness with equanimity other people imperilling their eternal life yet make no effort to save them. When an appeal is made to them they reply that they are powerless to save men bent on their own destruction. They forget that as the dog could not save the child, but could hold it until some one came who could save it, so they may restrain the sinner until One who is mighty to save comes to the rescue (1 Sam. 12 : 23).

The Pleasant Astonishment of a Dying Child is pathetically described by Mrs. Helen Williams in a Chicago journal. "Not long ago," she says, "I stood by the death-bed of a little girl. Every fibre of her body and soul recoiled from the thought of death. 'Don't let me die,' she said; 'don't let me die. Hold me fast. Oh, I can't go.' 'Jenny,' I said, 'you have two little brothers in the other world, and there are thousands of tender-hearted people over there who will love you and take care of you.' But she cried out again despairingly, 'Don't let me go, they are strangers over there.' But even as she was pleading her little hands relaxed their clinging hold from my waist, and lifted themselves eagerly aloft. Her face was turned upward; but it was her eyes that told the story. They were filled with the light of Divine recognition. They saw something plainly that we could not see; and they grew brighter and brighter. 'Mamma,' she said, 'mamma, they are not strangers. I'm not afraid.' Her form relapsed among the pillows and she was gone." As the recognition of familiar faces dissipated the child's fear, so may the Christian expect that the pains of dissolution will be forgotten in the sight of Him whom his soul loves and with whom he has been in daily communion from the hour of his conversion (Isa. 33 : 17-24).

A Mother and Her Daughter Searching for each other in Pennsylvania appear to have had a most extraordinary experience. It seems that on February 24th a woman in the Berks County Almshouse, who was about thirty-five years of age, insisted on leaving the institution for the day to search for her mother, who she said resided at Kutztown, and whom she not not seen for more than twenty years. Her wish was opposed by the officials, and the woman made a grievance of it and talked volubly about it to the other inmates. They sympathized with her, and one old woman urged her to go in defiance of the officials. The woman followed her aged friend's advice, and went to Kutztown. While she was away the old woman died suddenly. At Kutztown the other woman's inquiries elicited the information that her mother had left there many years before, and that after living in many other places, she was last heard of in the Berks County Almshouse. She returned immediately and made inquiries there. It was then found that the old woman who had urged the journey in the morning, and who had died in the interval was the mother in question. The old woman had searched vainly for her daughter, and it was partly through her fellow-feeling engendered by her trouble that the younger woman's distress so affected her. It is remarkable that the old woman should not have recognized her own daughter, but the changes of twenty years and her own dim eyesight in part account for it. We may be thankful that when the prodigal sons of God seek Him, He knows them and is ready to receive them, though they often wander vainly in wrong paths in the search (Rom. 10 : 6-8).

A New Electric Device Has Been Invented to defeat the people who tap the wires. It appears that cunning schemers who are desirous of obtaining valuable information on Stock Exchange business have succeeded in reading messages and listening to conversations between speculators and their agents as they pass along the wires. The new system is to have two wires connected at their termini and the words, by means of a rapidly revolving electric motor are separated; part going by one wire and part of them by the other. The receiver hears or reads the words as they are spoken, but an operator between the two termini who tries to learn from either wire what is passing can only discover one half of the communication and that in an incomprehensible form. When unbelievers in their efforts to prove that there is no God point to the afflictions of good men as evidence that the Christian's faith in providence is without foundation, it often happens that they have misunderstood a message which the afflicted man has clearly understood as coming not by chance nor caprice, but from his Father who chastens those whom He loves (Job 33 : 29, 30).

A Prisoner Received Terrible Injuries in an attempt to escape from the jail of Easton, Penn., on March 20th. He succeeded in forcing his naked body through the small aperture in his cell that served as a window. His cell was just under the roof, to which he climbed and donned his clothing. He then walked to the front of the jail, and tying his blanket to a turret began to descend. The ground was fifty feet below, the blanket was a small one, and the prisoner expected to drop the remaining distance. After he had descended a few feet the blanket gave way and he fell forty feet, striking on a flagstone pavement. He was so badly injured that he was glad to be recaptured and removed to the infirmary where his injuries received surgical treatment. The man's plight is now most miserable, for when he recovers he will still be a prisoner and have to serve out his sentence. When the sinner escapes through the merits of Jesus from the chains of Satan his deliverance is complete. He is saved from punishment and from the power of his oppressor, and the wounds of sin are healed (Psa. 103 : 3, 4).

A Cat's Devotion to Her Boy Playmate is narrated by a writer in a Boston journal. It appears that a beautiful cat was reared by a family in which was a boy between whom and the cat a warm friendship existed. The child was taken sick, and during his illness the cat refused, even when tempted with food, to leave the bedside of the sufferer. The child died, and then the cat's piteous cries necessitated her being removed and shut up in another room. After the funeral the cat was released and immediately went to the chamber in which the boy died. Not finding him there she went moaning about for some time, and at length was missed for several days. One day she returned to the house in an emaciated condition in search of food, and afterward she regularly appeared once a day and was fed. No one knew where she was the rest of the time, till one day she was followed to the burial-ground, and found by the grave of her favorite. So great was the attachment of the cat to her deceased little friend, that for five years—that is, until the removal of the parents to another neighborhood—there was every reason to believe that, excepting in the greatest severity of winter, she went out and passed every day close by the grave. Such devotion in an animal excites our sympathy and respect for the qualities displayed. We expect, however, in bereaved parents and friends a more intelligent recognition of the true meaning of death. It is only the tabernacle of the loved one that we lay in the grave (2 Sam. 12 : 23).

IT was a singular spectacle to see the King of Moab and his lords climbing to the tops of the craggy rocks, accompanied by that strange being, the Eastern prophet Balaam. They are seeking to look upon Israel with the evil eye, and flash down curses upon her tents in the plain beneath. You see them gazing down from the mountains upon the encampment in the wilderness below, even as vultures from aloft spy out their prey. They watch with keen and cruel eyes. Cunning and malice are in their countenances. How Balak longs to crush the nation which he fears! They are secretly endeavoring by spell and enchantment to bring evil upon the people whom Jehovah has chosen and led into the wilderness. You see them offering their seven bullocks and their seven rams upon the seven altars which they have set up upon Pisgah's rocks; and Balaam retires to wait until the afflatus shall come upon him, and he shall be able to prophesy.

In all probability Moses knew nothing about this at the time; and certainly the people below knew nothing of the foul conspiracy. There lay the tribes in the valley, unaware that mischief was brewing, and quite unable to meet the dark design even if they had been aware of it. What a mercy it was for them that they were guarded by a Watcher, and a holy One, whose eyes can never slumber. How true it is—"I the Lord do keep it; I will water it every moment: lest any hurt it, I will keep it night and day." The Lord's eyes are fixed upon and Balak the son of Zippor; in vain do they weave the enchantment and work the divination; they shall be utterly ashamed and confounded. They were baffled in their machinations, and utterly defeated in their schemes, and that for one single reason; it is written, "JEHOVAH SHAMMAH"—the Lord is there. God's presence in the midst of His people is as a wall of fire round about them, and a glory in their midst. The Lord is their light and their salvation, whom shall they fear?

At this present time God has a people, a remnant according to the election of grace, who still dwell like sheep in the midst of wolves. When, as a part of the Lord's church, we look at our surroundings, we see much that might cause us alarm; for never, either day or night, is Satan quiet. Like a roaring lion he goeth about, seeking whom he may devour; he plots in secret his crafty devices; if it were possible he would deceive even the very elect. This prince of darkness has on earth many most diligent servants, compassing sea and land to make proselytes, laying out all their strength, and using all their craft and cunning if by any means they may destroy the kingdom of God, and blot out the truth from under heaven. It is saddest of all to see certain men who know the truth in some degree, as Balaam did, entering into league with the adversary against the true Israel. These combine their arts, and use all possible means that the Gospel of the grace of God, and the church that holds it, may utterly be destroyed. If the church be not destroyed it will be no thanks to her enemies, for they would swallow her up quick.

When we look upon the signs of the times our heart grows heavy; for iniquity abounds, the love of many waxes cold, many false spirits have gone abroad into the earth, and some whom we looked upon as helpers are proving themselves to be of another order. What then? Are we dismayed? By no means, for that same God who was in the midst of the church in the wilderness is in the church of these last days. Again shall her adversaries be defeated. Still will He defend her, for the Lord has built His church upon a rock, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against her. Our text declares the grand safeguard of the church of God, insuring her against every peril known and unknown, earthly or Satanic: "Jehovah his God is with him, and the shout of a king is among them."

May the Holy Spirit help me while I try to speak first upon God's presence with His people; secondly, upon the results of that presence; and, thirdly, upon how, by the grace of God, that presence may be preserved continually among us.

I. First, let me speak a little upon among His people. It is an extraordinary presence, for God's ordinary and usual presence is everywhere. Whither shall we flee from His presence? He is in the highest heaven and in the lowest hell; the hand of the Lord is upon the high hills, and His power is in all deep places. This knowledge is too high and wonderful for us; yet everywhere is God, for in Him we live and move and have our being. Still there is a peculiar presence; for God was among His people in the wilderness as He was not among the Moabites and the Edomites their foes, and God is in His church as He is not in the world. It is a peculiar promise of the covenant that God will dwell with His people and walk among them. By the gift of the Holy Spirit the Lord is with us and in us at this hour. He saith of His church, "Here will I dwell, for I have desired it." This is much more than God's being about us; it includes the favor of God toward us, His consideration of us, His working with us. An active nearness to bless is the presence of which we speak.

Here we may say with great reverence that God is with His people in the entireness of His nature. The Father is with us, for the Father Himself loveth us. We have also the presence of the divine Son of God. Said He not to His apostles, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world"? Have we not this for our joy whenever we come together, that we meet in His name, and that He still says, "Peace be unto you," and manifests Himself unto us as He doth not unto the world. Peculiarly this presence relates to the Holy Ghost. It is He who represents the Lord Jesus who has gone from us. Yes, dear friends, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are in the midst of the true church of God, when that church is in a right and healthy state; and if the triune God be gone away from the church, then her banners must trail in the dust, for her warriors have lost their strength. This is the glory of the church of God—to have the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God the Father, and the communion of the Holy Ghost to be her never-failing benediction. What a glory to have Father, Son, and Holy Spirit manifesting the Godhead in the midst of our assemblies, and blessing each one of us.

For God to dwell with us: what a condescending presence this is! And will God in very truth dwell among men? If the heaven of heavens cannot contain Him, will He abide among His people? He will! He will! Glory be to His name! "Know ye now that your bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost?" God dwelleth in us. Wonderful word! Who can fathom the depth of this grace?

What an awe this imparts to every true church of God! You may go in and out of certain assemblies, and you may say, "Here we have beauty! here we have adornment, musical, ecclesiastical, architectural, oratorical, and the like!" but to my mind there is no worship like that which proceeds from a man when he feels—the Lord is here. What a hush comes over the soul! Here is the place for the bated breath, the unsandalled foot, and the prostrate spirit.

Brethren, this presence of God is clearly discerned by the gracious, though others may not know it. Yet methinks even the ungracious in a measure perceive it, coming into the assembly they are struck with a secret something, they know not what; and if they do not immediately join in the worship of the present God, yet a deep impression is made upon them beyond any that could be caused by the sound of human speech, or by the grandeur of outward show. They feel awed, and retire abashed. Certainly

THE DEVIL KNOWS WHERE GOD IS

—none better than he. He hates the camp of which Jehovah is the leader; against it he doubles his enmity, multiplies his plots, and exercises all his power. He knows where his kingdom finds its bravest assailants, and he therefore attacks their headquarters, even as did Balaam and Balak of old.

Let us look at Balaam for a moment. May we never run in the way of Balaam for a reward; but let us stand in his way for a moment that he may be our beacon. This man had sold himself for gold, and though he knew God and spoke under inspiration, yet he knew Him not in his heart, but was willing to curse God's people for hire. He was thwarted in his design because God was there.

Balaam perceived that the God who was in the midst of His people is not a changeable God, not a false God, not one who promises and forgets, or promises and eats His words, or promises what He cannot and will not perform. The God of Israel is faithful and true, immutable, unchanging; every one of His promises shall be fulfilled; none of His words shall fall to the ground. "Hath He said, and shall He not do it? hath He spoken and shall it not come to pass?" What a joy it is to have such a God as this among us—a promise-making and a promise-keeping God; a God at work for His people, as He has declared He would be; a God comforting and cheering His people, and fulfilling in their experience that which His Word had led them to expect. This God is our God forever and ever; He shall be our guide even unto death.

My dear friends, we sometimes hear men talk of

THE FAILURE OF THE CHURCH.

We are afraid that some churches do fail. Wherever failure occurs, the bottom of it is the absence of the Lord of hosts, for He cannot fail. I heard one, speaking of the district in which he lives, say, "We are a religious people; almost all the people attend a place of worship, but," he added, "I am bound to add that of spiritual life we have few traces. One church has given up its prayer-meetings; another feels that its entertainments are more important than its worship, and another is notorious for worldliness." This is a testimony as terrible as it is common.

The worst thing that can be said of any Christian community is this: "Thou hast a name to live and art dead." "Thou art neither cold nor hot." Our Lord Jesus says, "I would thou wert cold or hot. So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth." A church without life and zeal makes Christ sick; He cannot bear it. He can put up with downright godlessness sooner than with a profession of religion out of which the life and the power are gone, since it has cooled down into lukewarmness. This, then, we should pray for continually—the presence of God in the midst of His people.

II. To whet your desire for this let me pass on to the second head of my subject, which is briefly to describe

THE RESULTS OF THIS PRESENCE.

Some of these results are mentioned in the context. One of the first is leading—"God brought them out of Egypt" (verse 22). The best critics give us another rendering; "God is bringing them out of Egypt." When God is in the midst of His people He is leading them, so that we may cheerfully sing that song, "He leadeth me; He leadeth me," and go on with David to word it, "He leadeth me beside the still waters." We want no other leader in the church when we have God; for His eye and arm will guide His people. I am always afraid of having human rules in a church, and equally fearful of being governed by human precedents. I am afraid of power being vested in one, or two, or twenty men; the power must be in the Lord Himself. That church which has God in the midst of it rules itself, and goes right without any other guidance but that which comes of the Holy Spirit's working. Such a church keeps together without aiming at uniformity, and goes on to victory even though it makes no noise. That movement is right which is led by God, and that is sure to be all wrong which is led in the best possible way if God be absent.

Organization is all very well, but I sometimes feel inclined to join with Zwingle in the battle when he said, "In the name of the holy Trinity let all loose;" for when everybody is free, if God be present everybody is bound to do the right. When each man moves according to the divine instinct in him there will be little need of regulations; all is

ORDER WHERE GOD RULES.

Just as the atoms of matter obey the power of God, so do separate believers obey the one great impelling influence. Oh, for God to be in the church to lead it; and it shall be rightly guided.

The next blessing is strength. "He hath as it were the strength of an unicorn" (ver. 22). It is generally agreed that the creature here meant is an extinct species of urus or ox, most nearly represented by the buffalo of the present period. This gives us the sentence, "He hath as it were the strength of a buffalo." When God is in a church, what rugged strength, what massive force, what irresistible energy is sure to be there! And how untamable is the living force! You cannot yoke this buffalo to everybody's plough; it has its own free way of living, and it acts after its own style. When the Lord is with a church her power is not in numbers, though very speedily she will increase; her power is not wealth, though God will take care that the money comes when it is needed; her power lies in God, and that power becomes irresistible, untamable, unconquerable.

The next result is safety. "Surely there is no enchantment against Jacob, neither is there any divination against Israel." The presence of God quietly baffles all the attempts of the evil one. I have noticed, dear brethren, in this church, where we have had God's presence in a great measure, that all around us people have gone off to this opinion and to the other fancy, yet our members as a rule have stood firm. Persons say to me, "Do you not sometimes answer the scepticisms of the day?" I answer, No. They do not come in my way. "Do not modern opinions trouble your church?" They have not done so. Why? because God is there, and spiritual life in vigorous exercise does not fall a victim to disease.

Upon these words "there is no enchantment against Jacob, no divination against Israel," suffer a few sentences. There are still a few in the world who believe in witchcraft and spells, but ye, beloved, if you love the Lord, throw such nonsense to the winds. Do you not hear people talk about this being lucky and that unlucky? This notion is heathenish and unChristian. Never utter such nonsense. But even if there were such things as witchcraft and divination, if this house were full of devils and the air swarmed with invisible sprites of an evil sort, yet if we be the people of God, surely there is no enchantment against us. Divination cannot touch a child of God; the evil one is chained. Wherefore be of good courage; if God be for us, who can be against us?

When God is with His people He will give them power of a destructive kind. Do not be frightened. Here is the text for it: "Behold, the people shall rise up as a great lion, and lift up himself as a young lion"—that is, as a lion in the fulness of his vigor—" he shall not lie down until he eat of the prey, and drink the blood of the slain." God has put into His church, when He is in it, a most wonderful destructive power as against spiritual wickedness.

A healthy church kills error, and tears in pieces evil. She lives in conflict and victory; her mission is to destroy everything that is bad in the land. See how it devours men! Earnest friends have been laboring against it, and they have done something for which we are grateful, but if ever intemperance is put down, it will be when the entire church of God shall arouse herself to protest against it. When the strong lion rises up the giant of drunkenness shall fall before him. " He shall not lie down until he eat of the prey, and drink the blood of the slain." I augur for the world the best results from a fully aroused church. If God be in her there is no evil which she cannot overcome.

But now notice one thing in my text, and with that I close this description. Where God is, we are told, "The shout of a king is among them." What is the shout of a king? When great commanders are known to have come into a camp what a thrill of joy it causes among their trusty warriors. " The king is come," say they, and his presence kindles their enthusiasm till they make the hills ring again. You know how the stern Ironsides felt when Cromwell came along; every man was a hero when he led the way. They were ready for any adventure, no matter how difficult, as long as their great chief was there. That enthusiasm which was inspired by Alexander, and by Napoleon, and by other great commanders, is the earthly image of the spiritual fervor felt by the church when the Lord Jesus is in her midst.

What next? When the king comes and they have received him with enthusiasm, he cries, " Now is the hour of battle;" and at once a shout goes up from his warriors who are eager for the fight. When a clan of Highlanders was led to the battle by their chief he had only to show them the enemy and with one tremendous shout they leaped upon them like lions. It is so with the people of God. My brethren, let us cry to God, entreating Him to be among us. This it is that you want in your Sunday-schools, in your mission halls, in your street preaching, in your tract distributing; it is this that I want beyond everything when I have to speak to you in this vast house. If I could hear the sound of my Master's feet behind me I would speak though I were lying upon the borders of the grave; but if God be gone I am bereft of power. What is the use of words without the Spirit? We might as well mutter to the whistling winds as preach to men without the Lord. O God, if Thou be with us then the shout of a King is among us, but without Thee we pine away.

III. Thirdly, let us look at a very important point, and a very practical one too:

WHAT CAN BE DONE

for the securing and preserving of the presence of God with the church? This is a matter that would require several sermons to discuss it fully; but I notice that there is something even in the conformation of a church to secure this. God is very tolerant, and He bears with many mistakes in His servants and yet blesses them; but depend upon it, unless a church is formed at the very outset upon scriptural principles and in God's own way, sooner or later all the mistakes of her constitution will turn out to be sources of weakness. Christ loves to dwell in a house which is built according to His own plans, and not according to the whims and fancies of men. The church ought not to set up as her authority the decrees of men, either living or dead; her ruler is Christ. Associations formed otherwise than according to Scripture must fail in the long run. I wish Christians would believe this.

Chillingworth said, " The Bible, and the Bible alone, is the religion of Protestants." That is not true. Certain Protestants have tacked many other things to the Bible; and they are suffering as the result of their folly, for they cannot keep their church from becoming Popish. Of course they cannot; they have admitted a little leaven of Popery, and it will leaven the whole lump. The dry rot in one part of the house will spread throughout the whole fabric sooner or later. Let us be careful to build on the foundation of Christ, and then let every man take heed how he build thereon; for even if the foundation is good, yet if he build with hay and stubble the fire will cause him grievous loss.

But next, God will only dwell with a church which is full of life. The living God will not inhabit a dead church. Hence the necessity of having really regenerated people as members of the church. We cannot secure this in every case with all our watching; among the wheat. But if the admission of unregenerate men is usual, and there are no restrictions, then the Lord will be grieved and leave us. God dwelleth not in temples made with hands; He dwells in living souls. Remember that text: " God is not the God of the dead, but of the living," and it bears this sense among others, that He is not the God of a church made up of unconverted people. Oh, that we may all live unto God, and may that life be past all question.

TARES WILL GROW

That being supposed, we next notice that to have God among us we must be full of faith. Unbelief gives forth such a noxious vapor that Jesus Himself could not stop where it was. His strength was paralyzed: " He could not do many mighty works there because of their unbelief." Faith creates an atmosphere in which the Spirit of God can work; meanwhile the Spirit of God Himself creates that faith, so that it is all of His own working from first to last. Brothers, sisters, do you believe your God? Do you believe up to the hilt? Alas, too many only believe a little! But do you believe His every word? Do you believe His grandest promises? Is He a real God to you, making His words into facts every day of your lives? If so, then the Lord is among us as in the holy place. Faith builds a pavilion in which her King delights to sit enthroned.

With that must come prayer. Prayer is the breath of faith. I do not believe God will ever be long with a church that does not pray; and I feel certain that when meetings for prayer, when family prayer, when private prayer, when any form of prayer comes to be at a discount, the Lord will leave the people to learn their weakness. Want of prayer cuts the sinews of the church for practical working; she is lame, feeble, impotent, if prayer be gone. If anything be the matter with the lungs we fear consumption; prayer-meetings are and anything the matter there means consumption to the church, or at best a gradual decline, attended with general debility. O my brothers, if we want to have God with us, pass the watchword round, " Let us pray." Let us pray after the fashion of the widow who was importunate and would not be repulsed; remember, it is written, " Men ought always to pray, and not to faint." Where prayer is fervent God is present.

Supposing there is this faith and prayer, we shall also need holiness of life. You know what Balaam did when he found he could not curse the people. Satanic was his advice. He bade the King of Moab seduce the men of Israel by the women of Moab that were fair to look upon; these were to fascinate them by their beauty, and then to invite them to their idolatrous rites, which rites were orgies of lust; he hoped that the lewdness of the people would grieve the Lord and cause Him to leave them and then Moab could smite them. He sadly succeeded. If it had not been for Phineas who in holy wrath drove his javelin right through a man and woman in the very act of sin, sparing none in the vehemence of his zeal, Israel had been quite undone. So in a church. The devil will work hard to lead one into licentiousness, another into drunkenness, a third into dishonesty, and others into worldliness. If he can only get the goodly Babylonish garment and the wedge of gold buried in an Achan's tent, then Israel will be chased before her adversaries.

God cannot dwell in an unclean church. A holy God abhors the very garments spotted by the flesh. Be ye holy as Christ is holy. Do not take up with this German-silver which is so much boasted of nowadays. Do not be deluded into self-righteousness, but seek after real holiness; and if you do find it you will never boast about it; your life will speak, but your lips will never dare to say, " See how holy I am." Real holiness dwells with humility, and makes men aspire after that which yet lies beyond them. Be holy, upright, just, straight, true, pure, chaste, devout. God send us this behavior, and then we shall keep Him among us as long as we live.

Lastly, when we have reached to that, let us have practical consecration. God will not dwell in a house which does not belong to Him. No, the first thing with any one of us is to answer this question: Dost thou give thyself up to Christ, body, soul, and spirit, to live for Him and to die for Him? Wilt thou give Him all that thou hast of talent and ability, and substance, and time, and life itself? Where there is a church made up of consecrated people, there God will remain, and there He will make a heaven below, and there the shout of a king shall be heard, and there His strength shall be revealed, and there His glory shall be seen even as it is beheld on high. The Lord send us this, for Jesus' sake. Amen and Amen.

MR. THOMAS EDWARD MURPHY.

Mr. T. E. Murphy, the son of Mr. Francis Murphy, the well-known temperance advocate, whose portrait appears on page 204, was born in the State of New York, on July 18th, 1859.

The subject of our sketch received an excellent education in the public schools of the city of Portland, Me., and is a young man of studious habits. He was only thirteen years old when his mother died, and having at this period been withdrawn from school, he was set to learn the trade of a stone-cutter. After three years of this work, and in which he had made considerable proficiency, he joined his father in his itinerant Gospel Temperance work, in 1877, in Pittsburg, Penn., in the capacity of private secretary, and became his companion.

During the unparalleled work at Pittsburg, he was a keen observer, and the scenes he then witnessed strengthened his faith, and inflamed his zeal in the Temperance cause, to which he has now devoted his life. It was at this period that he first made his appearance as a public speaker, and though his immense audiences were by no means disposed to be critical, it was at once seen that he inherited his father's genius, and evidenced also the same deep hatred to the drinking customs of the age, and the profoundest belief in the transforming power of the Gospel of Christ. As a result of the enthusiastic and untiring labors of father and son, at Pittsburg, 65,000 persons signed the pledge, and 300 drinking saloons were closed.

In the spring of this same year (1877), Edward accompanied his father to Philadelphia, and during the successful progress of the work in that city, and its neighborhood, he often appeared on the platform to plead the cause which filled him with so much enthusiasm, the press describing him as "giving short and earnest speeches, the very embodiment of grace and eloquence." No fewer than 70,000 persons signed the pledge during the mission.

In July, 1877, Mr. Edward Murphy commenced a mission in Ithaca, N. Y., in which he was ably assisted by a young man of brilliant ability, named Eccles Robinson. Here Richard T. Booth lived, and in the course of the campaign he attended one of the noon-day prayer-meetings, which were conducted by Edward, and it was by him that the Blue Ribbon was tied in Mr. Booth's button-hole, and the Murphy pledge administered. The mission extended over three weeks, and many people were enrolled under the banner of the Temperance army.

Edward Murphy afterward proceeded to Troy, Springfield, and Washington, in which cities, while he did yeoman service, he also aided his father to gather in the sheaves of a harvest more than golden. He then proceeded to New York, where his aptitude for the work became still more apparent, and his successes of greater magnitude. The New York Witness eulogistically described him as "being well able to represent his father when absent, his touching and eloquent address delivered in an impressive manner being greeted at its close with hearty and continued applause."

Having taken part in a monster meeting at Bismarck Grove, Kansas, where he addressed an audience of 30,000 people, he proceeded to Oil City, Pennsylvania, where the number who offered to sign the pledge was almost greater than could be registered by the clerks. One of the local journals said: "During the indisposition of the father, the young David was in command. He spoke about forty minutes, and to people who have heard the eloquent young man it is unnecessary to say it was good. His addresses have hitherto been very short, but last night he had all the rope he wanted, and he used it well. Climax after climax was reached, and many were afterward heard to remark, pleasantly, 'I am glad his father did not come.'"

VISIT TO GREAT BRITAIN.

In September, 1881, Thomas E. Murphy accompanied his father to England, and both sire and son were honored with an enthusiastic reception at Hoxton Hall, the headquarters of the English division of the Blue Ribbon Army, originated by Mr. William Noble. On this occasion the young orator addressed the assembly in words as fitting as they were eloquent.

Mr. Francis Murphy having opened his crusade on the other side of the Atlantic, in the town of Bolton, Mr. Edward assisted him, and the trophies gained in this initial skirmish gave ample promise of triumphs which have since been won, and of grander victories which are yet in progress. Upward of 12,000 persons enrolled themselves in the ranks of the Blue Ribbon Army. The Bolton News speaking of him, said, "Mr. Edward Murphy seems to have reached the hearts of our townsmen and is exceedingly popular. After an able and earnest address 552 persons signed the pledge."

The first campaign which Mr. Murphy conducted alone in England was at Haslingden, near Manchester, where the success realized transcended the anticipations of the most sanguine. Out of an accessible population of 12,000, no fewer than 5166 joined the Blue Ribbon Army, and simultaneously 500 more took the Roman Catholic pledge. The Mission stirred the town to its very depths. All classes were reached, and of the result it may be said, as Lord Nelson said of the battle of the Nile, "This is not a simple victory, it is a conquest." There are now scarcely any police apprehensions for drunkenness, or assault; the good work continues to spread, and the rum publicans' interest is nearly ruined. One rum-seller has become a baker, another has obtained a situation in a weaving factory, and others are desirous of relinquishing the business. The churches are being filled; the ladies' auxiliary are conducting cottage prayer-meetings with great success, and Haslingden is nearly transformed.

Proceeding next on to the busy town of Rawtenstall, the same astonishing success was repeated. In a six days' mission 3000 people signed the pledge. Being situated near Haslingden, the community was inflamed by a contagious zeal, and from the very beginning the popular enthusiasm was at a white heat. So eager were the inhabitants to enlist in the Blue Ribbon ranks, that an opportunity had to be furnished them at several shops and mills during the daytime. One night, when the great hall was densely packed, and on an alarm of fire being raised, Edward Murphy bade the surging and terrified multitude have confidence in him while he inquired the cause of their alarm. So complete was the control which he happily exercised, that the audience patiently waited until informed that the smoke came from a flue, running from a fireplace through the room beneath, and that no peril was to be apprehended. Thus, what might have proved a terrible calamity, was providentially averted.

SMOKE WAS SEEN ISSUING FROM THE FLOOR,

While Mr. Francis Murphy was in Forfar, Scotland, his son Edward paid him a visit, and the friends of the movement earnestly desired him to remain a few days to aid his father in developing the surprising work which he had initiated in that northern town. Out of a population of 12,000 more than 6000 were induced to sign the pledge and put on the Blue Ribbon, and the almost desolated churches were filled to repletion. The Dundee Advertiser said of him: "He seems animated by the same fervor as his father, and to be like him in his power of getting into the good graces of his hearers, and impressing them with his own enthusiasm." At Diss, Norfolk, whither he went on January 9th, the results were similarly astonishing. The Rev. G. Habron speaks of what he witnessed here as being a "real Temperance Pentecost; and this not only among the poor and illiterate, but among the cultured and well-to-do portion of the community." Never within the memory of the oldest inhabitant had the town manifested such unbounded enthusiasm in any movement. Nearly 2400 persons, being about one half the population, signed the pledge within the brief space of seven days.

Mr. T. E. Murphy has continued his labors across the water with marked success in many of the large cities. At Shrewsbury, where he was last engaged, the enthusiasm was unbounded.

MARTHA THE GYPSY WOMAN.

(See Illustration.)

A PARTY of young men set out some time ago to visit a camp of gypsies encamped on the banks of a river some eight miles from one of our large cities. The gypsies had been there about four weeks and many excursions had been made by curious people from the city. Some went impelled by simple curiosity to learn something of the strange people who are found in all countries leading their unconstrained vagabond life. Others went "to have their fortunes told;" for even among educated people, who ought to know better, a belief still prevails that a gypsy woman whose palm has been crossed by silver can reveal the future of the person consulting her. Thus from the presents of both classes of visitors the gypsies contrived to draw a considerable supply of ready money.

A suspicion was, however, well founded that they had other sources of income which would not bear investigation so well as that of presents. Many families began to complain of losses, which were clearly the result of the visits of sneak thieves, and the gypsies were suspected of robbing the hencoops and barns. They were accordingly advised by the police to find another location for the camp, and when the party of young men visited them they were preparing for a speedy removal.

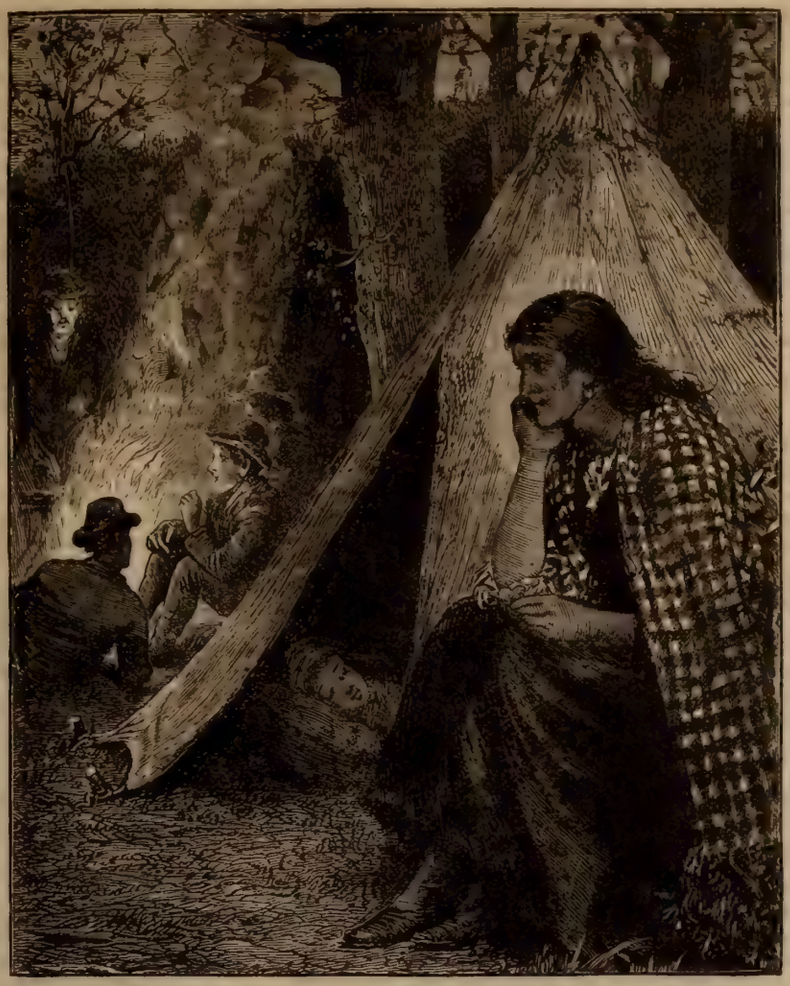
As the young men sat on the level greensward smoking and drinking with the male members of the tribe, a woman sat outside one of the tents absorbed in thought. Martha was considering a project which had been in her mind for some time, but the execution of which she had postponed from day to day through fear of its consequences. Now that the camp was about to remove she decided that she would delay no longer.

In her tent was a little girl soundly asleep. The child had been stolen nearly six months before and had been committed to her care. Martha did not know the little girl's parents, but she knew where the camp was when the men brought in the poor little frightened child. She had taken it and cared for it and had grown very fond of the little creature. Martha knew from the dress and ornaments the little girl wore that the child was the daughter of wealthy parents, but she had no idea who they were. The child could not tell her name, but said her mamma called her Bella, but Martha knew enough of the ways of the "house-dwellers" to be aware that the clue thus furnished would be sufficient to identify her. Her plan was to persuade the young men to take Bella with them to the city and send her to the place from which she was stolen.



"Martha sat watching outside the tent."

It was a difficult and perilous undertaking. She knew that she would be liable to punishment when the child was missed the next morning, and that she might suffer severely. But in spite of her own love for Bella, or rather because of that love she was resolved to run the risk. She waited outside the tent watching until the party broke up. Then quickly snatching up a rough shawl she wrapped the child in it and glided swiftly to a point on the river bank which she knew the young men must pass in their boat on their way to the city. It was screened by trees from view of the camp and Martha having reached it sat down to listen. Soon she heard the sound of the oars and calling to the rowers in a voice scarcely above her breath, she was relieved to see that they silently shot the boat to the bank. A few words of hurried explanation followed, and the child was taken on board. Then Martha hurried back to the camp and in the tent now without the child she loved, she sat down to cry.

What punishment Martha suffered for her deed of love she never told. She had been impelled to rescue the child by the kind words of a Christian lady who visited the camp, and she knew the risk she incurred in doing it. But though the lady knew nothing of the child being in the camp, and therefore did not refer to it, Martha had thought over the lady's words and resolved as the first step toward a better life to restore the child. In less than a year afterward, Martha, weary, ragged and footsore, presented herself at the home to which she had been the means of restoring its little treasure and begged for admission. It was granted her, and she folded the little Bella in her arms and wept over her. Martha would not tell her story, but she asked to remain in any capacity that would enable her to be near the child. To her intense joy she was installed as nurse, and a more devoted help no family ever had. Under the influence of religion she lost her old wildness of manner and heart and became a sincere Christian woman. In doing an act of self-sacrifice she had led the way to her own reformation.

PERILS OF GOSPEL WORK IN IRELAND.

(See Illustration.)

One of the most embarrassing features of the Irish problem, which is now almost as prominent a subject of discussion on this side the Atlantic as it is on the other, is the intolerance of a large section of the Irish people. It is very natural to sympathize with the people of Ireland as we listen to the story of hardship and oppression inflicted on generation after generation of Irish tenants by landowners and their agents; but when American citizens are invited to aid in an effort to induce England to grant self-government to Ireland it becomes a pertinent question whether the Irish have shown a capacity for self-government.

It is perfectly true that among Irishmen there have been and are now many brave and eloquent men—men of whom any nation might be proud. But there is a disposition prevalent among the masses of the people in Ireland, and is noticed even in the men who are accepted as leaders, which discourages the most sincere friends of Ireland and causes them to hesitate in advocating home rule. That is a tendency to intolerance. All that we hear of events in Ireland now and in past times leads us to doubt whether if the government of the country were committed to the hands of the Irish people, civil and religious liberty would be guaranteed. It is at the present time unsafe for any one holding unpopular doctrines, political or religious, to express them openly. There is no security that any man advocating such doctrines will not suffer personal violence. Yet that security is an indispensable feature of good government.

In religious matters, especially, is this intolerance exhibited. Numerous cases are on record of Protestant preachers who have dared to preach salvation through Jesus only, being in peril of their lives. We give an illustration depicting one out of many similar cases. It is that of a Wesleyan minister, who was on his way through the town of Granard, when he was recognized by a woman who had heard him preach two years before. She made use of some intimidating language, and a desperate mob assembled, and began to throw stones. "I had to return," says the minister, "to take refuge in the barracks. The mob watched and waited for my appearance, yelling after me and calling me 'Garibaldi,' 'Antichrist,' etc. At length I had to leave, which was only a signal for fresh vociferations, accompanied by a volley of stones. The police did all they could to protect me; but there were not many officers in the town, and had there been twice the number they could not have saved me without shedding blood. Part of the 'baser sort' ran before the police, in order to meet me when beyond their protection, and murder me on the spot. I also say that they wanted, by provocation, to engage the attention of the police, who while arresting one or two men might not observe that the others were collecting stones to destroy me; and when I made the attempt to leave, the stones flew again on all sides. I was struck on the arm, on the leg, and, lastly, on the head. I had to flee bare-headed.

"When out of the town I met a man leading a horse, from whom I expected some compassion; but he sternly refused to render me any protection or aid. I did not know where I was going; but the Lord led me to the house of W. Kelly, Esq., of Kilcourcey, where I was well taken care of. My wounds were attended to, and I soon forgot all care or pain."

FETTERS OF FASHION.

By Miss M. A. Paull,

Author of "The Flower of the Grassmarket," "The Romance of a Rag," etc., etc.

A Mysterious Stranger.

After Mrs. Ireland failed the brewer's lady, Mrs. Johnson, driving to the shop in her pony carriage was not one whit more successful.

"Good-morning," she began graciously.

"Good-morning, madam," replied Reginald Courtenay, "I am obliged to you for the kind intention with which you have come to my store; but I must inform you that I never, from conscientious scruples, allow myself to accept the custom of any one whose income is derived from the sale of intoxicating liquors."

"You are the oddest man I ever saw," said the lady, gazing at the fine, manly countenance before her, of whose frankness and truthfulness, as the index of the heart, none seeing it could doubt.

Reginald Courtenay could not resist laughing at her words, and his laughter was echoed from the lady's own lips. Then she said:

"How is it you don't know that good beer, such as my husband brews, is the very bulwark, physically speaking, of England."

"God forbid!" said the grocer earnestly.

"Well, at all events, it is our national beverage, none can deny that," said Mrs. Johnson.

"More's the pity," said Reginald Courtenay.

"You surely would not deprive a poor man of his beer?" said Mrs. Johnson.

"I surely would, madam," answered the grocer. "I would not deprive him of home and home comforts, of good food, good clothes, good house, good books; but he can't have these, if he has bad beer."

"Bad beer, you obstinate man," said the brewer's lady, smiling, "I said good beer."

"There is no such thing, madam."

"What a heterodox man you are!" said the lady, still smiling. "But, come, I must not stay any longer now; take my order like a rational being, and you can try your hand some other day at converting me. I can see how clever you are. Mrs. Gray told me no one in the town sold such beautiful tea as you sell; quite appropriate, too, the true *tee*total drink."

"I thought I had explained, madam," said Reginald Courtenay, "that I cannot take on my list of customers any one engaged in the liquor traffic."

The lady hardly waited for him to finish.

"Good morning," she said as coolly as a condensed icicle might have spoken, could it find a voice, and turned to leave the store. The grocer followed her to his door, politely helped her into her carriage, and drew over her the handsome rug that lay in it, then bowed as she drove away. With a smile and a frown she turned to him as he did so, and said, "You tiresome, disagreeable man."

Of course, such conduct and such plain speaking as Reginald Courtenay did not hesitate to use when duty seemed to demand, necessarily made him enemies; and yet, so pure and high was the man's life, so honest and upright was every action, so good and true-hearted did he prove in sickness, or distress, even to those whose money he could not touch, that his popularity in his native town was very much more universal than might have been imagined.

When the eldest son of the landlady, Mrs. Ireland, almost broke her heart by his wild ways and dissolute conduct, Reginald Courtenay had proved himself a real friend. His angry father had forbidden the mother to expend another penny on the son whom he had taught to drink, but whom he now stigmatized as a drunken vagabond. It was the grocer's generosity that equipped him for a foreign clime, that paid his passage-money thither in a temperance ship, and it was the good teetotaler who himself saw the young man on board, lest temptation should assail him and ruin all their plans before he had embarked for his new home. And that rescued one was now blessing God in an Australian settlement for such a friend in his sore need as Reginald Courtenay. Man, degraded and mean as he often shows himself, has enough of the God-like nature in him to be warmed into enthusiasm by pure unselfishness in others; and thus, as years went by, the grocer was forgiven his eccentricities, for the sake of his manifold excellencies.

Indeed, there were some who said the world would be a good deal sooner mended if many another had as firm a backbone of teetotal principle as Reginald Courtenay.

When his sister and her four daughters came, some few years before our story opens, to live in Devonshire, he had rejoiced in the hope, that now at least, he should be no longer lonely, that the girls might, one or two at a time, share his comfortable home and keep house for him.

He had scarcely seen his sister since she left her home on her marriage with the gay young officer Lieutenant Sylvester; and he had known but little of her for some years before that, because she had lived with a widowed aunt, and been taken about by her to fashionable places of resort, in one of which, at a ball, she had formed the acquaintance of her future husband.

What he had known, had led him to believe her somewhat frivolous and gay in her habits and desires in the past, but he hoped that time and experience and sorrow, might have softened her heart and matured her judgment. And what a field for pleasant speculation in his kind heart did not the promised arrival of his four young nieces present, some of whom, at least, must be good and true, and unspoiled as yet by fashion and folly. We shall see to what the good man's hope led.

It was quite natural that Louise Sylvester with her sweet bright face, pleasant manners, and kind smile, should be the favorite among the good townsfolk of Moreton Hampstead. Her mother and sisters would not have felt very flattered had they known how severely they were criticised by some of their neighbors, both poor and well-to-do.

"Mr. Reginald Courtenay's little finger is as rich as the whole of his fine relations put together, though they do hold their heads so high. If that woman had any sense she would humor his whims, and then her children would become his heirs. She would be quite as well if she did turn teetotaler, and save her port wine, that she would!"

Just at this period, when the corn in the fields grew golden under the sun's fiercest rays, and the rich autumn flowers, glowed in garden and hedgerow, a new clerk came to serve in the grocer's store, concerning whom, Moreton Hampstead was visibly moved. As reports spread abroad that he was singularly good-looking and singularly gentlemanly, all the young ladies of the place, save, of course, the Sylvesters, discovered that their mothers or cooks were in need of some important article of consumption to be found in a grocer's store; spice, or raisins, or vinegar, or cheese; and were obliging enough, quite contrary to custom in some cases, to volunteer to order it from Mr. Courtenay's, as they were just going out for a little walk.

And good-natured mothers, who of course saw plainly through the ruse, yet accepted these offers, being willing enough themselves, perchance, to hear something definite from reliable authority, concerning the mysterious young man. And each young lady, coming back after a while, reported to her wonder-loving mother that she never saw a store clerk in the least like him, he had "such lovely hands, and he was so handsome, and he was most decidedly a gentleman."

It began at last to be whispered about, who put the story into circulation it is impossible to say, that Mr. Courtenay, being displeased with the airs and whims of his sister and three out of her four daughters, had chosen this stranger for his heir, and that it served Mrs. Sylvester exactly right for her foolishness.

The ladies had, of course, never forgiven her for setting herself above them; and the gentlemen had considered she was unjust both to herself and her pretty girls, to bind them as closely with the fetters of fashion in a little place like Moreton where everybody knows everybody else, as if they had been living in the most dangerous and fashionable of watering places, abounding in adventurers and male flirts. The inmates of Number Six, of course, had the wonderful news brought to them about the mysterious stranger, and the supposed explanation of his advent.

Louise smiled and turned very red when the subject was mentioned, but she hoped that no one noticed this. An hour or two later, she put on her hat and boots to go out. She peeped in at the parlor door.

"Please don't wait for me; uncle wished me to drink tea with him this evening."

She was surprised that her mother made no objection to her scheme. Was she too sleepy to disturb herself, or was she also curious about her brother's new clerk?

It was Clarie who spoke. "Very well, dear. Our best respects to Uncle Reginald."

Along the streets, drowsy now in the warm afternoon sunshine, and almost as deserted by the inhabitants as if Moretonites had been given to mid-day siestas, and had not yet awakened, Louise Sylvester wended her way. Into her uncle's store she turned, passing through it without looking on this side or that, though she was curiously conscious that a pair of eyes she had never seen before, was minutely observing her all the time.

With only a light premonitory tap at the door of the sitting-room within, she entered, and found her uncle seated and half asleep in his very easy arm-chair. She sat down quietly, determined not to disturb his nap; but her coming had aroused him. He shook off his sleepiness, folded her in his arms, and then brought forward some delicious late raspberries and pears, which had been hidden under cool green leaves in the shadiest part of that always shady room, and begged her to enjoy them.

"And while you are eating, Louise," said he, "I will talk; I want your help, you know. I told you I had a visitor coming, and you didn't expect he would be a new store clerk, did you?"

"Not quite, certainly," replied Loo. "I thought you said—"

"Yes, so I did, and I don't like mysteries very much; but there may be times and circumstances when, if you do not tell any falsehoods, a partial concealment of your name may not be wrong. He is called Beverley—Beverley Trevelyan, as you know; here he is simply Mr. Beverley. My conscience is clear, else I would not suffer it. But I must have your help about him."

"Mine, uncle; what help can I possibly give you? Your note puzzled me not a little. I am so stupid and so inexperienced, I know nothing of what young men may care to talk about;" and Louise blushed, and looked so very pretty, that she almost startled her uncle. But he went on, and said what he meant, notwithstanding.

"It is absurd to suppose that a young man of his breeding, and manners, and habits, can be satisfied so long as he purposes to remain, without some society besides that of myself, my assistant, and the apprentices. He has come here, as I hinted to you, to reform. He has, wisely as I think, in order to do this, put himself under the restraint of my house, and its quiet and orderly regulations, and undertaken work that is new and perhaps foreign to his tastes, that he may occupy his hands effectually, and be enabled the better to remember his purpose. Fortunately, he greatly admires moorland scenery, and his evenings, he says, will be delightfully occupied with long rambles over Dartmoor, but by day, I fear, he will often be dull. All this I confide to you, Louise, in the hope that, whenever possible, you will come and cheer him by your society. Will you do this for me?"

"If mamma would allow me, uncle, I would most gladly, most willingly; but I cannot imagine how I can do it without mamma's sanction, and that you know perfectly well I shall never obtain."

"There may be ways," murmured Uncle Reginald to himself, "there may be ways." Then in a louder tone he added, "You yourself are willing to leave Number Six, and take up your abode here for a little, if I obtain your mother's sanction?"

"Perfectly, uncle; but I don't think you will ever get that," replied Louise, surprised at her uncle's confident manner.

"This young man," resumed Uncle Reginald, "has been a complete victim to drink."

Louise started.

"Let me go on. He has abandoned such miserable habits for above six months; but he dares not return into the society he has left; he wants to strengthen himself for the ordeal that awaits him. We devised between us this curious plan. I am so crotchetty, that I can do anything without exciting surprise, or, if surprise is excited, all say 'it is just like him,' and the wonder soon dies a natural death. What I want you to do, Louise, is to cheer Beverley Trevelyan, for he is often despondent, and to make this house a little brighter for him. The reclamation has begun; you must do your womanly part to bring it to perfection."

"But, uncle," began Louise, "I am not even a teetotaler. Mamma won't hear of it; though I take as little as possible to satisfy her."

"And are you not old enough, dear child, respectfully and kindly to tell your mother that you have taken your last glass of wine; that you feel it is right for you to burst the fetters of fashion in this respect, and exercise your freedom by obeying God's laws, and renouncing that which you are convinced is hurtful? Have you not too long already acted against your convictions? I hope because of your own cowardice, you may be more readily understand what it has cost this young man to root up an evil habit, which fashion, custom, and appetite had bound to him so tightly, that the wonder is how he ever freed himself at all."

PHILIP AND THE ETHIOPIAN.

S. S. Lesson for April 8, Acts 8 : 26-40. Golden Text, ver. 39. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Apostolic Readiness—Testimony and Exhortation—The Present Power of Testimony—Philip's Marching Order—No Man Indispensable—The Object of the Journey—The Still Small Voice Heard—The Eunuch Prepared for Instruction—Philip in Distinguished Company—The Opportunity Sought—The Eunuch's Baptism—The Single Condition—Rejoicing in Jesus.

THE early Christians understood their vocation; wherever they went, they preached the Gospel, whether they were ordained apostles or not. Those who were thrust out from Jerusalem for preaching the Gospel there, "went everywhere preaching the Word." Peter and John, on their return from their apostolic mission to Samaria, "when they had testified and preached the Word of the Lord, returned to Jerusalem, and preached the Gospel in many villages of the Samaritans." They did not lose time in feeling their way as some do nowadays; they did not wait for more specific directions; wherever men were perishing within sight of them, there was their call to preach the Gospel.

We notice too that their preaching did not consist of lengthened discourses, there was a great deal of testimony as well. On the day of Pentecost we read of Peter, "With many other words did he

TESTIFY AND EXHORT"

(Acts 2 : 40); here again they "testified and preached."

God is showing us in the present day the power there is in simple testimony coming from hearts filled with what the Lord has done for them. While many learned, eloquent, able preachers of the Gospel are winning their twos and threes to the feet of Jesus, many illiterate men and women, who are however full of praise for His continuous blessing to themselves, are winning hundreds of precious, immortal souls. And oh, how sweet it is to know that the giving testimony to the word of His grace, is no new method, it is but one sign of the revival of Pentecostal times among us.

"And the angel of the Lord spake unto Philip, saying, Arise, and go toward the south, unto the way that goeth down from Jerusalem unto Gaza, which is desert." What! in the very spring tide of this great awakening, must God's chosen instrument be withdrawn? Yes, even so, for God's thoughts are not our thoughts, neither are our ways His; the thoughts of God are infinitely higher than ours (Isaiah 55 : 8, 9).

PHILIP WAS NOT INDISPENSABLE

to God; he was only what God had made him, and what God can make any man to be who surrenders himself to Him. It was necessary for these converts who had now themselves received the Holy Ghost, to become independent of Philip or of any other man; it was equally necessary for Philip to learn that as an instrument of the Holy Ghost, he must be equally willing to do great things or small, and to work, not according to any ideas of his own, but simply to fall into God's plan, whatever that might be. Already, we see he had learned to be quiet enough before God to possess an attentive ear to all which God would say to him, and he had also a will completely subject to God, so that he did not so much as question whether the directions given him were right or wrong. Oh, what entire self-abnegation there is in those words written about a Holy-Ghost-filled man, "and he arose and went."

It was not long before the Lord showed him the object of this journey. Probably Philip was in prayer; very likely thinking much of his late converts, and commending one and another to God; not worried because time seemed to be lost, or because his powers of preaching were being wasted; for Philip's time was God's and any power he possessed was God's property, and not his. An Ethiopian eunuch, a man of high government position, travelling probably in considerable state, was just on his return journey from Jerusalem, where he had been to worship.

Philip was not occupied with thoughts of curiosity as to who this man was, where he came from, what brought him there, etc., or he would never have been free enough in spirit to hear the still, small voice (1 Kings 19 : 12) of the Spirit of God, who said to him, "Go near, and join thyself to this chariot." But he did hear, and he did obey. "Philip ran thither to him, and heard him read the prophet Esaias, and said, Understandest thou what thou readest?" Why do we so often fail to hear, and to understand the voice of the Spirit of God? Is it not because we are preoccupied? Perhaps we are and then God's plans come in as an interference with ours. Perhaps we are distracted, letting our thoughts wander in every direction, and thus we are not recollected, not gathered together, so to speak, and we miss the "still small voice." Perhaps it is that the way of God is not pleasing to us; we might have thought in Philip's place that it was too bad after having been used to do such a great work, to be sent away into the desert as though we were a nobody, and we might have thought it could not be God's voice which told us. But the spirit which hears the voice of God distinctly is that one which has such complete submission to His will, and such confidence in His love and wisdom as to believe that all things work together for good to them that love God (Rom. 8 : 23), and therefore is open to receive anything which God may say.

Blessed be God, in His wondrous providence everything is prepared beforehand. Weeks, months before this time, the eunuch must have been awakened; it is possible that some zealous Jew, who traded with Ethiopia had come to court, and spoken something of the true and living God. It may be he had said that copies of the Scriptures were to be obtained which would tell of this great God. The man, tired with the absurdities of his heathenism, may have come to Jerusalem hearing that was the only place where the true God could be worshipped, and had there obtained some portion of the Scriptures. This he was reading, and Philip abruptly broke in upon him with the question, what thou readest?" Abrupt as it was, the question was a welcome one to this honest inquirer, and he replied, "How can I, except some man should guide me? And he desired Philip that he would come up and sit with him." A deacon in the church at Jerusalem, persecuted thence and entering Samaria a homeless wanderer; becoming the apostle of the city, then driven thence by the Spirit of God to become a wanderer in the desert, and then given a seat in the chariot of one of the great ones of this world! Oh, how great, how sudden, the changes may be in the life of a man wholly given up to God, a man who has given up his likes and dislikes and the consideration of whether anything is convenient or inconvenient to him!

The place of the Scripture where the man was reading was this, "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter; and like a lamb dumb before his shearer, so opened he not his mouth: In his humiliation his judgment was taken away: and who shall declare his generation? for his life is taken from the earth." The eunuch asked Philip, "I pray thee, of whom speaketh the prophet this? of himself, or of some other man?" This was just an opportunity of preaching Jesus. No time is lost when the Spirit of God is trusted. Here was Philip dealing with an inquirer who was made to ask the very question which opened up the whole subject. Philip preached no doctrine, it was Jesus Himself whom he presented to the eunuch, Jesus whom he knew, who had saved him, cleansed him, kept him, who dwelt in him; Jesus who was his new life, his power, his joy, his all. True he took as his text the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, but it was a living Person whom he presented to this former heathen. And the Spirit of God was at work showing the eunuch Jesus.

"As they went on their way, they came to a certain water; and the eunuch said, See, here is water; what doth hinder me to be baptized?" What, in the presence of his coachman? Would it not be thought very strangely of at home? Would it not be better to wait until some better opportunity, when it could be done privately? It might cause so much talk at court on his return. But the eunuch knew

IT WAS THE RIGHT THING.

If Jesus were the Son of God, and had died for him, it was the least thing he could do to acknowledge it; and if salvation were good for him, it must be good for his servants too; and thus anything like concealment was out of the question. It was due to the Lord who died for him, that his servants should know the grace of God toward him, it was necessary for their salvation that they should know their master had needed salvation too, and had obtained it, and this public act would speak more than any amount of words could do.

Philip imposed but one condition. This was not that he must master a certain amount of theological knowledge, or go through a certain course of instruction. It is the heart which God seeks to win, and Philip said, "If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest." This might seem an easy condition; but it involved the entire disruption of his social habits, worship, reputation, everything. If Queen Candace were brought to believe in Jesus, well; if not, the eunuch would lose his place at court, his position would be lost, his family ruined. But knowing all this, in the warm zeal and high courage of his first love, he said, "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God. And he commanded the chariot to stand still; and they went down both into the water, both Philip and the eunuch; and he baptized him."

IT WAS DONE;

he had committed himself, the servants had seen it, it could not be hidden. Was he filled with fear that he had perpetrated so rash an act? Thank God, no. Was he not filled with apprehension about what they might say at home? No. Did he not entreat Philip to accompany him and strengthen his faith? No. "The Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip, that the eunuch saw him no more; and he went on his way rejoicing." He had found Jesus, and he could dispense with Philip. He had found Jesus, and Jesus was with him to accompany him to Ethiopia. He had exchanged a religion full of superstition and fables, for an acquaintance with the real living Son of God, and if he lost all beside, he would keep Jesus. "But Philip was found at Azotus." He had accomplished his mission in the desert, but his zeal was not abated by the change of work he had had. "Passing through he preached in all the cities, till he came to Cesarea." Lord, send many such men among us now, filled with, and led by, the Spirit. Amen.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Bitter Feeling Against Irishmen is Said to be prevalent throughout England. European correspondents of American journals report that the intelligence offices admit their inability to procure situations for Irish servants, numbers of whom are being discharged daily, and from all sides there are accounts of large employers dismissing all their Irish laborers. The correspondent of the Sun says: It is not probable that the persons who planned the Westminster explosion had any idea of the storm that would follow it, or that the English public would take it so seriously to heart. The tone of the press has changed greatly, and has, in great part, become one of uncompromising hostility. With a few more such demonstrations, the political merits of the Irish question will be completely lost sight of, if, indeed, recent events have not already placed it beyond the power of the present government to deal with it at all. What with Carey in Dublin and dynamite in Westminster, the prospects of Irish reform are gloomy indeed. The outrage on Lady Florence Dixie is now generally discredited by the British press. It is believed that her account of the affair was grossly exaggerated.

Mr. Parnell is now in Paris Delivering speeches of an inflammatory character, which, being reported in the English journals, have increased the hostility of the public toward Ireland. It is stated that he gave a grotesque account of the Kilmainham business, alleging that the Government came to him in prison and asked him to intervene and suppress outrages. He condemned the Phœnix Park murders, declared that James Carey was a government agent who had contrived these murders and led astray the poor fellows who committed them, and that he had received $30,000 reward. He attributed the Charles Street explosion to Freethinkers, and said that if the policy of Mr. Gladstone's government should be persevered in for only a short time longer, then England must be prepared for all sorts of violence. As the general tendency of Mr. Gladstone's Irish policy has been one of conciliation, it will be somewhat ungrateful if the people of Ireland repay it by all sorts of violence. Mr. Parnell's accounts of the Kilmainham treaty would not be received as authentic, if he had not, during his latest visit to New York, made statements which his most devoted friends found difficult to reconcile with notorious facts. It is evident that more money is needed, for a general call has been issued for a united convention of Irish-Americans which will be held in Philadelphia.

The Missing Link Connecting the Irish Land League with the Assassination Society is said to have been supplied by a minute book or diary kept by the Patriotic Brotherhood of Belfast. It was produced at a trial last week, in which a man named Nugent and twelve other men were convicted of engaging in a conspiracy to murder. The diary contained an entry that at the request of the Land League, conveyed through "Thomas Murphy," men were specially sworn to kill Mr. Brooke. This will need explanation before reputable American citizens subscribe their dollars to the Land League funds.

An Important Speech Was Delivered by the Right Honorable John Bright on March 22d, before the students of the Glasgow University, of which institution he was recently elected Lord Rector. Mr. Bright's remarks were mainly directed to the blessings of peace. He had some claims on the respectful attention of his audience when speaking on his favorite subject, inasmuch as he very recently resigned an office in the ministry rather than approve a policy with which his whole life has been identified. He said American independence, the French Revolution and the English Reform bill had transferred power from monarchs and statesmen to the people. Mr. Bright's address, so far as it related to political questions, dwelt upon the advisability of a peaceable policy, even with a view to self-interest. The cost of the civil war in America, he declared, would more than have sufficed to free every slave without bloodshed. With regard to Ireland, he said if the treaty of Limerick had been fulfilled and freedom of religion granted, the sad history of that country might never have been recorded.

American and Foreign Residents in Egypt are much alarmed by the rapid withdrawal of the British troops. A Cairo correspondent of the New York Herald says: "The hopes of Moslems and the fears of Christians are intensfied by every batch of British troops that quits Egypt. The words 'Egyptian' and 'European' are no longer heard in the native cafes of Cairo and Alexandria. These words are replaced by 'Moslem' and 'Infidel.' As the Seventh Dragoon Guards left Cairo on Saturday, en route for England, the joy of the Egyptians knew no bounds. Old sheiks muttered vengeance against all hat-wearing foreigners, and the lower classes celebrated the occasion by beating their hired and bleeding donkeys with stout sticks and calling them Ebn Nazraneh (sons of Christians), an epithet now become the most vilifying that can be applied to man or beast. The unanimous feeling of the European residents of Egypt—who number, by the way, about 90,000—may be briefly expressed as follows: 'If the present army of occupation be withdrawn, or so reduced as to be incapable of protecting our lives and property, we shall appeal to our respective consulates and demand that Italian, Greek, Austrian, French, German and American soldiers be sent here to carry out the duty that England has assumed, but is unable or unwilling to perform. If this demand be not granted we shall then arm ourselves and organize for resistance.'"

An Eruption of Mount Etna Was Reported on March 23d, and later accounts state that it is increasing in violence. Eruptions of this volcano have been comparatively frequent for more than two thousand years. In 1832 there opened on the sides of the mountain many flaming mouths in the midst of tremendous explosions and convulsions, prodigious discharges of ashes, cinders and lava, which overran miles of cultivated fields and threatened the town of Bron with ruin. The river of lava was then twenty miles long, over a mile wide, and forty feet deep. The telegram announcing the present eruption says: "A new crater has opened. The lava from the volcano threatens to overwhelm Nicolosi and other villages. The people living in the threatened places are fleeing from their homes, assisted by the troops. There are eleven fissures in the mountain. The central opening is active, but there is no discharge of lava from it."

Queen Victoria's Fall on the Stairs of Her palace on Saturday, March 17th, has caused some anxiety among her subjects in this country. The injuries the Queen sustained were confined to her knee, which became much swollen and necessitated the postponement of some court ceremonies. It is now definitely stated that the swelling is subsiding, and that in a few days the Queen will be able to travel as usual.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey's Meetings were attended with great blessing at Manchester. They began their mission in this city on March 1st. Referring to the first Sunday's meetings, a local journal says: "The Free Trade Hall was crowded as early as eight o'clock in the morning, the audience for the most part being composed of Christian workers. In the afternoon so great was the crowd seeking admission that the Free Trade Hall, the Circus, and the Association Hall were simultaneously thrown open and each speedily filled. In the former hall the address was delivered by Mr. Moody, the service in the Circus was conducted by Mr. Sankey, and Mr. Newett and Dr. Grimke officiated at the Association Hall. In the evening of the same day services for men only took place at the Circus, and Association Hall, Mr. Sankey and the choir, after singing at the former, passing out to perform a like service in the latter building." The meetings continue to be largely attended, the interest excited by the services being greater than on the occasion of the former visit of the evangelists, eight years ago. Messrs Moody and Sankey have been well supported by local ministers. Mr. Moody stated that at the conclusion of their visit to Manchester, on March 15th, the evangelists would go to Leeds, proceeding thence to Liverpool. It is expected that they will return to America at the termination of their labors in Liverpool, returning to England in the autumn for their London campaign.

Mr. T. E. Murphy, the American Temperance evangelist, whose portrait appears on another page, is still laboring in Great Britain with success. An English journal says that upon concluding his grand mission at Windermere, where nearly a thousand new pledges were secured, and over 2500 donned the blue ribbon, he passed on to Shrewsbury, where for two nights he had crowded meetings and gratifying results. He afterward visited Kendal, and is now in the midst of a prosperous campaign at Lancaster. At its conclusion he will join his father (Mr. Francis Murphy) in his anticipated crusade in Manchester.

The Eminent Jewish Judge, Sir George Jes- sel, who has for the ten years past held the important post in England of Master of the Rolls, died on March 21st. He was fifty-nine years of age. He was the first citizen of Jewish birth and religion who sat on the English bench. By general consent he was considered the ablest judge of this century, and perhaps the ablest known in modern times in England, and was popular in spite of his roughness of manner. He was the idol of suitors from his rapid despatch of business; and he was alike respected and dreaded by his colleagues for his uncompromising intellectual supremacy. His capacity for patient, thorough study of the cases submitted to him as an advocate, and afterward as a judge, won for him a high place in public esteem.

The Lavish Supply of Beer Ordered for Gra- tuitous distribution at the coronation of the Czar has been countermanded, the Czar having expressed an emphatic wish that the popular festivities at Moscow on the occasion of his coronation should not be allowed to assume the character of an orgy. Accordingly the idea of a gigantic fountain of free beer has been abandoned, and it has been decided to convert a hundred railroad carriages, drawn up around an open plain, into cafés, shops, theatrical booths, etc., at which the people may amuse and refresh themselves without expense. Every one who wants it will receive an enamelled mug decorated with the Imperial eagle and the date of the coronation, and the mug will be filled with beer, presumably as often as it is presented for that purpose. Sandwiches, cakes, and confectionary will also be freely distributed.

Volume V. of the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now ready, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1882 with complete index. Price $3 including postage. Ten per cent less to ministers and the trade.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), for March, may be obtained at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price six cents, postage paid.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

The work God has enabled Jerry McAuley to perform among the most abandoned classes of New York City is known all over the United States. There are men residing in nearly all our great cities who were, years ago, in New York living in vice, depending for their daily bread on the proceeds of robbery, cheating, gambling and all kinds of vicious pursuits, but who are now, by the blessing of God on his efforts, leading moral lives, prospering in business, and trusting in Jesus for salvation. Within the last few days Mr. McAuley, exhausted by continuous labor, physically prostrate and needing rest and change of air, went to Jacksonville, Fla., and even at that distance from his home his hand was grasped, to his amazement, by Christian men respected by their fellow citizens, who owed under God, all they are to his efforts in Water Street. He feels that he is himself a brand plucked from the burning, a man who was so sunk in depravity as to be a conspicuous instance of the power of God to save even to the uttermost—that he preaches the Gospel, as John Bunyan did, with a sense of its unfathomable depth of grace that no college training can give. The narrative of such a life is in itself a sermon of wonderful power. The bulk of it shall be related, as nearly as possible, in his own words:

"I was born in Ireland [about the year 1836]. Our family was broken up by sin, for my father was a counterfeiter, and left home to escape the law, before I knew him. I was placed at a very early age in the family of my grandmother, who was a devout Romanist. My first recollections of her are of her counting her beads, and kissing the floor for penance. I would take the opportunity while she was prostrated upon her face, to throw things at her head, in my mischievous play, and when she rose from her knees, it was to curse and swear at me.

"I was never taught or sent to school, but left to have my own way; to roam about in idleness, doing mischief continually, and suffering from the cruel and harsh treatment of those who had the care of me.

"At the age of thirteen I was sent to this country, under the care of a married sister in New York City. Here I ran errands in the family, and assisted my brother-in-law in his business, and soon, by the practice of little tricks, became well used to dishonesty, and was as great a rogue as one of my years could be. After a while I felt I could live by my own wits, and left my sister's home to take care of myself. I took board in a family in Water Street, where were two young men with whom I associated myself in business. I earned what I could, and that not being sufficient to supply my daily wants, I stole when I had opportunity.

"We had a boat, by means of which we boarded vessels in the night, stealing whatever we could lay our hands on. Here I began my career as

A RIVER THIEF.

In the day-time we went up into the city and sold our ill-gotten goods, and with the proceeds dressed up, and then spent our time, as long as our money lasted, in the vile dens of Water Street, practising all sorts of wickedness. Here I learned to be a prize-fighter, and by degrees, rapid degrees, sank through all the grades of vice and crime, till I became a terror and nuisance in the Fourth Ward.

"I was only nineteen years of age when I was arrested for highway robbery—a child in years, but a man in sin. I was innocent of the criminal act which was charged to my account; but the rumsellers and inhabitants of the Fourth Ward hated me with good reason, and were glad to get rid of me. So they swore the robbery on me, and I couldn't help myself. I had no friends, no advocate at court, (it is a bad thing not to have an advocate at court) and though not guilty of that crime I was sentenced to fifteen years in the State prison. I burned with vengence; but what could I do? I was handcuffed, and sent in the cars to Sing-Sing.

"That ride was the saddest hour of my life. I looked back on my whole past course, at all my hardships, my misery and sins, and gladly would I have thrown myself out before the advancing train, and ended my life.

"I concluded, however, before I reached the end of that short journey, that my best way was to be obedient to prison rules, do the best I could under the circumstances, and trust that somebody would be raised up to help me.

IN PRISON.

"When I arrived at the prison—I shall never forget it—the first thing that attracted my attention was the sentence over the door: 'The way of transgressors is hard.' Though I could not read very well, I managed to spell that out. It was a familiar sentence, which I had heard a great many times. All thieves and wicked people know it well, and they know, too, that it is out of the Bible. It is a well-worn proverb in all the haunts of vice, and one confirmed by daily experience.

"I was put to the carpet-weaving department of the prison, and for two years not a word could be said against me. All the keepers and guards spoke well of me. I minded my work, and was quiet and orderly. I tried to learn to read and write, and improved very much, more especially in reading. Then I got cheap novels and read, to pass away the time.

"I had been in the prison four or five years, when, one Sunday morning, I went with the rest to

SERVICE IN THE PRISON CHAPEL.

"I was moody and miserable. As I took my seat, I raised my eyes carelessly to the platform, and who should I see there beside the chaplain but a man named Orville Gardner, who had been for years a confederate in sin. 'Awful Gardner' was the name by which I had always known him. Since my imprisonment he had been converted, and was filled with desire to come to the prison, that he might tell the glad story to the prisoners. I had not heard he was coming, and could not have been more surprised if an angel had come down from heaven. I knew him at the first glance, although he was so greatly changed from his old rough dress and appearance. After the first look I began to question in my mind if it was he after all, and thought I must be mistaken; but the moment he spoke I was sure, and my attention was held fast.

"He told them it was only a little while since he had taken off the stripes which they were then wearing; and while he was talking his tears fairly rained down out of his eyes. Then he knelt down and prayed, and sobbed and cried till I do not believe there was a dry eye in the whole crowd. Tears filled my eyes, and I raised my hand slowly to wipe them off, for I was ashamed to have my companions or the guards see me weep; but how I wished I was alone, or that it was dark, that I might give way to my feelings unobserved.

"I knew this man was no hypocrite. We had been associated in many a dark deed and sinful pleasure. I had heard oaths and curses, vile and angry words from his mouth, and I knew he could not talk as he did then unless some great, wonderful change had come to him. I devoured every word that fell from his lips, though I could not understand half I heard. One sentence, however, impressed me deeply, which he said was a verse from the Bible. But that was a book I had never read.

"I went back to my cell. What I had heard was ringing in my ears, and the thought possessed me to find the verse which had so struck me. Every prison cell is supplied with a Bible; but, alas! few of them are used. Mine I had never touched since the day I entered my narrow apartment, and laid it away in the ventilator. I took it down, beat the dust from it, and opened it."

The impression made upon McAuley's mind by the change in "Awful Gardner" was apparently more powerful than the sermons and teaching he had heard. The miracle of conversion was there before him to examine for himself. He knew Gardner in his former state, and he saw him now so changed that he seemed another man. The people were not more surprised who saw the cripple at the Beautiful Gate of the Temple rise and walk at the command of Peter. McAuley saw, but he could not understand the change. He evidently approved of it for he sought it for himself.

A lady visited the prison about this period whom Jerry describes as Miss D—, who took an interest in him and read the Bible and prayed with him. Eventually, Jerry was induced to pray for himself, and as he prayed his convictions and desire for pardon increased. One night in an agony of seeking he resolved to pray until he found peace. He threw himself on the stone floor of his cell and wept and prayed there determined that he would not sleep until God had forgiven his sins. In the night occurred which to this day Jerry professes himself unable to pronounce real or imaginary. He seemed to feel a hand laid on his head and heard a voice saying: "Thy sins which are many are forgiven." At that time he evidently believed in its reality, and accepted it as an assurance of acceptance; for he rose from his prostrate position and commenced praising God. The guard pacing the corridor was astonished by hearing in the dead of night the cell echo with shouting and the noise of hands clapping and the prisoner jumping about. He was alarmed, and opened the door to ascertain the cause. Next day Jerry was reported for disorderly behavior. But it was the only time. Jerry was a changed man, and as long as he remained in the prison he continued steadfast.

The joy and happiness that filled his soul could not be hidden. Jerry commenced work among his fellow-prisoners. He knew little of the Bible, less still of theology, but he could tell the men working out their punishment of a power which had renovated him and filled his heart with joy. Several of those men were converted, others of them, of whom Jerry had hopes, fell away after their release, but he kept track of them, and after he was liberated and at work for God he had the happiness of seeing them all restored. Jerry had by this time served seven years and six months—half his sentence. The prison officers reported favorably of him, and he received

A PARDON FROM THE GOVERNOR.

Outside the prison walls Jerry encountered a trying ordeal. He knew the consequences of going back to his old haunts in the Fourth Ward, and as he wandered about, not knowing where to go, he was sufficiently cautious to abstain from going there. "I wanted to do right," Jerry says; "I wanted to please God. I inquired for a prayer-meeting. I was told of one; but when I got to the door I was afraid to enter. I had never been to a Protestant place of worship, and nobody invited me in. Most unfortunately the only friend I found directed me to a lager-beer saloon to board. Lager beer had come up since I went to prison, and I did not know what it was. They told me it was a harmless drink, wholesome and good, and simple as root-beer. I drank, and that began my downfall. My head got confused. The old appetite was awakened. From that time I drank it every day, and it was not long before I went from that to stronger liquors.

"The night I stopped praying I shall never forget. I felt as wretched as I did the day I went to prison. And now began a career of sin and ual as well as social greatness. They are jealous of all individual superiority; they like all to stand on the same level, and will, as they ascend to supreme power, effectually dwarf the individual. The scythe of Democracy, so to speak, reduces society to one dead if verdant, level; and the flower of the field, that presumes to lift itself above the surrounding grass, is cut down.

"LEVELLING UP" AND "LEVELLING DOWN."

Now there is, without doubt, a considerable amount of truth in this argument. We see going on around us at the present time a twofold process, the united influence of which must assuredly bring about some such result. We see, on the one hand, what may be called the "levelling up" process of education, the effect of which is to raise the masses to an intellectual level hitherto exclusively held by those who regarded themselves as the higher classes—the distinction between the educated and the uneducated being to a great extent obliterated; and, at the same time, we see also what may be called a great "levelling down" process, leading to the gradual or violent abolition not only of the kings and statesmen by whom the world has hitherto been governed, but to the existence of all privileged classes.

THE FORCE OF AN INDIVIDUAL.

Still this is only one side of the truth; there is another, very germane to the subject before us, which is well put in a recent article in the Spectator. The writer of that article says: "The lesson of our day is—the Titanic force an individual can acquire. If Socialism once recognizes him as one who should either govern or lead, the tendency of the masses is to make his individuality even too great a thing. Look for a moment over the events of the week ending January 13th. On Saturday, France followed a citizen to the grave. On Monday, all England visibly winced because another citizen was believed, erroneously, to be seriously ill. On Tuesday, all Germany felt a thrill of interest because a third citizen chose unexpectedly to appear in Parliament, and apologize for not speaking.

Surely, if three men in history ever were recognized and supported and obeyed by the Demos, they were M. Gambetta, Mr. Gladstone, and Prince Bismarck. There was not a hostile critic in France who did not regard M. Gambetta's hold over the people as too great for his country's good. There is not a Tory in England who does not dwell on the "infatuation" of the people for Mr. Gladstone. There is not a politician in Europe who does not see and say that the unwillingness of Germans to let Prince Bismarck resign and disappear is, of all visible obstacles to free Parliamentary action in Germany, the one most immediately felt. The disappearance of M. Gambetta will, and that of Mr. Gladstone or Prince Bismarck would, it is believed, alter history. That belief may be accurate or otherwise; and still it remains true—that an individual can, in spite of wide suffrages, become as great in our generation as he ever could in any period of the world's career. So far from the individual dwindling, he looms larger, and his force grows greater and greater."

THE MAN MADE GREAT BY THE DEMOS.

These remarks are unquestionably true. While Socialism has an almost irresistible tendency to dwarf and discredit all ordinary forms of individual greatness, it at the same time and, paradoxical as the statement may appear, for that very reason, has an equally decided and equally irresistible tendency to magnify and throw into stronger relief at least some forms of extraordinary individual greatness. In point of fact, the relation in which a truly colossal individual stands, on the one hand, to a monarchic or aristocratic form of government, and, on the other hand, to a pure Democracy, may, I think, be fairly illustrated by the different aspects under which a mountain like Snowdon presents, rising as it does amid surrounding though less lofty hills, and the impression it would make if Wales were reduced to a vast level plain, in the midst of which it reared its three thousand six hundred feet sheer into the sky—fixing the undistracted gaze, and dominating the unoccupied mind of every beholder. For instance: If, besides Gambetta, France now had possessed other great—though still inferior—statesmen, neither would Gambetta have possessed his extraordinary influence over the Republican party, nor would his death be regarded as so irreparable a calamity.

THE PAUCITY OF GREAT MEN.

Now surely one of the most remarkable and suggestive social phenomena presented to the thoughtful observer of the days in which our lot is cast, is the general and rapid disappearance of truly great men from our midst, while apparently no one can detect the rising stars destined to replace them. This is almost equally true of all departments of civilized society. It is not merely that when Gladstone and Bismarck follow Gambetta, as from the age of the one and the infirmities of the other they needs must do ere long, neither Europe nor America will possess any statesman of the same calibre, or strong enough to grapple effectually with the great political questions which are now pressing for solution. But where are the great spiritual leaders who shall pilot the laboring and leaking bark of Christianity through the terrible storms that are coming down, and keep it off the rocks of Atheism and Materialism on which, to human eyes, it seems in danger of being utterly wrecked? Where are the Pauls, the Augustines, the Luthers, the Calvins, or even the Wesleys and the Irvings of the past? Will the childish Ritualist, with his ecclesiastical toys and muttered incantations, or the commonplace and compromising Evangelical, or the grotesque antics and moneybonds of General Booth and his ignorant followers, supply their place?

THE SECULAR SPHERE.

And is it not the same in all the secular departments of human knowledge? Where are the profound philosophers, the great poets, the splendid painters, the distinguished men of letters? With Tennyson our last great poet will pass away; with Ruskin our finest critic; with Newman our most illustrious schoolman; while in the grave of Carlyle we buried our last great writer; and in that of Darwin the most influential of the scientists of the day. And as it is in England, so is it throughout the civilized world. Where in America, or Germany, or France, or Italy, can we point to one man of transcendent genius? No; we have fallen upon a time of large masses of little men; and civilized society is becoming more and more like some huge blind and dumb monster of the deep, rolling its unwieldy bulk along, utterly ignorant of the peril into which it is drifting. More and more will it realize its own helplessness and inability to guide itself; and more and more, therefore, will it desire some great deliverer—some COMING MAN, who will interpret its aspirations, embody its spirit, and concentrate and direct its tremendous latent energies.

And he will come. He will come—because, till he does the corrupt tree of fallen humanity will not have yielded its last and most perfect fruit. He will come—for the world is waiting for him, even as the Church is, or should be, waiting for Another, and will soon grow impatient for his coming. He will come—for all God's holy prophets have predicted his coming, and their predictions were indorsed by the Lord Himself when He said: "I am come (a human person 'as concerning the flesh') in My Father's name, and ye receive Me not; if another (human person) shall come in his own name, him ye will receive." (John 5 : 43.)

THE GOAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Most truly, and singularly in accord with what we have already written, does Dr. Anderson add, "The realization of this dream will be the fulfilment of prophecy. True it is that popular movements characterize the age, rather than the power of individual minds. It is an age of mobs. Democracy, not despotism, is the goal toward which civilization is tending. But Democracy in its full development is one of the surest roads to despotism. First, the revolution; then, the plebiscite; then, the despot. The Cæsar often owes his sceptre to the mob." "Our belief is," says the writer in the Spectator, already quoted, "that the multitude so far from disliking, or distrusting, or envying individual greatness, is disposed, when it sees it, to worship it too much, to trust it too fully, as if greatness must be great in all things; to think too despondently of the vacuum created by its disappearance. A letter was published a short time ago from Mr. Gladstone, giving in almost passionate terms his appreciation of Dante. We undertake to prophesy, rash as it may seem, that the letter will sell whole editions of Cary's 'Dante,' and that among men who do not know in the least Mr. Gladstone's exceptional right to give an opinion on Italian literature.

A GREAT TRUTH ILLUSTRATED.

"That is a mere illustration of one of the most important of political truths—the deep inner humility of the Democracy, its desire to find anywhere guides abler, more instructed; above all, more percipient, than itself. The jealous Democracy! It has been creating heroes and kings and gods from everlasting. When the barriers break down, as they broke down in the Civil War, and the people recognize greatness as they recognized it in Abraham Lincoln, they allow him individuality enough. President Lincoln, had he lived, would have towered among his people as much as any figure in the Old World. . . . . In genuine Democracies, the individual tends, if once recognized, to be greater than in states under monarchs."

Now what kind of personage is Antichrist to be; and how will he attain the position and power which he must inevitably gain? On this important point much misconception has existed, and to some extent still exists. There has been a disposition to invest him—like his dread inspirer, Satan—with many grotesque and abnormal characteristics. According to some ancient writers he is to be a veritable incarnation of the Evil One; according to others he will present some special and repulsive physical peculiarities; while in the popular imagination there is reason to fear that he is pictured as being really an impossible "Beast" having seven heads and ten horns. All this is worse than imaginary—it is actually delusive, besides tending to bring a very serious reality into contempt. If we met Antichrist in the streets of Paris or London to-morrow we should most probably find him a perfect gentleman. Our attention might very likely be arrested, but it would be in admiration, not in horror; and if we paused to ask a question concerning him it might be couched in such words as these—Who is that remarkable, that superb, that kingly man?

A MAN OF THE PEOPLE.

1. He will be a man of the people, in this respect resembling Abraham Lincoln, Gambetta, and the First Napoleon. No successor of a line of kings; no inheritor of a name already illustrious in the world's annals; a man of mean, if not despicable origin; "a vile person," as he is called by Daniel; with whom the people will feel the greater sympathy because one of themselves, and the maintainer of their right and cause; just as so many now feel a sympathy for the notorious Claimant and the infidel Bradlaugh, arising not from any personal interest in the aims of the one or the opinions of the other, but from an instinctive feeling that had they belonged to a higher rank they would have been differently treated.

[At this point Mr. Maude laid aside his pen through illness, using it once again only, and that to append his signature to a letter which he dictated, requesting us to finish the article which he so well began. Only three days afterward, his earthly race was finished; and he now stands in the presence of the Lord and Saviour whom for so many years he loved and served so loyally. His end was in keeping with his life—peaceful and full of confidence in the unfailing mercy of God through Jesus Christ.]

READERS should understand that when an article published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD bears the name of the writer, that writer must be held individually responsible for the views therein advanced. The ministers whose sermons appear in this journal, and other contributors, must not be regarded as always endorsing views about which there is a wide divergence of opinion, even among Christians of eminent piety and learning.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Question of a Successor to the Late Postmaster-General Howe occupied the attention of the politicians last week to the exclusion of all other topics. It is stated that the President has been inundated with letters of advice and suggestions, and that several States have urged their claims for a representative in the Cabinet. The President, however, whose health necessitates a little relaxation and change of air, and who had previously decided on a trip to Florida for that purpose, desires to postpone the appointment of a Postmaster-General until his return. It is believed that the President has the right to fill the vacancy in the Post Office Department for a longer period than ten days, by an ad interim appointment, and the opinion of the Attorney-General on the question was asked, but at the close of last week had not been given. Among the men whose names are being pressed on the attention of the President are Mr. Robeson, of New Jersey, whose peculiar talents would find ample scope for exercise in the Post Office Department; Mr. Chauncey I. Filley, of Missouri, who has been mentioned for the same office in former administrations; Mr. Frank Hatton, the Assistant Postmaster-General and Colonel John A. Martin, of Kansas. Influential politicians, however, predict that the new Cabinet minister will be selected from either Ohio or Indiana.

Ex-Senator Kellogg of Louisiana Has Been indicted by the Washington Grand Jury in connection with the Star Route cases. The jury last week made two presentments, one of which was against Senator Kellogg alone, and the other against him and Brady jointly. Mr. Kellogg is charged with having received from James B. Price, a mail contractor on a post route from Monroe to Shreveport, in the State of Louisiana, and on a route from San Antonio to Corpus Christi, in Texas, $20,000 for the service of inducing Brady, then Second Assistant Postmaster-General, to award Price an increase of pay and compensation for expedition. The witnesses named are John A. Walsh, James B. Price, Joseph Cochran and J. W. Brady. The second presentment against Kellogg and Brady jointly, charges them with having conspired with Price to defraud the government by means of false oaths and fraudulent allowances for expedition, and false and fraudulent claims to be made for increased pay for expedition on the routes before described. It will be remembered that Walsh offered his testimony last summer, but the Grand Jury on that occasion found a bill against Brady and Price but exonerated Kellogg.

The Passion Play Was Produced in New York on Friday, March 30th, by Mr. Salmi Morse. The performance was styled a dress rehearsal, and the admission was by invitation, for which there was no charge. This arrangement was made to evade the law under which the license for the production of the play was refused by the mayor. The building was crowded with people until the police refused to permit any more to enter. Newspaper criticisms of the piece show that the protests against its production were amply justified, although persons who witnessed the play in Europe state that many of its blasphemous features were eliminated in the New York performance. It is announced that by taking advantage of a legal technicality Mr. Morse will be able to outrage Christian feeling by continuing the performance during this week.

An Effort to Perpetuate the Memory of the late Governor Alexander H. Stephens is being made. A movement has been started for the purchase of Liberty Hall, the home of the deceased statesman, by the people of Crawfordville and Taliaferro County, Georgia, that it may be preserved as a memorial of the "great Commoner;" and it is also proposed that Mr. W. W. Story be commissioned to execute a marble statue of Mr. Stephens in his roller chair for one of Georgia's niches in the National Capitol.

Reports of the Prohibition Movement in the West indicate that the present tendency of public opinion is in the direction of high license rather than of prohibition. The New York Tribune believes that outside of Maine no prohibitory amendments will pass the State Legislatures this year. Nevertheless, the agitation has so far aroused the public that restrictions on the liquor traffic find much favor in Ohio, Wisconsin, Illinois, Minnesota and Missouri. The latter State has, in fact, passed a law imposing a heavy tax upon the sale of intoxicants, and it is now in the hands of the governor. A similar measure was very near passing through the Illinois Legislature.

The Proposal to Erect a Statue of Martin Luther in Washington is advocated in an appeal issued by the Lutheran clergymen of that and other cities. It is intended that the statue shall be of bronze and of colossal size. It is proposed to purchase for this purpose a duplicate of the figure of the great reformer which stands in the centre of the celebrated group at Worms, and to erect it in front of the Lutheran Memorial Church, on the Thomas Circle, between Fourteenth Street and Vermont Avenue.

The Malagasy Envoys were Entertained in New York by the Congregational Club on March 26th, when Ravoninahitrinarivo, the chief ambassador, in the course of an eloquent speech made the following observations: "We have not been disappointed in coming among the American people. We had heard much of your greatness and national vigor, but now we see with our eyes that you are mightier even than your fame. But there is one thing in which we are your equals—we love national independence as much as you do. And we are trying to love other things which the white man's books and preaching tell us are good. But if our people find that the truths of Christianity and the blessings of commerce are the forerunners of European aggression, unprovoked and unjustifiable, then our growing love will be turned to hate, and neither Frenchmen nor Englishmen, nor Americans, will be able to land in safety upon our shores. To avert this sore disaster we do not ask you to take the field for us, but we beg you in the name of God and righteousness to let your voices be heard by your sister republic against her threatening demands. Surely we are not asking unreasonably. We simply appeal to you and to all Americans—lovers of liberty—for the use of those emancipative weapons which we are continually being taught to believe are a keener power than your swords."

Special Services are Being Held at the Brooklyn Tabernacle. On Monday last Rev. E. Payson Hammond commenced a series of meetings there which it is hoped God will bless to the conversion of many souls. Dr. Talmage requests that all readers of his sermons will pray for a blessing on this effort. Three meetings are held every day. At nine in the morning for prayer and praise; at half past three for the benefit of children and youths; and at eight in the evening for adults. Mr. and Mrs. Hammond have just returned from the Bermudas where they have been holding mission services. Their efforts there have enjoyed an abundant blessing. Services were held in the Episcopal and Presbyterian churches which were largely attended. The number of those who made a profession of faith through the blessing of God on those services, number more than eight hundred.

At an Enthusiastic Temperance Meeting in Brooklyn, N. Y., on March 27th, Mr. Eli Johnson, the well-known temperance advocate, received a warm welcome on his return from Australia, as our readers are aware from extracts from Australian papers published in these columns during his absence, Mr. Johnson with his famous black box aroused considerable enthusiasm in the English colony. Mr. Robert Graham, whose effort to check the illicit traffic in intoxicating liquors in New York city is still being pushed forward, was also present, and his enterprise was heartily commended.

A Plea for a Five Cent Subscription is Sent by our Baptist friends at Smithville, Clay County, Mo., to assist them in building a missionary church in that locality. They have been making strenuous exertions on their own account, but being few in number are still deficient of the full amount required to erect their edifice. They say they are "willing to sit upon planks," if they can only get their house up. If ministers in more wealthy sections of the country would collect a few nickels among their congregations and send to Smithville, they would render a service to the cause of religion that would be highly esteemed. Contributions may be sent to Mr. J. R. Shafer, Smithville, Clay County, Mo.

An Important Revival has Taken Place in Denver, Col. During the past ten weeks the Rev. H. W. Brown, of Chicago, has been laboring there with signal marks of God's blessing. His work commenced in connection with the First Baptist Church, but it spread to the Young Men's Christian Association, and through that institution to almost every church in the city. It has gradually extended and increased until no room in the city could be found large enough to seat the congregations, the Tabor Grand Opera House having been filled to overflowing and many hundreds went away unable to gain admittance.

At the Recent Meeting of the American Bible Society appropriations of money, amounting in the aggregate to $77,290, were made to the Levant and Mexican agencies, to the American Board of Colportage in Austria, to the Presbyterian Board for publication in Siam, and to the Bible Society of France for the publication of French Scriptures. Numerous grants of books were made for benevolent distribution in this and other lands, to the value of about $14,600. The Report presented at the meeting stated that the total receipts for February were $47,210, and that during the past month 91,261 copies of Scriptures were issued. Two hundred and seventy colporteurs are now commissioned to labor in twenty-five states and three territories.

A Brave Lady Succeeded in Avoiding Severe injuries, if not death, by an act of daring recently in California. A journal of that State describes the affair. It appears that the school-teacher at Yreka, Cal., while on her way to school through an open field was attacked by an infuriated steer. To have turned and run might have been fatal, and no man was near enough to rush to the rescue. She therefore did the only thing that could have saved her—literally took the bull by the horns, and so held on to him until help arrived. Few ladies would have had the presence of mind or the courage to grapple in that way with the infuriated beast, but many have displayed moral courage in dealing with the liquor traffic and other gigantic moral evils which has astonished their Christian brethren and which God has honored by His blessing (1 Cor. 1 : 27).

A Curious Sentence Was Passed by Justice Britt, of Uintah County, Utah, on a prisoner. The judge, who is a gubernatorial appointee, is, according to Utah journals, rather an eccentric magistrate, famous for deciding cases according to justice and disregarding the technicalities of the law when they would interfere with the rights of the cases. The prisoner in question was charged with arson, and the evidence having been heard, Judge Britt concluded that he was guilty. He then astonished the prisoner and the lawyers in court by passing sentence that the culprit should work forty days for the county and forty days also for the person whose property he had destroyed. The judge would doubtless have some difficulty in finding a statute authorizing his sentence, but the principles of justice were very carefully respected. This double aspect of offences too often escapes notice. It is only under the influence of the Holy Spirit that the sinner realizes that his sins are against God as well as against men (1 John 3 : 4).

A Recent Remarkable Surgical Operation which, though skilfully performed, failed to save the patient's life, has been the subject of comment in the press, and has elicited the statement of an instance in which the wounded man survived and is still living. A man who served in an artillery brigade at the battle of Petersburg on June 16th, 1864, was struck on the head by a Minie-ball which entered the skull. When taken to the hospital at Rochester his case was considered hopeless, but, nevertheless, received skilful attention. The surgeon extracted the ball and removed a number of minute fragments of bone. He was carefully nursed, but for more than four months his death was an event of daily apprehension, but he recovered, and is now a hale, active man, though with a depression in his skull over which there is no bone, and in which a walnut might be laid. How many cases are there of men wounded in the battle of vicious habit and strong temptation, which men have pronounced hopeless, but which when taken to the Great Physician have been healed and the victim delivered. (Matt. 17 : 17, 18.)

A Strange Lapse of Memory is Stated to Have been displayed by a man at Troy, N. Y., recently. A widow lady died in that city leaving considerable property, and as she left no will her affairs were settled up by her brother. A short time ago, and several months after the closing up of the accounts, a man went to Troy and made inquiries about the widow. He was told that she was dead and her property was divided by her brother, whose name was mentioned to him. He loudly declared that the brother was a fraud, that he himself was the widow's brother, and that she had no brother of the name mentioned. He gave instructions for contesting the settlement, and then retired for the night, vowing to expose and punish the fraud. The next day he appeared and said that, on examining the documents in the case, the recollection flashed upon him that he had a brother of the name mentioned, but that having been away from the family and having held no communication with them for thirty years, he had altogether forgotten the existence of this particular brother until his memory was refreshed by the documents in the administration proceedings. Certain acrimonious utterances recently published suggest the thought that there are Christian ministers and laymen who might also, if they referred to the New Testament, discover that those whom they have denounced are really their brethren (Heb. 2 : 11–13).

Made Deaf by a Kiss Was the Remarkable opinion recently given by an eminent aurist of New York in a case submitted to him by an affectionate couple who had travelled a long distance to consult him. It appears that a lady was sitting quietly in her chair, when her husband entered the room unawares to her, and going behind her playfully surprised her with a sonorous kiss on her ear. The wife was startled, but nothing more was thought of the incident until, some days afterward, it was found that she had lost the hearing of that ear. On consulting the New York physician the incident was mentioned, when he at once declared that it was the cause of her loss of hearing, and explained the injury the delicate organs of hearing had suffered. This sad result of the seal of affection could not but occasion the husband bitter regret ; had it been less complete, if it could have sealed his wife's ears only against slanders, malicious reports against himself, against bad language he and others would be glad so to kiss the ears of those they love. This is the effect of the pledge of affection that Christ gives to those who completely surrender themselves to Him. To all the suggestions of the evil one they turn a deaf ear (Psa. 38 : 12, 13).

A Lawyer's Clever Scheme Operated to his own disadvantage in a suit reported in the Kansas City, Mo., Times. It is stated that a lawyer, now of some eminence in his profession, was counsel for a lady who brought suit for divorce. By the lawyer's advice she made extensive purchases for which she pledged her husband's credit ; at the same time she secured all the money available. At the close of the suit her husband, beside having to pay a large sum to his wife as alimony, was required to pay all her debts. The total was so large that the man was ruined and became bankrupt. As the lady had profited so extensively by the lawyer's advice he expected to receive a heavy fee, but his demand was met by the answer archly given that he must apply to her husband, and the statement that she had the best authority (the lawyer's own), for believing that none of her creditors could hold her liable for her debts. As the husband was already bankrupt, the lawyer lost his fee. There was a relentless cruelty in plotting to increase the losses of the husband to such an extent as to ruin him, and the lawyer suffered a just retribution for his remorseless scheme. Solomon assures us that retribution is apt to overtake very clever people. (Prov. 26 : 27.)

A Curious Difference of Opinion as to the effect of marriage in a family has arisen at Fort Worth, Texas. A young man married the daughter of his boarding-house keeper without making any arrangement as to his future position in the establishment. He expected that in becoming a member of the family he would receive his board free. The landlady, on the contrary, expected that he would pay double the amount he had paid before his marriage. She accordingly at the end of the month presented a bill for the board of two persons—himself and his wife, which the bridegroom refused to pay. Then there was a dispute which the landlady settled by depositing their private effects on the sidewalk, and locking the door against her daughter and son-in-law the first time they went out of doors. The young man's conduct was governed by principles which seem to operate in other cases beside matrimony. He is not the only man who endeavors to enjoy the privileges belonging to his position while trying to evade its duties. There are few churches in which such men cannot be found enjoying the status the profession of religion gives in these days, and entering into its privileges, but doing nothing for, and giving as little as possible to, the Master's service (2 Thess. 3 : 10).

INCENSE AND LIGHT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And Aaron shall burn thereon sweet incense every morning : when he dresseth the lamps, he shall burn incense upon it. And when Aaron lighteth the lamps at even, he shall burn incense upon it, a perpetual incense before the Lord throughout your generations."—Exodus 30 : 7, 8.

Certain ceremonies under the law were only of annual celebration ; while other matters were of daily observation ; and by the daily repetition were intended to be set forth as eminently constant and perpetual. These daily ordinances were to be regarded by the children of Israel as of standing obligation, abiding types of constant necessity, never to be removed so long as the dispensation should last.

When the priest went into the tabernacle he could not enter it without being warned of sin and of sacrifice, for at the entrance of the holy place stood an altar of brass, upon which there was offered every morning a lamb and every evening a lamb. This taught that access to God was not possible except by expiation—expiation by bloody sacrifice, expiation by the death of a substituted victim, expiation which must continue as long as sin remained. You could not enter even into the first court without the sight of an altar, and blood, and fire ; thus showing us that there is no coming to God, even on the ordinary level of Christian experience, apart from the atonement made by our Lord Jesus, who is "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world."

Before the innermost sanctuary there hung a substantial veil, and the entrance into the Holy of Holies was only permitted once in the year. If that veil had been lifted up so that we could enter, we should have found at the door to represent again our Lord Jesus Christ under another aspect ; for on that golden altar there was offered a sweet perfume of precious spices, denoting His perpetual intercession on the behalf of His people, and His enduring merits which are continually being presented by Himself before the throne of the Most High. To go within the veil you must pass by the altar of incense.

Learn hence that to the door of the inner chamber of communion with God we must approach by the perfect merit of our redeeming Lord. We come not in our own merit ; but we are "accepted in the Beloved." If we have ever been favored with high and holy communion with God, such as He reserves for favored saints ; if we have been enabled to come boldly to the throne of the heavenly grace, and have looked into the tempered brightness of that light which shines above the mercy-seat, we have come only by virtue of the infinite merit of our Lord Jesus.

The lowest form of communion in the outer court must be by the sacrifice of Jesus ; and the highest form of communion, even that which is most intense and most delightful, is still by Christ ; the incense sets forth His merit, and that is not without blood, for once in the year the horns of the altar were smeared with the blood which had been carried within the veil. Never try to draw near to God in prayer, or praise, or meditation, or Scripture reading, or holy service apart from Jesus Christ, or your attempt must be a failure. Through the wall of fire which surrounds the throne you can only pass by way of the one door, namely, the body and blood of our great Mediator, Sacrifice, and Substitute. Is not that door sufficient? Why should we climb up some other way?

If I am very heavy of heart, do not let me try to raise my spirits, and so come in the power of human courage; but let me come just as I am, made bold through Him whose comforts delight my soul. If I feel that I have been sinning, do not let me try to get rid of my sin by some other process, and then draw near to God; but let me come, sinner as I am, in the name of the sinner's Saviour, and so draw near to God, having washed my robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Jesus saith, "I am the way;" why should we seek another? Have nothing to do with an absolute God; only deal with Him through a mediator, and keep to that way, for no man cometh unto the Father but by the Lord Jesus. Oh, ye most experienced and privileged ones, take good note of the golden altar, and whenever ye approach the mercy-seat let the cloud of its incense cover you and perfume your prayers.

Hard by the golden altar, which was nearest to the Holy of Holies, stood with its seven branches; these two instructive types were set near each other for a purpose which I would open up to-day. This candlestick was a matter of daily ordinance as much as the brazen altar of sacrifice, or the golden altar of incense; it was for continual use and was therefore dressed twice each day. We have a continual want of the precious atonement of Christ, of the intercession of Christ, and of the light of God's Holy Spirit. These are not things for once in a year; these are matters for every day and all the day, and therefore they were attended to both at morning and at evening as if to shut in all the hours of the day within two golden doors. Every morning had its lamb, its burning incense, and its lighted lamp; and the same pertained to every evening all the year round. Thus all days were fringed and bordered with this threefold type; even as at this time all our days are sanctified by faith in the effectual expiation, joy in the prevailing intercession, and delight in the clear shining of the Spirit which makes glad all who are in the house.

This morning I desire to call your attention to the conjunction which was established by the divine law between the burning of the incense and the lighting of the lamps; these two things, being both of daily observance, were attended to at the same moment for reasons worthy of our study.

I. And first I call your attention to between the intercession of Christ for us, and the work of the Holy Spirit in us. See how on the grandest scale the incense of intercession and the lamp of spiritual illumination are set side by side. He whose merit brings us life is in divine alliance with Him who brings us light; indeed, there is such unity between them that Jesus Himself is said to be a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of His people Israel. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ brings with it the communion of the Holy Ghost, for the Father has joined them together.

Note, that we have these both revealed in their fulness at the same time. When our Lord ascended on high to plead before the throne, the Spirit descended to abide in the Church. After the Lord was taken up the disciples received the promise of the Father and were illuminated by the Holy Ghost. Jesus our great High-Priest presented the sweet savor of His own person and work before the eternal throne; and then came the Spirit of God as tongues of fire lighting up the sons of men and making them to be as candles of the Lord.

Now, as they were connected historically, so are they continually connected as a matter of fact. At this day it is as it was at Pentecost; our Lord hath not ceased to intercede, and the Spirit hath not ceased to illuminate. Herein lies our hope for our own eternal salvation, in the ceaseless plea and the quenchless light. For the working out of that which God is working in us, both to will and to do of his own good pleasure, we have these two guarantees and helps—the Saviour praying and the Spirit shining.

Furthermore, this conjunction, as it is a matter of history, and as it is continuous, will always be seen by us personally when our prayer is the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man that availeth much. It needs the Trinity to make a Christian, it needs the Trinity to make a Christian prayer. The Father must hear us, else of what avail are our cries? But the ordained Mediator must also stand between us and the Father, presenting His merit like the smoke of sweet incense, or else our prayer can never be accepted of God; and to come down closer to ourselves, the Spirit of God must also help our infirmities, for we know not what we should pray for as we ought. So that whenever we pray we must have these two in happy conjunction: intercession and enlightenment; incense and light.

But then there is our second comfort, that Jesus stands ready to take every prayer of ours, however imperfect in knowledge, however feeble in expression, however marred with sorrow, and He presents the purified and perfected prayer with His own merit, and it is sure to speed. The sins of our holy things are seldom absent, and hence the constant need that we have an Advocate. Blessed be God for that inspired word, "If any man sin, with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." True prayer is the offering to God of the merit of the Lord Jesus, and hence it must be accepted. What can be refused to merit such as His?

WE HAVE AN ADVOCATE

It is written in the book of the Revelation—"And another angel came and stood at the altar, having a golden censer; and there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne. And the smoke of the incense, which came with the prayers of the saints, ascended up before God out of the angel's hand." Can we doubt the success of prayers presented by the angel of the covenant? Assuredly not. I like to think of the incense, and of the lamp, and, best of all, of the two together, for these two enable me to come boldly to the throne of the heavenly grace to obtain mercy and find grace. Acceptance through sweet savor, and light through divine teaching, are both mine as my soul waiteth upon God, with her expectation turned toward Him.

The picture before you is a very beautiful one. Here are spices of the most precious kind, made up into a compound such as never was compounded for any other purpose. This of sweet odors is placed in the censer upon the golden altar—that is to say, eternal acceptance is found in the person of Christ. The incense is kindled with fire from on high. What follows? The spices begin to burn, and up ascends a pillar of smoke. See how it rises high into the clear air, and as it rises it expands like a cloud, covers the sky, is wafted all around, and perfumes the whole air with its own exceeding fragrance. It rises and rises till it enters heaven—yea, and the heaven of heavens; its sacred odor is recognized in every golden street; it fills every chamber of the glorious "house of God not made with hands." Such is the merit of Christ that through its sweet savor God looks down upon the world and treats it with long-suffering, and tenderness, and mercy. Is it not a blessed picture?

And now you and I may follow in the track of God, and go out and preach the Gospel to every creature without the slightest fear, because the whole air is perfumed with the incense of a Saviour's mediatorial work. Although not perceptible by carnal sense, yet the inward spirit in the soul of the believer perceives the grateful odor of the finished work of the ever-living Saviour sweetening all things, so that now we call nothing common or unclean, but are prepared to deliver our message to the vilest of the vile. God in Christ is kind even to the unthankful and the evil, and wills that supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks be made for all men; and that to every creature the Gospel should be preached.

We shall not, however, proceed to any practical purpose unless we recollect next that, when God come to deals with men, it is with the light of the Spirit as well as with the merit of Christ. The golden candlestick is as needful as the golden censer; for God's work among men is ever by His Spirit. He is seeking out His people as the woman sought out her lost piece of money, and it is significant that it is written, "She did light a candle, and sweep the house." God in His work of salvation comes to men with the candle of His Word lighted through the Holy Spirit; and through the teaching of His Word from day to day that Spirit shines as from a lantern among the sons of men. To us Jehovah is our light and our salvation, and when we go in His name we must not go without the light. Thus you see we come to God by the incense and the light; and even so doth God come down to man to bless him.

II. Secondly, our text seems to me to teach the CONNECTION BETWEEN PRAYER AND KNOWLEDGE.

The golden altar represents intercession offered by Christ, and also the prayers of all the saints, which are accepted through His intercession; and as the candlestick stood side by side with it, and represented the light of the Spirit of truth, so must true prayer and true knowledge never be separated.

So I gather, first, that prayer should be attended with knowledge. It is ill when men worship they know not what. God is light, and He will not have His people worship Him in the dark. When they burn the incense they must also light the lamp. Supplicants must know what they are asking, or they are not really asking. And you, dear people of God, please notice that the more divine knowledge you get, all things being equal, the more complete will your prayers become. "Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ;" light the lamp at the same time that you kindle the incense.

For instance, when you pray, what prayer can there be without knowing God our Father? How can you pray aright to an unknown God? The more knowledge of God the more correct does prayer become. He that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is the rewarder of them that diligently seek Him. What prayer can there be apart from the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ? If we know nothing of Him by whom we pray, how full of sins of ignorance will our prayers be! It is well also to have a deep, sensible knowledge of sin. Penitential prayers are impossible without this, and how can prayers be accepted if penitence be not mixed with our petitions? We want at the same time that we have the knowledge of sin to have also a knowledge of our own weakness. The man who is consciously weak prays for strength; but he who dreams that he is strong will not do so. You need to study yourselves before you pray, so as to ask for those things in which you are most deficient, and for protection against those constitutional tendencies or besetting sins to which you are most subject.

The prayer of ignorance is like an arrow shot by a blind man, which is not likely to hit the mark. In proportion as petitions arise from a heart fully instructed in its own necessities they will be likely to ask for the right blessings, and to be prepared aright before the Lord. David wished his prayers to be accepted, and hence he cried, "Let my prayer be set forth before Thee as incense."

A supremely excellent piece of knowledge is to know the promises which we are to plead. Here you have

THE VERY SINEWS OF PRAYER.

When a man knows the promise suitable to his case, and lays it before God, saying, "Do as thou hast said," he presents the best form of supplication. Remember how Jacob pleaded with the Lord the sacred word of promise, saying, "Thou saidst, I will surely do thee good." When we have looked at all the bearings of the petition so as to make quite certain that it is a petition the fulfilment of which will glorify God; when we see that it must be consistent with the divine will because of the various statements which God has made in His Word, and because of promises which He has given concerning the matter; then, with the lamp shining clearly upon us, we shall kindle the incense the more discreetly and boldly, and both our prayers and our meditations will be the more accepted of the Lord.

Do try, especially, dear brethren, you that pray in public, to light the lamps when you kindle the incense. It will be for the good of us all if petitions are thoughtful, suitable, scriptural, and withal fresh and hearty. Let us never degenerate into repeating the same expressions till they grow to be cant; let us never drop into the use of hackneyed prayers for everything in general and for nothing in particular; but as instructed men, having thought of what we are going to say, having adapted our prayer to our circumstances and needs, let us order our case before the Lord, and fill our mouth with arguments. Burn the incense of prayer in the light of the Spirit of revelation, praying in the Holy Ghost.

But now turn the thought round the other way—knowledge should always be accompanied by prayer. Whenever we are taught of God, His teaching almost always comes in connection with prayer; but lest we should solely try to learn and forget to pray, let me remind you of a few particulars. Dear brother, as a Christian thou art a disciple, or student; be also a suppliant. When thou art impressed with the greatness, or the goodness, or the immutability, or the faithfulness of God, straightway turn thine impressions into supplications. Pray the great God to be gracious to thee; ask the unchangeable God to be the same to thee; beg the faithful God to keep His promises to thee; implore the mighty God to uphold thee. As thou learnest more and more of God, place the light near the incense by using thy knowledge in thy pleadings.

III. I desire, in the third place, to show some between the incense and the lamp. Let us read the text again: "And Aaron shall burn thereon sweet incense every morning: when he dresseth the lamps, he shall burn incense upon it." So, then, there should be prayer especially at the dressing of the lamps; that is to say, when preparing our minds for that ministry by which we enlighten the people among whom we dwell we should be specially earnest in prayer. Preparation for preaching and teaching is most important; God's work is not to be done carelessly as boys shoot arrows at random in their play. We must prepare both by reading and pleading; we must, like the apostles, give ourselves to the Word of God and prayer. We are told by ancient Rabbis that when the priest who was appointed for that office went into the holy place he took with him the golden snuffers and the golden snuff dishes, and a vessel full of pure olive oil and by the help of these he attended to the trimming of the golden lamp.

When we go into our studies to try and let us remember that our first business is to pray. Alas, we have much of smoking wick about us; much negligence, much ignorance, many mistakes and errors; and thereby we shall grieve the Lord if Jesus is not called in to cover all. When we are preparing in secret to serve the Lord in public we shall make poor work of it if we do not beforehand draw near to God in prayer. We need that our garments should be made to smell of myrrh and aloes and cassia by being covered with the merit of Jesus, or else we shall offend even while engaged in the holy act of preparing to spread abroad the light of divine truth.

You have to trim your lamps, brethren and sisters, when you go into the Sunday-school—at least, I hope you do. I hope you do not run into your class with anything which first comes to hand; if you do not snuff your candles and feed your lamps with fresh oil your children will sit in darkness before a lamp which does not shine. No, there ought to be careful preparation, according as your time and ability will allow, and above all the pouring in of the holy oil of the Holy Spirit, by fresh fellowship with Jesus. In that process one of the chief elements is prayer.

One thing more, this burning of the incense was not only at the dressing of the lamps, but also at the kindling of the lamps, when they began to shine. I want to plead, dear friends, very heartily with you that when it is my privilege to come here this week and at all other times to light the lamps, you who are my beloved helpers will take care to burn the incense at the same time. We need the incense of prayer more than ever in these latter days. Did you ever notice in Ezekiel 41 : 22 that an altar of incense is spoken of, but its dimensions are twice as great as those of the golden altar in the Tabernacle; as if, say some, to teach us that in these Gospel times prayer would become more abundant and would be offered up more frequently than ever. The altar mentioned by Ezekiel was of wood, as if to show that our worship is to become more simple, and to be more divested of everything that is pompous and showy; indeed, the altar disappears, and we read, "This is the table that is before the Lord;" you will guess the meaning.

Malachi has a glorious prophecy. "For from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same My name shall be great among the Gentiles; and in every place incense shall be offered unto My name, and a pure offering; for My name shall be great among the heathen, saith the Lord of hosts." Are you not charmed by the divine prophecy? Will you not, yourselves, help to fulfil it?

We know that this altar of incense meant prayer, because the Jews themselves so interpreted it. In the first chapter of Luke we read of Zacharias, that it was his turn in the order of his course to go into the holy place to offer incense, and it says, "And the whole multitude of the people were praying without at the time of incense." Just so, the offering of and therefore I plead, that while we are lighting the lamps by preaching the Gospel, you will burn the incense by being constantly in prayer. Brethren, pray for us. Paul spake thus; how much more may I? Dismiss me or else intercede for me. Joshua could not prevail except as Moses held up his hands. Our lamp-lighting will not succeed unless you burn the incense.

Peter's sermon at Pentecost did not derive its force from Peter's zeal, or from its own eloquence, but from another source. Of course, all the power came from the Spirit of God; but why did the Spirit of God work so mightily on that day? Surely it was because the entire church was earnestly praying while Peter was preaching. "They were all with one accord in one place;" nobody was away, they were all there, and when the one man stood up to preach, he might well light three thousand lamps, for all the fervent company of the faithful were causing the incense of prayer to ascend to heaven.

Give me this aid this morning. Pray God to bless each word that has been spoken. Pray that some poor sinner's soul may be perfumed by the merits of Jesus and illuminated with the light divine; and it shall be done, for the Lord heareth His people. We want more and more to be a praying Church, and then we shall be a growing Church; hitherto we have had a great blessing, but the windows of heaven are wide enough for a greater one to come down through them. The more we plead with God, and the more we set forth the light of the Gospel, the more will God be with us, and build up in this place a temple for His praise. May His love be with you. Amen.

THE LATE MR. WILLIAM MAUDE.

(See Portrait, page 220.)

Many readers, interested and instructed by the articles on Prophecy which have from time to time appeared in The Christian Herald from the pen of Rev. W. Maude, have made inquiries about him. These and others, who were also indebted to him for light on passages of God's Word not easily understood, will regret to hear of his death, which occurred on February 13th last. To the editor of this journal the loss occasioned by Mr. Maude's death is a very sorrowful one. Mr. Maude was a wise counsellor as well as a warm personal friend. He was of a singularly modest and retiring disposition, and it was only to his friends that his worth was fully known. In the course of a correspondence covering the last four years, Mr. Maude has proved that he possessed genial qualities and profound sagacity of which a slight acquaintance gave no evidence. It is with genuine sorrow that we pay this tribute to his memory.

William Maude, whose portrait appears on page 220, was born February 25th, 1827, at Cape Town, South Africa, where his father then resided. When he was ten years of age his parents went to England, and settled in Liverpool. In that city and neighborhood, with the exception of five years spent in London, the remainder of Mr. Maude's life was passed.

Having been born with valvular disease of the heart, he was always very delicate. On the occasion of one of his childish illnesses, his mother asked of the medical practitioner, "Will he probably live to grow up?" The reply was, "It is to be hoped not, for he will be a sufferer all his life." However, God had work for him to do in the world, and in spite of repeated attacks which brought him to death's door, he lived until February 13th, 1883, and thus nearly completed the fifty-sixth year of his age.

The critical state of his health during childhood and youth, deprived him of the advantages of a regular school-course, and it was only for about two years that he went to school, attending the Liverpool Institute. This, however, was largely compensated for by his passion for reading; and the quiet life rendered necessary by the state of his health enabled him to devote much time to it. This, and experimental chemistry, were indeed the almost sole recreations he enjoyed, for from all sports and active employment his delicate state of health debarred him.

He used when a boy to weep because he thought himself "very ignorant," yet in after life a writer once described him as "the best quoter he had ever met with." The books he read were not only remembered, but the knowledge gained seemed always ready at hand when wanted.

He was converted to Christ at the age of seventeen, and from that time until his death this year he was ever active with tongue and pen in the Master's service. Soon after his conversion he was attacked by serious illness, and for several weeks his death was apprehended. But he recovered, though it was evident that the ardor of his theological studies must be abated.

LITERARY WORK.

Soon after his recovery, and before he was twenty, he published a small book entitled "The Christian's Daily Portion," a compilation of a text of Scripture with a remark upon it, and a verse of poetry. It is somewhat remarkable that the portion for February 13th, which proved to be the day of his death, is this: "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning. There will soon be a last tear, never a last joy."

He was for some years of his early manhood a constant attendant on the minstry of Rev. Dr. McNeil, for whom he had great admiration. From him he acquired the first impulse to which continued to the close of his life. Only a few days before he died he was busily engaged upon the article on "Antichrist," which he was unable to complete, and which appears on another page of this number.

In 1875 he removed to Finchley, and two years afterward to London. During the chief part of the ten years between 1870 and 1880 he conducted, first in Liscard, afterward at Finchley, a weekly meeting for Bible study. Those who attended these meetings found them most valuable, both in respect to knowledge gained of the Word of God, the impetus given to Bible study, and the stimulus gained in the spiritual life.

In 1879 his residence in London came to a termination. The air impregnated with fog and smoke affected him injuriously. His physicians pronounced him slowly dying, and urged his removal to clearer air as the only means of prolonging his life. From November last his strength gradually declined, and all work was an effort.

HIS LAST EARTHLY WORK.

On Saturday, February 3d, he was in Liverpool, but returned much exhausted. An attack of jaundice had been for some time coming on, and now exhibited aggravated symptoms. Up to Monday, February 5th, he was, however, able to write as usual. Next morning at five o'clock he was seized with shivering and retching, and remarked to his wife that he was dying. That attack passed off, but left him for the two following days in a state of extreme exhaustion, in which he was often only half conscious. On the third day he somewhat rallied, and hopes were entertained of permanent improvement; but the favorable symptoms did not continue. It soon became evident that there was no hope. On Saturday, Feb. 10th, he sent off, though not quite completed, the article which appears in this number, with the request that another hand might complete it. Later in the day he spoke of what was to be done when he was gone, and evidently thought he should not recover. Still it was not till the following Tuesday, when evidently dying, that he realized that the end was actually come.

PEACEFUL FAREWELL.

Being told the doctor's opinion that death was very near, he showed not the slightest excitement or perturbation of mind, and said he was glad to go except for leaving those dear to him. During the previous week he remarked, as he had often previously done, that he had not the slightest misgiving with regard to the future, but had a great dread of the physical pain of dying. On the last day he suffered much from the difficulty of breathing, consequent upon a congested state of the lungs and very feeble action of the heart.

In one of the calmer intervals he said in a clear voice, "Well, I can say with the late Archbishop of Canterbury, if this is dying, it is not so bad after all." Another time, being asked if he felt at perfect peace with God through faith in Christ, he answered "Yes." Almost his last words were, "I want to rest," and calmly and quietly he passed away. He was interred as he had wished, in a small graveyard near his residence in Liscard, but to all who knew him it is indeed true that "he being dead, yet speaketh." He has passed, to use his own favorite expression, into "another room of the Father's house," where the weak, suffering body will no more clog the spirit, and where physical and mental depression, the result of disease, will melt away in the sunlight of God's presence.

MISSIONARIES AMONG THE ALGERIAN ARABS.

In a letter sent home by Mrs. Pearse, who with her husband endeavored while in Algeria to spread the Gospel among the Arabs, she gives the following narrative of their experience. She writes from Setif, a town near Constantine, Algeria, Africa: "Some 8000 people, chiefly Arabs from the plains, pour in to Setif to the weekly market on Thursday, on horses, mules, donkeys, and camels. What an interesting sight—the sunrise upon the distant mountains imparting its glorious hues; the patient beasts of the desert with their stately tread, laden with corn, their young following them; Arabs on foot with their flocks. Here, in a vast square, goats, sheep, and oxen are disposed of.

"We rose at sunrise, well stored with Arabic tracts and books, and watched them gathering from every quarter. Their Koran recognizes Jesus as a heaven-sent man, admits His miraculous birth, but does not look on Him as a Saviour. We looked about and prayed, feeling our nothingness and impotence among such a mass of untutored, wild, and illiterate men; but their bearing is dignified, and they are mostly fine men, and Mrs. Grimké's Arabic illustrated cards make them smile and show their white teeth. The mounted Arab police, in their red cloaks, and on Arab horses, kept order. On one side there was a circle formed around an improvisatore reciting a long poem, with animated countenance and fiery eye.

"We began our distribution with the shepherds, who at first seemed rather suspicious, but when they found we were foreigners they accosted us in an unintelligible lingo which they thought was English or French. Soon our tempting little books were produced, and like sheep they followed one after another, and began to be eager to get them, and we heard 'Donnez!' (Give!) on all sides—the boys being very pertinacious, full of fun and frolic, as everywhere. Then we got among the goats, and the owners had to beat off the crowd which pressed around. Now we went among the horned cattle and mules. Not a heel moved, not a horn pushed us, and we felt that we could have kept among them for hours, and that the Lord was with us. It was very evident no such thing had ever before been done among them.

"We had given our last book, and only reserved an Arab portion, and on leaving the market were met by an Arab policeman, to whom we gave it. After reaching our lodgings, the policeman followed us, inviting us to come to the Commissaire de Police. The latter gave us to understand that we were infringing the laws, but my husband proved to him, from Article 3 of the new French law on colportage, that we had full liberty to act as we were doing; he conceded this, and we went our way. The climate here is fine, and provisions cheap (half the price of Paris). The country around is grand because of the wide extent of plain and distant mountains, the air fine and bracing. The French protection and civilization are a great boon."

Work like this ought to be done by Christians wherever they go. If the thousands of our Christian citizens, who every year leave our shores to travel in the old world would distribute portions of God's word and religious literature they might be the means of doing great good. Little books might be obtained from the Bible Society and the Missionary Societies at comparatively small cost, printed in the languages of the East, which if distributed by travellers might arouse some souls to seek the Saviour, and would in any case spread abroad the knowledge of Him who came to rescue the world from ignorance and spiritual darkness.

Mr. Stanbury Pleads for His Friend.

MR. STANBURY'S MISSION.

(See Illustration.)

"Will Mrs. Thornley see me this evening?" asked a man roughly but respectably clad, of a maid who answered the ring he gave at the door of a cottage in a country town. There appeared to be some hesitation about the answer to his question, but eventually he was admitted, and was ushered into a room in which two ladies were sitting. It would seem that the man was known and the purport of his visit was guessed; for although his reception was not cordial, there was an evidence of familiarity about the meeting that showed he had been there before.

"I have come to you once more, Mrs. Thornley," he said, addressing the younger of the two ladies, whose rich golden hair and delicate complexion gave her, as she reclined on a lounge in the dim light, the look of some ethereal creature of another world.

"If you have come on the same errand as you had last time you called, Mr. Stanbury, I can assure you it is useless." This was said by Mrs. Sterling, the elder lady, whose glance of maternal tenderness as she seated herself on the lounge plainly showed that the relationship between the two ladies was that of mother and daughter.

"I hope not, madam. I have certainly come to ask your daughter to return to her home, or at any rate to receive her husband, but I hope the circumstances I have to relate will induce you to give a different answer."

"We will hear what you have to say, Mr. Stanbury, but we know your friend's character so well, my daughter has suffered so severely from his misconduct, and we have been deceived so many times by his promises to reform that there is very little prospect of your being able to tell us anything that can change our determination. There is no reason why Mrs. Thornley should subject herself to neglect and insult from her husband while I live and can shelter her." So saying the old lady put her arm around her daughter's shoulder and drew her head on to her knees, where she fondly caressed the glossy, silken locks, as if to show the visitor that she was prepared to protect her daughter from trial.

"You are amply justified by the past, Mrs. Sterling, in coming to that decision, and I hope you will believe me when I say that if I thought Mrs. Thornley would be made unhappy by returning I would not advocate it for a moment. I believe Mr. Thornley's reformation is real and permanent, and that he will be a good, true, affectionate husband, if his wife will give him one more trial."

All this time Mrs. Thornley did not speak, but Mr. Stanbury saw tears glistening on her eyelashes and quietly stealing down her cheeks. It was clear that, however obdurate her mother's heart might be, the wife would be glad to forgive and forget. Mrs. Sterling, however, was incensed against her son-in-law, and with good cause. He had broken the most solemn vow, and had shamefully abused the beautiful, refined girl who had left her home to become his wife. She answered very decidedly:

"Alice will be guided by my advice in this matter, I trust, and I am opposed to her returning to a man who has forfeited all claim to her duty as a wife, and has shown himself unworthy of confidence."

"I know he has, my dear madam. I admit all you say, but I am pleading for mercy. We all need it and should be in bad case if we only received justice. Mr. Thornley has no ground for hope apart from that of his wife's forgiving spirit, and he has trespassed on that so heavily that he dare not hope even in that, or the would have come to plead for himself. I am sure there is more hope now than there has ever been before. I have been with him now for two weeks, and there is such a change in him as I never expected to see. He is absolutely without the craving for liquor. It seems to have been miraculously taken away. During the time I have been in his house he has not once expressed a desire for intoxicants, and I am certain he has not tasted any."

"That is a marvellous change, Mr. Stanbury. Pray how did it come about?"

"I ascribe it, madam, simply and solely to the power of God. In all his previous efforts at reformation he has made firm resolutions in his own strength, and has broken them; but this time the most remarkable feature of his case is his profound distrust of himself. It was in utter despair of his ever being able to deliver himself from his degrading thirst that he laid the foundation of his new life. He was induced to place his case in the hands of God, and there is no doubt that God is caring for him. There is no struggle with temptation as there was before. Temptation seems to have lost its power over him. His condition is one of childlike humility, and his faith grows stronger with every day of emancipation."

"Mamma, I must go," said Mrs. Thornley, rising to her feet and smiling through her tears.

Mrs. Sterling shook her head doubtfully. She was not convinced, but she was so far impressed as not to offer any opposition to her daughter's decision, only impressing upon her the fact that should she need it, a refuge was always open to her in her mother's home and heart.

But she never did need it. Accompanying Mr. Stanbury to her husband's home she was welcomed by a heart too full for words. Husband and wife first of all knelt together at the throne of grace, and besought Him who had commenced the good work to carry it on unto perfection. Their prayer was answered. The poor, degraded victim found as others have done before and since that God can and will deliver those who put their trust in Him.

FETTERS OF FASHION.

By Miss M. A. Paull,

An Appeal for Aid.

Mr. Courtenay opened the parlor door, and called out: "Mr. Beverley, will you step here?"

Louise looked up at him as he entered, and their eyes met.

"Miss Louise Sylvester?" said he, in a frank, pleasant voice.

"Mr. Beverley?" she answered in a low, sweet tone; and they shook hands. Then there was a difficult little pause. Uncle Reginald dispelled it by saying to the young man:

"Bring up your chair to the table, and have some fruit. I am going to ask you to take care of my niece for a little while, as I have business in the town."

Mr. Beverley had been noted for years as the easiest and coolest-mannered fellow in the world. But somehow his ease and coolness forsook him now; his polished grace vanished; he felt puzzled how to address this sweet country maiden.

"May I peel a pear for you, Miss Sylvester?"

It was an absurdly prosaic question; still something must be said, and it might lead to other conversation, so that would do as well as anything else to begin with. If she accepted, it would also give him occupation for his hands.

"Yes, please. Thank you very much."

Louise herself felt exceedingly inclined to laugh outright at the absurdity of the situation; but a sense of the horrified look of her mother and elder sisters could they hear her, and a fear of offending Mrs. Grundy, whom she had been so long taught to propitiate, restrained her mirth.

"You must have found it very hot walking here this afternoon, Miss Sylvester?" said Mr. Beverley, who was quite busy about the pear, and glad to be so occupied.

"It was certainly rather hot," responded Louise; "indeed, very hot. But then, I am fonder of hot weather than cold?"

"So am I. By the bye, don't you have some awfully cold weather here, being so near to those grand old Dartmoor hills?"

"I am so glad you like Dartmoor," said Louise, kindling at his enthusiasm about her native "tors." "Yes; it is cold. We have a good deal of snow. But, you know, 'sunny Devon' is a warm county compared to the north. I forget—do you come from the north or the east?"

Mr. Beverley smiled, and so did Louise; and each thought how well a smile became the face opposite his or her own.

"I am sorry to say," he answered, "that I am not wise enough to have come from the east; and yet I am a Londoner,"

"I should like to go to London," said Louise; "there are so many things I want to see there. Besides, London is the very heart of the nation. It must be a fine place."

Mr. Beverley sighed now. "So fine that you see I was anxious to leave it for awhile," he said; then suddenly, after a careful look at Louise Sylvester's open and gentle countenance, he added, "Miss Sylvester, your uncle has, I expect, told you something of my history?"

"Just a very little," she answered.

"You know why I am here?"

"Yes." She hesitated, and then continued, "and I admire you for your resolve."

"Thank you a thousand times. I don't want to excuse my sins, and yet I want you to know all, that you may really pity me. I was left an orphan when I was a mere boy, and I have no brothers nor sisters. I was, unfortunately for myself, rich; and therefore it was worth while for unprincipled men to court my society and flatter my pride, and make me believe myself a man, although in experience and judgment, I was a mere child. My guardian himself, though I suppose he meant to be a good man, did not recommend his piety by any kindness of manner. He was also rather too free in the use of wines; and I learned to drink at his table. Of course, when I gave way to excess, there was but little mercy shown to me. I went on from bad to worse, and when the old gentleman remonstrated with me, as he frequently did, I behaved rudely to him. As soon as ever I was of age, and free from his control, I left him. I took a suite of apartments at a fashionable hotel. But I am wearying you, and intruding myself upon you, most unmercifully."

"No, do go on," said Louise, very much interested in the recital, "I feel so sorry for you, you might have done so much good with your money." Loo was thinking of several of her poor old friends in Moreton Hampstead whose worldly affairs might have been benefited by what Mr. Beverley had wasted. "I am afraid, indeed I know, that I hardly ever thought of doing good at that time, my one sole aim was pleasure," he said.

"And you could not get it by pleasing yourself alone," said Louise, "even I know enough to know that is impossible."

"It is the sweetest, holiest of lessons, which only the good learn early," said Mr. Beverley rather sadly. "Will you teach me to know this truth more clearly?"

"I?"

"Yes. I could not have a better teacher."

"Please go on," said Louise.

"I would not pain you by a minute recital of the events of the next few years of my life. They were miserably wasted. When certain rents and other moneys became due to me from time to time, and I received large sums of money, I entered on the wildest career of extravagance you can imagine. Thank God you cannot imagine it. When my money was gone I was poor, forlorn, miserable. I was not refused for a long while the shelter of the hotel, because the manager knew that I had sufficient entailed property to prevent my absolute beggary and to make him safe. But at last I behaved in so unseemly a manner at the house, that I was politely requested to find other quarters; and I went into private lodgings. At one period I was rich and threw away my money; for the rest of my time I was ready to beg a loan from a friend, or to take a drink from any one who would give it to me."

Louise Sylvester could not realize it. She had never been brought face to face with such degradation, save among the very poor. It seemed to her impossible that the gentleman before her could ever have lived in the manner he described.

"And how did you escape from this wretchedness," she asked, "and come to your right mind again?"

"I was one day roaming about, almost penniless, till my moneys were due again, and I came to a crowd at a street corner. It was a Sunday afternoon. I paused to listen to an old hale-looking man, with a merry, cheerful expression of face, and a clear blue eye that scanned curiously every countenance it rested on. I did not want him to see me, for I had a sort of dread lest his blue eyes would read me, and understand the reason of my shabby genteel costume, my dull eyes, and my unhealthy aspect. So I stood carefully behind a taller man and listened.

"He was preaching and teaching what he called a mixture of religion and teetotalism, which he quaintly declared were never truly separable, but only divided by the beams in the eyes that looked at them. Religious temperance, the temperance of religion, the temperance that springs from love to God and man is teetotalism, he went on, 'there are thousands of men who can't both love God and drink intoxicants.'

"At that moment the tall man stepped from before me, and the preacher's eyes were rivetted on my face. I knew he had singled me out, and half amused, half offended, partly solemnized, I waited for his words, 'You can't, can you, young man?' he asked, continuing to look earnestly at me, 'you perchance at the beginning, would have liked to do both, but drink conquered. Your eyes are heavy now, you are young; mine that meet yours are bright in old age. Do you ask me why? do you ask me if yours will be bright when you have doubled and almost trebled your present years, as I have done? I can answer you. Not if you live as you are living now. What is the duty of man? To live soberly, righteously, and godly.' I could not endure that so many glances should be turned upon me, and I presently walked away, but I could not walk away from what he had said. I thank God that I heard him and was not able to forget him. I did not rest till I had signed the pledge and asked God to help me to keep it."

"You have signed the temperance pledge then?" asked Louise.

"Surely!" he answered, "of course you are already a teetotaller like your uncle?"

Then Louise had her confession to make.

"But," she concluded, "directly uncle returns, my name shall be added to his pledge-book!"

"I am glad of that," he said, "I shall feel it a bond of sympathy between us."

At that moment Uncle Reginald returned.

"What success, uncle?" asked Louise, very anxious to know that he had obtained the desired permission of her mother.

"I am to have you lent to me for six months," said Reginald Courtenay, rather dryly.

"However did you manage, uncle?"

"Ways and means, ways and means, Louise," he said, smiling mysteriously; "but it was rather hard work to persuade her that you admired your old uncle, even in a grocer's store."

If Louise could have known all, she would have learned that Uncle Reginald had come to his sister at a propitious moment for his purpose. Mrs. Sylvester's rent was considerably overdue, autumn fashions having interfered with its payment, her landlord was impatient, and her brother's offer of a bank-note or two, was almost greedily accepted. Besides which, Mr. Courtenay avowed his intention to very shortly arrange matters with regard to the future disposal of the money he had accumulated, and if Louise pleased him in future, as she had always hitherto done, there was no reason she should not have a share. And, if his sister spared her to him, he would promise the dear child ample pocket money, as long as she liked to remain. So the officer's widow, with a good many inward groans and sighs, being so pressed, was fain to accept the alternative.

"I shall have a walk this evening, girls!" said Mrs. Sylvester in her usually magnificent manner. She was occasionally inclined to take a country ramble; "Clarie, you had better accompany me!"

"Yes, mamma! and shall we call for Loo, and get her to go, too? we see so little of her now."

"You can call for her, if you will, while I begin to choose my new cap at Mrs. Marshall's; you know I cannot bear the smell of your poor uncle's shop!" said the mother.

Mrs. Sylvester and Clarie in their elegant costumes, which had cost infinite pains and so much more money than they could honestly afford, set out accordingly. Clarie ran into her uncle's for her sister. She was directed to the drawing-room, a comfortable, large room over the shop, which Louise had brought into much more frequent use, and where she now presided at the tea equipage, and served her uncle and Mr. Beverley. They looked very cosy, Clarie thought, but they had finished tea, and Loo went to prepare for the proposed walk.

"Where are you going, Clarie?" asked her uncle.

"Up the road, I expect, uncle, and home through the path fields, that is mamma's favorite walk."

Louise reappeared, and the sisters left at once. They joined their mother at the milliner's, then walked up the street again, passed the church and their own door, as far out into the country as the turnpike gate, presided over by Jane Stuckey, who was an old friend of Loo's. The poor woman had rather a dreary post, for day by day she walked backward and forward, there being no house attached to the gate, waiting for the payers of toll and generally knitting as she waited; while all the shelter she possessed was no larger than a sentry-box. Louise tarried a few minutes behind her mother and sister to speak to Jane, to slip a shilling of her pocket money into her hand, and a litte book or two of easy print for her to read. Then, hardly waiting for the woman's thanks, she rejoined her companions. It was a lovely night, the bright beams of the harvest moon at full, spread over all things the beauty of a paler day.

The ladies had turned into some path fields, and were walking slowly along, enjoying the exquisite softness of the balmy air, when a peculiar noise in the distance attracted their attention; a heavy panting, accompanied by a dull sound that paralyzed the nerves of Mrs. Sylvester and Clarie with horror.

"Something is coming after us," cried Clarie, "look, Louise, if you dare."

Louise turned. Far away almost at the end of the large long field, but getting nearer every moment, was a huge dark object, looking huger, darker, for the shadows and the moonbeams.

"Mamma! Clarie! don't run, but walk on as fast as ever you can. I will keep it at bay for a little while, make haste!"

Even as the soul of the brave girl helped her to speak these earnest words, the fresh young life at her heart, told her it was hard to die.

(To be concluded.)

SAUL'S CONVERSION.

S. S. Lesson for April 15, Acts 9 : 1-18. Golden Text, ver. 6. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Saul a Conscientious Persecutor—His Difficulties—The Revelation of Jesus to Him—Hard for Him—Immediate and Life-long Consecration—Pseudo Conversions—Ananias Tested—Fraternal Greeting—Saul's Healthy Spiritual Birth—Contrast between Then and Now—Essentially the Same Transaction.

Our subject for to-day begins with the words, "And Saul." While Philip was instrumental in the hands of God in bringing the whole population of Samaria to the feet of Jesus, Saul was equally instrumental in the hands of Satan in making havoc of the Church. As he himself expresses it, "I persecuted this way unto the death, binding and delivering into prisons both men and women" (Acts 22 : 4). And this he did conscientiously, for he says, "I verily thought with myself, that I ought to do many things contrary to the name Jesus of Nazareth" (Acts 26 : 9). How often it has been the case that when some new truth has been presented to us, which seemed at first sight antagonistic to truth which we had held and valued, we have zealously opposed it, and when we had some glimmers of light regarding it, we have felt it our duty to resist being drawn into it, and we have feared that the light which really came from God was the work of the enemy.

The young, ardent, zealous Saul of Tarsus profited in the Jews' religion above many of his contemporaries in his own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of his fathers (Gal. 1 : 14) ; his whole religious reputation hung on this zeal, he was a high churchman of his day, and believed that his intolerance and spirit of persecution were really to the glory of God. The death of Stephen, the martyr's angelic face, his declaration when dying that he saw heaven open, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God, his commendation of his spirit to that Lord whom he saw above ; and then beyond all else, his prayer for those who murdered him, Saul included, all this must have been difficult for an honest mind to get over. But without doubt Saul regarded every thought which went back to these things as inadmissible in a Jew and a Pharisee. He saw himself as the champion for God and for the truth, God saw him as he afterward saw himself, "a blasphemer, and a persecutor and injurious" (1 Tim. 1 : 13), "breathing out threatenings and slaughter" against His disciples.

Saul was bent on the extirpation of the Christian heresy, as he deemed it ; and not satisfied with making havoc of the Church in Jerusalem where he "punished them oft in every synagogue, and compelled them to blaspheme ;" but "being exceedingly mad against them, he persecuted them, even unto strange cities" (Acts 26 : 11). He was engaged on such a mission to Damascus, with letters from the high-priest empowering him to bind the disciples of Jesus. Very likely his heart swelled with pride as he thought of how he was, how burning was his zeal, what a name he had, and would have in Jerusalem, and what favor he must win with God. Yet that face and those words of Stephen could not but rise up before him, and put them away as he would, regard them in the light of temptation as he would, they were realities ; none of the most zealous adherents of the law had either a presence, a power, or a spirit like that of Stephen. God saw the conflict ; and suddenly as he came near to Damascus on his journey, "there shined round about him a light from heaven." Saul was unused to communications from God ; versed in tradition, and even in the Scriptures, taught to pray and to worship God, yet of spiritual communion with God, he knew nothing. He fell to the earth, and heard a voice saying unto him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me?" Oh, what a revulsion of feeling ! what an almost terrible fear of knowing the truth when he asked, "Who art Thou, Lord?" and received the answer, "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest."

What then ? had his life been one great, terrible mistake ? Was all his burning zeal for God really murder of God's people and blasphemy of the Son of God ? "I am Jesus ;" was Stephen then a true man, and was he himself the sinner ? Must all his righteousness thus become filthy rags before his very eyes ? Were all his good intentions and fancied good deeds the basest, most terrible sin ? And He against whom he had so sinned only said, to kick against the pricks." Hard for thee, the persecutor ! Not hard for Me and My disciples, the persecuted ! Saul had no conception of clemency like this, this was like Stephen's prayer for his murderers, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge." A new horizon was opened before Saul, God had broken in upon Him. His old ideas of God lay in ruins at his feet, all was new ; he could now see that for Jew and Gentile, for the self-righteous and for the open sinner, and above all for him, the convicted Saul, Jesus is God, and God is Love. "It is hard for thee." Such sympathy from Him whom he had so injured broke Saul's heart, he could stand it no longer, and in the fullest, truest self-surrender he said, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do ?"

"IT IS HARD FOR THEE

Saul of Tarsus spoke no empty words in the impulse of the moment, he never drew back, but lived henceforth a living sacrifice to Him whom he had previously persecuted.

THIS IS TRUE CONVERSION.

When a convicted sinner is taken by surprise in finding out what God is, and when he yields himself over unreservedly to Him, this is real conversion, all things are become new. But there is a something which passes for conversion in the present day which has neither the power nor the fruits of a true conversion. When any one under the impetus of a meeting or service in which friends or relations seek the Lord, comes forward himself a seeker, understands the plan of salvation, assents to it, obtains a feeling of joy at having come a step on the way, joins the people of God, and begins to like religious meetings, this is not conversion. Unless a man really meets with God, unless he has really, consciously to do with Him, unless He reveals Himself to him in such a way as to make it almost impossible to return to his old life, there is not real, genuine conversion.

GOD DOES REVEAL HIMSELF to every real seeker after Him.

The Lord put Saul to the proof. He said, "Arise, and go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do." Until this time Saul had been a leader, directing others, now he must submit to be led. He arose, but found his sight was gone, as he afterward expressed it, he "could not see for the glory of that light" (Acts 22 : 11), and he had himself to be led into Damascus. Three days long in darkness he was shut up to God. Meanwhile, He who orders all things both in heaven and earth had been preparing Ananias, a Damascene disciple, to help him. It was no light test of Ananias' surrender to God, when the Master whom he served bid him go to the house of Judas, and inquire for Saul of Tarsus, the well-known persecutor of the Christians. At first Ananias seemed to think he knew better than his Lord, and that Jesus had made a mistake in sending him to such an one. His Lord told him about Saul, "Behold he prayeth and hath seen in a vision a man named Ananias coming in, and putting his hand on him that he may receive his sight." It is probable that Ananias might think the blindness of Saul would be a blessing to the Church, and it seemed contrary to all reason and common-sense to heal such a man, it was like putting him into a position to do further damage to the cause of God. But Ananias was open to conviction, willing to be told he was in the wrong, and to let reason yield to faith.

"The Lord said unto him, Go thy way : for he is a chosen vessel unto Me, to bear My name before the Gentiles and kings, and the children of Israel : for I will show him how great things he must suffer for My name's sake."

IT WAS ENOUGH.

Ananias was brought into the mind of his Lord, he began to see with the eyes of God the things which are not as though they were (Rom. 4 : 14), and in all the strength of the faith concerning Saul which the words of Jesus had created within him, he called his persecutor "Brother," for he knew that he would become such. "Ananias went his way, and entered into the house ; and putting his hands on him said, Brother Saul." O blessed age of the Christian Church when men were like their Lord. Stephen had prayed for his murderers, the Lord Himself had spoken in compassion toward the man who made havoc of His church, and now Ananias whom he had come to persecute, called him "Brother" and said, "Brother Saul, the Lord, even Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, hath sent me that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost." It was enough. Saul was completely subdued. Christ and His disciples were alike. Love had conquered. "There fell from his eyes" (inward and outward) "as it had been scales, and he received sight forthwith, and arose, and was baptized."

What took place during those three days of darkness ? Very probably the struggle which Paul afterward speaks of in Romans 7. It is not likely that the enemy of souls would let such a man go without making a desperate resistance. Probably all the cost of the position he would take as Christ's disciple was set before him during that time, and it may be that he then learned that lesson of lessons, I am crucified with Christ : nevertheless I live ; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me : and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who died and gave Himself for me (Gal. 2 : 20). Saul's was a thoroughly healthy spiritual birth, and he was born into a bracing atmosphere. Many regard Saul's conversion as something exceptional, but in its main features it is like every other conversion ; only that in our degenerate days, conviction does not come home to the newly awakened, backed up by lives such as those of the first apostles and Stephen.

Then the question could hardly arise, Are these men hypocrites ? for they had nothing earthly to gain by professing Christ. Now men get more honor if they have a smattering of religion than if they have none ; it is now quite recognized in the world that a little should be done for Jesus ; then it meant the loss of reputation, of money, of possessions, sometimes of life itself. But now as well as then, those who live godly in Christ Jesus suffer persecution. The world, whether in the church or out of it, hates reality, which shows up its hollowness, and will persecute almost to the death those who always bring the presence of God to the foreground.

Saul's conversion was

which takes place with every soul who is really and truly converted to God. First light from God, showing up the terrible mistake and sin of the past, with a revelation of Jesus, then an acceptance of Christ on the part of the sinner, and an unconditional surrender. Wherever conversion is real, this same transaction takes place. Then the outward confession, whether by baptism, as in this case, or whether by simple testimony, does and must follow, unless the soul slips back into the world again, a weak, cowardly backslider. Saul had given himself up ; he understood clearly that all claim to himself was at an end ; he was Another's. O God, give us such conversions and such converts, on every word and deed of whose lives shall be written, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do ?"

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Dynamite Terror in England Was Stimulated again last week by the arrest in Liverpool of a man recently arrived from Cork who carried a box containing explosives and infernal machines of a most destructive character. The machines consisted of a metal cylinder containing two gallons of explosive material, the whole covered with an outer casing of canvas neatly stitched. A fuse was attached, but the throwing of the package against the ground would have sufficed to explode it quite as effectually as the fuse. Deasy, the Irishman in whose possession they were found, made no confession, but a letter was found on him addressed to an Irish railroad porter at St. Helens, which implicated the latter, and he too was arrested. The police authorities say that the capture frustrated two attempts to blow up government buildings, one in Liverpool, the other in Manchester. Both explosions were to be effected last week, and experts assert that the machines are identical in power with the one used to blow up the local government office in London. The police say that they were undoubtedly made in America. The explosive is a simple form of nitro-glycerine held in sawdust, extremely powerful, and excessively dangerous to transport or handle in any way. If Deasy had allowed one of the machines to fall on the deck of the Cork steamer by which he went to England, its force would have been sufficient to sink her.

The Russian Police Have Succeeded in Capturing a band of Nihilists, a feat to which they attach considerable importance. On March 31st the police raided a house in an obscure neighborhood in St. Petersburg, and there found nine persons surrounded with implements of destruction. The police, in attempting to capture the party, met with a stubborn resistance. During the fight three officers were wounded and one Nihilist, finding capture inevitable, committed suicide on the spot. It is supposed that only a section of the party have been secured. Among the implements of destruction were found about one hundred and forty-four pounds of dynamite. A socialistic manifesto is in circulation in the southern part of Russia inviting the people to avail of the coming fetes on the occasion of the coronation of the Czar to pillage the houses of nobles and Jews. A deputation of nobles has gone to St. Petersburg to ask the Minister of the Interior to provide for the protection of their property.

Prince Bismarck's Sixty-eighth Birthday Was celebrated on Sunday, April 1st. Military bands performed national and operatic selections before the residence of the Prince, while the event was recognized by visits in person from the Emperor William, many ladies of distinguished households, officers holding high rank at Court, foreign ministers and other notables, who presented congratulations to the Imperial Chancellor. Many telegrams were received from places within the Empire, as well as from points abroad, felicitating Prince Bismarck, and there were numerous floral offerings, which were displayed in the parlors of the Prince's residence.

John Brown, the Scotch Gillie who has been since the death of Prince Albert, Queen Victoria's constant attendant, died on March 27th. The Queen in her book "Our Life in the Highlands," frequently refers to him. He was the son of a poor Scottish cotter who resided on the Balmoral estate when the Queen bought it. John Brown was engaged as body servant of Prince Albert, and frequently accompanied him on hunting excursions in Scotland. He was deeply attached to the Prince Consort, and is said to have refused to eat between the death and burial of his master. Queen Victoria at once took him into her employ, and for the rest of his life he was her favorite attendant. In the Highlands he was the most faithful of "gillies"—half serving man, half guardian. In London he was as well known as the Queen herself. He went on her carriage when she drove out, and stood behind her chair on great days of ceremony at Windsor. The Queen treated him with great confidence, and of late years her favor has become so marked as to arouse the ill feeling of the nobility, to whom John Brown was not very deferential.

The Newly Appointed Archbishop of Canterbury was publicly enthroned on March 29th. Dr. Edward W. Benson, who succeeds Dr. Tait in that high office, is said to be a man of profound learning though not altogether in sympathy with his predecessor in his theological views. The enthronement took place in Canterbury Cathedral with appropriate ceremonies. The Bishop of Long Island, and the Bishop of Saskatchewan, British North America, were present. The traditional enthronement ceremonies were observed. There was a dense crowd of people in the cathedral, among whom were the Duke of Edinburgh, representatives from Oxford and Cambridge Universities, and a great concourse of clergymen.

An Extensive Emigration Assisted by the British Government has commenced in Ireland. The denizens of the poor-houses and people who are in receipt of out-door relief, with others who are in abject poverty are taking advantage of the emigration fund in large numbers. On March 31st, the steamer Nestorian of the Allan Line, which sailed for Boston, Mass., had on board one hundred and fifty persons, all the inhabitants of the same village, a poor spot on the west coast of Ireland, which is now nearly depopulated.

The Queen of Madagascar.—A Missionary, lately returned from a work of many years in Madagascar, speaks of the now Christian queen's simple-hearted belief in God as the hearer and answerer of prayer. Her days are often full of urgent duties, but there is one thing no business ever causes her to forego—it is her hour or half-hour each morning for quiet reading of the Bible and prayer. This is so valued by her that she puts it first. The difficulty with the French settlers—which is now come to a crisis—has been a long-standing trouble to the Malagasy queen, inasmuch as she has dreaded becoming involved in a conflict with the French government. "But," she said to the missionary, "God knows all the need of my country. I will tell Him about it; and if I ask His help He will be sure to guide me and aid me in my trouble."

The Spread of Revolutionary Lawlessness occasions considerable perturbation among the monarchs and governments of Europe. The London Record says: "The recent disclosures with reference to the homogeneity of the European revolutionary societies will necessitate a Conference of the leading Powers. The Black Hand in Spain, a conspiracy which has attained alarming proportions, the Anarchists in Belgium and France, the Nihilists in Russia, and the Fenians in Ireland, are all said not only to be actuated by similar motives, but to have a system of intercommunication, and if need be concerted action. It is asserted that the leading Socialists are now making every effort to form a Supreme International Central Committee, with delegates from each country in Europe." Whether there is solid foundation for this statement or not, the activity and spread of Socialistic principles of late years is certainly a matter of concern.

An Extraordinary Scene Was Witnessed in an English court of justice recently when three atheistic publishers were tried in London, for blasphemy. They had been put upon their trial the week before, but the jury were unable to agree, and were discharged. The new trial resulted in a verdict of guilty. The leading offender, Foote, was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment, and his two co-defendants to nine months each. When the sentences were pronounced, there was a scene in court such as is not often witnessed. The gallery was crowded with people who sympathized with the defendants, who gave utterance to loud manifestations of disgust at the result of the trial. The defendant Foote, addressing Mr. Justice North, said, "My lord, I thank you; it is worthy of your creed," and upon this various persons raised the cry of "Christian!" "Christian!" and the court had to be cleared by the police. The offence with which these men were charged was the publication of a series of disgraceful caricatures of incidents in the life of our Lord. The learned judge defined the legal meaning of blasphemy as being "any contumelious reproach or profane scoffing against the Christian religion of the Holy Scriptures, or any act exposing the Holy Scriptures and the Christian religion to ridicule, contempt, or derision." The scandalous scene which occurred in court illustrated in a forcible manner the practical result of atheistic opinions upon those who hold them. "They fear not God, neither regard man."

Reports of Leprosy in the Sandwich Islands, recently circulated in America and Europe, have led to an investigation. The Commercial Advertiser, of Honolulu, referring to the reports says: "The districts of Wailuka, Waikee, Makawas and Ulspalakua of the island of Wanai, comprising an area of 300 square miles of the most densely populated portion of the kingdom, with 10,000 inhabitants, have been thoroughly searched for lepers by the Board of Health. The result was that twenty-eight native and no foreign lepers were found. There are ten foreign lepers at the leper settlement at Molokai, most of whom contracted the disease by licentiousness."

Mr. Spurgeon's Church Roll Increases in ratio with the growth of his congregation. It is now by far the largest in the world, and the recent annual report shows a steady and continuous extension. The annual meeting has just been held. It was stated that the offerings at the doors during the twelve months for the college again corresponded with the date of the year, amounting to £1882, ($9410). The net increase of members for the year was 117, bringing the membership of the church up to 5427.

A Scoffer Changed.—In a Low Thoroughfare in Whitechapel, one of the most squalid districts of London, two open-air preachers were recently telling of the love of Christ to a motley group, when a big fellow with a stentorian voice came into the audience and immediately began to scoff. For a few minutes he seemed to amuse the audience with his funny jokes, but the preachers engaged in silent prayer, and soon there was quietness all around. The scoffer himself soon became interested, and gradually moved until he stood beside the speaker. When the meeting was closed, the scoffer himself, with a most serious air, attempted to speak, and the rabble element began to laugh and cheer. He said: "You may laugh at me if you will. I came to scoff, but God has touched my heart, and if the Saviour will have me, I am going home to be a better man."

Volume V. of the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now ready, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1882 with complete index. Price $3 including postage. Ten per cent less to ministers and the trade.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), for March, may be obtained at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price six cents, postage paid.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE REV. WILLIAM ELLIS,

Missionary to the South Seas and Madagascar.

Born in 1794—Parentage—Begins Work at the Age of Six Years—Desire to Become a Nursery Gardener—Enters a Clergyman's Service—A Still Further Advance—Life in London in 1811—Checked in a Downward Career—Scene of His First Prayer—Earliest Efforts for Christ—Attention Directed to Missionary Work—Arrival in the South Seas in 1817—The King of Tahiti Converted—A Perilous Storm—Visit to the Sandwich Islands in 1823—Return Home in 1825—Embarks for Madagascar in 1853—Illness and Happy Death in 1872.

THE recent visit of the envoys from Madagascar to this country has directed the attention of the religious public more pointedly to that island than to any other portion of the missionary field. The intelligence of the envoys, their realization of the grand truths of the Christian religion, and their desire that the progress of civilization in Madagascar may go on unchecked, have been remarked. It will, therefore, interest the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to have some account of the man who under God was the means of doing so much to promote the cause of Christ in that far off island.

William Ellis was born of humble parentage, in a small tenement in London, on August 29th, 1794, and passed into eternal rest in June, 1872, after fifty-six years of untiring and perilous missionary labors, and in the seventy-eighth year of his age.

For two or three years after the birth of William, business was prosperous, and the circumstances of his parents were moderately comfortable. When there came a falling-off in Mr. Ellis's special trade, toward the close of 1797, he removed to Wisbeach, and entered the employment of a Mr. Shinfield, who afterward became closely identified with the future missionary. Two years afterward, in 1799, business continued to decline, and necessity arose for seeking some other occupation.

Mr. Ellis, therefore, accepted employment in the candle manufactory of a Mr. Usill. In this situation he remained for many years; but his earnings were but scanty, provisions were often dear, and the health of Mrs. Ellis frequently failed; the household was debarred from many comforts, the children had but few opportunities of education, were early inured to toil, and became familiar with the inevitable ills attendant on straitened circumstances.

A SIX YEAR OLD MECHANIC.

When six years old, the boy was employed at the rate of two shillings a week, probably at the candle factory, in winding cotton wicks, at the same time assisting his mother by "minding the baby." The traits of an observant and thoughtful mind were very early conspicuous in him. A love of plants was always a marked feature in his character.

"I remember," he said, "sitting one day on a bank in our garden, with a fine, sweet, rosy-cheeked apple in my hand, and that, as I cut it, I observed the pips inside, and wondered what they were for. I asked the question, and was told that from them the apple-trees came. Not satisfied with merely hearing this, I took the pips and secretly planted them, placing sticks above them, and watched for nearly half a year, but they never came up. The desire to know was raised; I felt a strong wish to work in a nursery garden, so that I might learn the secrets of the growth of plants. At length my longing was gratified, and I obtained a place in an orchard, where I felt delight in watching the developments of nature, and was not satisfied till I had stayed there a year, and seen the whole process—the bud, the flower, the fruit. Then I aspired to learn about plants less familiar, the vine, the peach, the nectarine, and left for another place that I might follow up the study."

This step in advance did not take place till after his twelfth year. Meanwhile the demands upon his services to eke out the resources of the household, and the limited means at their disposal, interfered very much with any regular instruction at school. The only teaching of any kind which the youth seems to have enjoyed was in attendance for a very short time, and much interrupted, at a small school kept by Mr. Wright, a Unitarian minister, of whose congregation the family were members.

EMPLOYED BY A CLERGYMAN.

In May, 1806, William entered the service of a market-gardener, named Bristow, who lived in the neighborhood, where he remained about a year. The wife of the clergyman of Thorney Abbey, Mrs. Girdlestone, having been struck with the youth's bright intelligence and cheerful and active habits, made inquiry concerning him, and it was very soon arranged that he should go to live at Thorney.

After three years of service at Thorney, William Ellis, on October 11th, 1810, entered the service of another clergyman, the Rev. W. Hardwicke, of Outwell. Here through the kindness of his employer Ellis was able to obtain considerable information. Mr. Hardwicke had a large library, and he permitted Ellis to read any book he wished. He read much, but his love of plants and flowers continued his absorbing passion. Subsequently, at the age of eighteen, he obtained a promising situation with a nurseryman in an extensive way of business, at Kingsland, near London, and bade adieu to his home, to push his fortunes in a wider field.

LIFE IN LONDON.

The young adventurer reached London on October 21st, 1811, and after a few days commenced his new duties at the nurseries. This was a crisis in the young man's history. Alone in a great city, freed from the restraints of home, and exposed to the evil example and solicitations of vicious companions, was it possible for him, undefended as he was by religious principle, to withstand the temptations that now surrounded him? This perilous period of his life—this fierce ordeal of his virtue—was happily but of short duration.

Through Divine mercy his downward career—bad company, profanation of the Lord's day, and ale-house indulgence—was effectually arrested by his admission into a godly family. In June, 1812, he entered the service of a Mr. Sangster, an excellent Christian gentleman, who lived in another part of London. Here he was received on a footing of a member of the household, though his chief occupation was the care of the garden. A small chamber over the coach-house was assigned to him as a sleeping room. This humble dormitory, where at the close, and in the intervals of the day's work, he could always be private, became invested with a special interest, as the chosen retreat of many thoughtful seasons and studious hours, for he brought with him that thirst for knowledge and love of reading which never forsook him; and it is memorable especially as the scene of much spiritual conflict, and of

HIS FIRST PRAYER.

In the new home to which Providence had brought William Ellis, he was required to be present at family worship daily, and in accordance with the custom of his employer, attend chapel on the Sunday. In a little more than a month after his entrance into Mr. Sangster's family, deep religious convictions were awakened through a sermon to young people by the late Rev. J. Clayton, Sr., and he returned home to his small chamber to pray. His prayer for mercy and forgiveness was heard, he was born again of the Holy Spirit, and at length applied for admission into Christian fellowship, and was received as a member of the church at Kingsland on February 1st, 1814.

FIRST EFFORTS FOR CHRIST.

Naturally, the young Christian became solicitous for the spiritual welfare of his family; and made constant efforts to point them to the Lamb of God, and on the minds of his mother and sisters, at least, these efforts produced a lasting effect which became conspicuous in after years. He also became a teacher in one of the earliest Sunday-schools ever established.

Mr. Jones, the pastor of the church of which Mr. Ellis became a member, was warmly interested in missionary enterprise, and the annual meetings of the London Missionary Society had usually been held in his church. In May, 1814, the meeting was addressed by the Rev. J. Campbell, who had only a few days before returned, after an absence of nearly two years spent in visiting the stations of the Society in South Africa. "His affecting account of the moral wretchedness of the Africans, their willingness to receive teachers, the prospects of usefulness, which invited the laborer to the field, given with all the graphic distinctness which resulted from recent and accurate personal observation, and the glow of feeling produced by his arrival from the scenes of moral degradation which Africa presented, made a strong impression on the minds of multitudes who were present."

Many young people had their hearts stirred by these representations, and among the number was William Ellis. In the same congregation that day, and glowing with the same enthusiastic aspirations, was Mary Mercy Moor, the future partner of his lot, and the sharer of his missionary toils in the South Seas. Conversation with his pastor, by whom he was encouraged and directed, resulted in his making application to the Society to be employed by them as a missionary to the heathen, and before the end of December, 1814, not only had he been accepted by the Directors, but he was informed that, in all probability, he would be sent out to Africa immediately. Subsequently, however, a year for preparation and training was allowed, while his destination was changed to the South Seas. On January 23d, 1816, Mr. and Mrs. Ellis set sail from Spithead, and on January 26th, 1817, after a long voyage and many wearisome delays, they came in sight of the island of Rapa.

ARRIVAL IN THE SOUTH SEAS.

The next morning the vessel approached the shore, and sailed along the coast for some distance. Gradually the islanders came out in their canoes, and though shy at first, were soon emboldened to climb on board, and crowding on deck, caused considerable trouble and annoyance by a disposition to carry off whatever they could lay hands on. One powerful fellow seized a youth and endeavored to lift him from the deck, but the lad slipped from his assailant's clutch. He then grasped the cabin boy, and attempted to drag him off; but the sailors coming to the rescue, compelled him to relinquish his hold.

The captain was only by earnest entreaty restrained from firing upon the marauders, but happily the counsels of humanity and prudence prevailed. Orders were given to clear the ship, and with some difficulty, for the sailors were unwilling to use their cutlasses except in the way of menace, the lawless and turbulent visitors were driven off. The island of Rapa has since received the Gospel through the agency of native evangelists from Tahiti.

On the 10th of February the ship approached Tahiti. The circumstances of the South Sea Mission, at this period, were peculiarly encouraging. The first missionaries, after years of fruitless toil, had all, with the exception of two devoted men, Mr. Hayward and Mr. Nott, left the islands; some, however, subsequently had been induced by more favorable prospects to return; and brighter days had dawned. Their hearts were at length gladdened by

THE FIRST CONVERTS TO CHRISTIANITY.

King Pomare himself had openly renounced idolatry, had demolished the temples, and burned the idols of his country; the decisive battle between the heathen and the Christian party had been fought, and, consecrated by prayer, the cause of Truth had signally triumphed. The clemency of the victors, imbued with the spirit of their new religion, astounded the vanquished, and, more potent than the arms of Pomare, completed the overthrow of idolatry. The rulers of the neighboring islands had followed the example of the King of Tahiti, and having abandoned their old superstitions, they were were returning, after a voyage of several years, and were coming up the Channel with all sail set. A treacherous squall suddenly came on, and before the crew could take in sail the ship was caught by it. The full sails swelled out, and in a minute the ship canted over, and sank, with all hands, in sight of port. Many in this land of a free Gospel seem similarly circumstanced. They are trained daily in reading the Bible, and in prayer. They go to church and Sabbath-schools, and are all but saved, when a squall comes on, and down to hell they go, to the astonishment and grief of those about them. Only madmen or fools think lightly of or neglect the fullest preparation for eternity."

The Devil After them Again.—The Rev. James Scott remarked: "Last night in the James Morrison Street Hall I dealt with two backsliders. One was a member of the Mizpah Band, who succumbed to the temptation of the New Year's festivities. I believe he looked up to Christ, and took a new hold of God's promises. The other one came to me and said, 'Don't you remember me?' 'No; I can't say I do.' 'Don't you remember Mr. Napier introducing me to you in the Circus?' 'I have no doubt but that he did do so.' 'Well, I have fallen. What shall I do?' As I spoke to him, and directed him for help to Christ, the tears were dropping down to the floor till they made a mark on it. He also found forgiveness and rest in the Lord."

A Sensible Railway Guard.—"I Was in America a few months ago, and went down the Allegheny Mountain on a railway train. It was a thing to remember to see the speed at which we went down the incline. A nervous passenger asked the conductor, 'What would happen to us if the brake gave way?' 'We have a spare one which we would apply at once,' he answered. 'If it also gave way, what then?' again queried the passenger. 'We have one on the last van which we can put on.' 'If it gave way where would we be?' The conductor looked him in the face, and said gravely, 'Friend, that depends upon the way you have lived.' Examine yourselves, and see if you have the brake of Christ's righteousness upon your own life. If you have, then you are safe. If you have it not, then you are doomed to destruction."

A Fall on the Ice.—Mr. Deware Said: "Once on a frosty day like this, I was coming down Elmbank Street, and saw an aged man going before me. He was much older than myself, so I watched anxiously lest he should fall. I got so engaged in this work that I forgot to take heed to my own steps, and suddenly down I fell. It made me think, 'May not I and others who are engaged in Christian work be so engrossed watching others that we forget to watch ourselves, and so experience a fall?' Christian people, while full of thought and generous enterprise for others, should take heed of themselves, lest, as Paul says, 'after having preached to others, I myself should be a castaway,' and it is this same apostle admonishes, 'Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall.' Teneo et teneor, 'I hold and am held' is a good motto for us all. 'Hold Thou me up and I shall be safe.'"

"I Shall Meet My Baby Again."—Mr. Jack said: "In connection with the world-famed ship-building yard at Fairfield, Mrs. Elder and Mrs. Pearce built a mission-hall, in which, besides other most useful meetings, is held a mothers' meeting once a week. The women are frequently invited to give testimony as to the means of their conversion. I was present at the meeting held last week, and heard a woman who had lately buried a baby say, in effect, 'When my baby died, the minister called, and I was sore bowed with grief. After speaking to me awhile without doing me any good, he rose from the chair, and solemnly said, "If you have the Lord Jesus you have everything," and then he said "good-day," and left. I began to say to myself, I have not got the Lord Jesus, and in a little time I felt somewhat queer. Soon I had to cry to God to give me pardon for my sin of murmuring and rebellion, and fill my heart with the quiet rest and peace of faith. Now I can wait patiently, for I know I shall meet my baby again.' 'Of such is the kingdom of heaven.'"

Refusing to Marry a Couple.—The Rev. Mr. Dunn said: "When I was laboring in the city of Carlisle some years ago, I went to my lodging one night rather later than usual. The lady in whose house I lived met me in the hall and said, 'You are late; there is a couple here waiting on you to be married.' 'Are they Christians?' I asked, but without answering me, the lady ushered me into the room where the young people were seated. I inquired of the young man, 'Are you a Christian?' 'No, sir,' he answered. Turning to the woman, I asked, 'Are you a Christian?' 'Yes, sir,' she said. 'Why do you want to marry a man who is not a Christian?' I inquired. 'He has promised to become one, and to attend the chapel regularly,' was her rejoinder. 'Many promises,' I replied, 'are made before marriage which are broken after it.' To the man I said, 'Hadn't you better put it off till the matter of your salvation is settled?' 'If it's put off now, it's put off forever,' he said. 'Well, sir, I will not marry a servant of God to a servant of the devil on any account.' 'You are very uncharitable.' 'No, I am not; for you must either be for God or against Him; if the latter, then you must side with the devil. I will tell you what we will do; you must give yourself to Christ to-night, and I will marry you to-morrow.' We sat till two o'clock in the morning before he surrendered himself to God through faith in Christ, and in the morning I married them."

THE WORLD PREPARING FOR ANTI-CHRIST.

We now address ourselves, currente calamo, to the task which our dying friend committed to our hands—the completing of his unfinished paper on the coming Antichrist. Mr. Maude has briefly stated one of the features by which Antichrist will be recognized, we therefore affirm upon the authority of the prophetic Scriptures—

HIS FIRST APPEARANCE.

2. His first appearance will be as a plausible, conciliatory, and attractive leader. Appearing as the Little Horn (Daniel 8 : 9), which indicates the political, yet restricted character of his origin, elsewhere denominated the beginning of a "vile person," his primary act in his official rôle, will be to enter Palestine, the "pleasant land;" and by means of military support, persuasion, munificent proposals, and professions of kinship, win the confidence of the Jews, who will by this time be establishing themselves in considerable numbers in their own ancient land. (Daniel 8 : 9 ; 11 : 21, 24, 25.)

3. He will next attract notice as the instigator and prominent individual in a notable covenant, which he and the Jewish people shall confirm together. . . By his magnanimous bearing, pretensions of amity, and promises of restoring privileges fallen into desuetude, he will lure them into the unhallowed league. As aforetime, the rebellious Saul was the people's clamorous choice (1 Samuel 8 : 19), so shall this man become their accepted leader, and probably their acknowledged Messiah. (Daniel 8 : 25 ; 9 : 27 ; 11 : 22, 23.)

HIS TRUE CHARACTER.

4. In three and a half years he will astonish his dupes and beholders by throwing off the garb of his assumed meekness, and suddenly appearing in his true character as "Man of Sin," "Mystery of Iniquity," and "Son of Perdition." The covenant or treaty so deceitfully made will be as fraudulently broken; and his dazed and devoted adherents will stand aghast, awaiting in bewildered amazement his further developments. (Daniel 9 : 27.) As this point has so frequently and forcibly been dwelt upon in these pages, and is treated with such elaborate exhaustiveness in the Rev. M. Baxter's "Forty Coming Wonders," the need does not exist for our dwelling at greater length upon it here.

5. He will then proceed to manifest himself as a merciless and universal oppressor. The leopardine king, whose graceful fascinations had so long riveted the admiring gaze of his charmed prey, springs at last—and springs to grip as a bear, to devour as a lion, and to blaspheme as a dragon. The daily sacrifice shall be taken away; the Jews will be scattered and spoiled; the Holy Covenant between Jehovah and the fathers of Israel, in reference to the land, shall be abhorred and set aside; and the descendants of Jacob and Abraham brought into a bondage so galling and degrading that the bitterness of Egypt's captivity and serfdom would be as honey in the mouth in comparison with it. (Daniel 8 : 11–13 ; 11 : 31.)

HIS CRUSHING SUPREMACY.

Others beside the chosen people will fall under his crushing supremacy. Times and laws will be changed. Without deference to any precedent, he will legislate solely according to the dictates of his own autocratic and imperious will. Every obstacle in the pathway of this advancing Prince will be ruthlessly thrust aside. Juggernaut never rolled onward to his temple amid such remorseless fury, as this Son of Perdition will stride through fields of slaughter to the pinnacle of his power. (Daniel 7 : 25 ; 12 : 1.) Satan will at last find the man willing to accept the offer of dominion the Son of God refused (Luke 4 : 5–7), and through him the Archdemon will rule over the whole world. (Daniel 8 : 24.)

HIS BLASPHEMOUS DECLARATION.

6. He will declare himself God. Not satisfied with universal power, he will aspire to universal adoration also. This the devil will grant him. He will speak great words of blasphemy against the Most High. The name of Deity will be effaced from the earth. The true Messiah, who claimed equality with the Father, will be banished from the memory of men, and in their places shall Satan, the father of lies, substitute himself and the Antichrist. Every witness to the Living and True God will be silenced or slain; and unrestrained sin will hold high carnival the wide world over. With miracles, signs, and lying wonders will this false worship be attested and enforced. An abominable Idol, the image of the Beast will be set up; the command on penalty of death, will go forth for all to bow down to it; and the fiery trials of Daniel and his companions will be re-enacted. (2 Thess. 2 : 9, 10 ; Rev. 13 : 15.)

What mortal eye can penetrate the awful "darkness which may be felt," the terrible woe which shall sting as a scorpion in those fearful and rapidly-nearing days? A world without God, without Bibles, without Christians, without Churches! Is it any marvel that our Lord spoke of it as a time of "great tribulation such as was not since the beginning of the world?" Or that the inspired Ezekiel, writing of that same appalling period, should liken it to the melting of silver, and brass, and iron, and lead, and tin, in the fury of a furnace? (Matt. 24, Ezek. 22 : 18–22.) Who that in any measure comprehends the momentous force of those intensely descriptive words of the Apocalypse—

"THE TRIBULATION, THE GREAT ONE,"

(7 : 14) can restrain the urgent cry, "Lord, hasten Thy coming; for the sake of Thine elect, shorten those days; come forth out of Thy place, and punish the inhabitants of the earth for their cruelty?"

THE FINAL ACT.

7. Antichrist's final act will be to stand up against Christ, the Prince of princes. This last move will be a fatal one to him; and with it his career will close. His downfall will involve events more momentous and awfully grand than any that have transpired upon this globe. The glorious passage of the Red Sea, the miracle of the manna, the dividing of the Jordan, the conquest of Jericho, and the wonderful exploits of the Ark of the Covenant, are transactions whose beautiful lustre must grow dim before the incomparable marvel of the occurrences associated with this catastrophe.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President in Tendering the Vacant Post of Postmaster-General to Judge Walter Q. Gresham, of Indiana, appears to have surprised all those who were speculating on the probable selection of a successor of the late Mr. Timothy O. Howe. The announcment of the President's decision, however, has given general satisfaction. Both sections of the Republican party and the Democratic journals comment favorably on the appointment. Judge Gresham advocated the nomination of General Grant in 1880, but after the Chicago convention he accepted the Garfield nomination, made an earnest speech in its favor at the ratification meeting in Chicago, and warmly advocated the ticket in his own State. It is stated that Judge Gresham was the President's own selection, and when his name was mentioned in the Cabinet it was unanimously approved. Judge Gresham is fifty years of age, and has attained distinction both as a lawyer and a soldier. He served in the war as Lieutenant-Colonel of the Thirty-eighth Regiment, assisted at the siege of Vicksburg, and served under Sherman at Atlanta. He rose to the rank of Major-General before the close of the war. In 1864 he was severely wounded in the leg and has never fully recovered the use of the limb. He is spoken of as a man of conspicuous administrative ability and of unimpeachable integrity.

The Death of the Venerable Peter Cooper on Wednesday, April 4th, closes a long, honorable, and beneficent career. Mr. Cooper had but recently celebrated his ninety-second birthday, and considering his advanced age his activity and energy were remarkable. During the winter, however, his health has not been so good as usual. He caught a severe cold in the fall which he renewed several times. He was not confined to the house, and until Monday, April 2d, he was able to continue his daily visits to the Cooper Institute. On that day it was evident that Mr. Cooper's lungs were affected, and a medical examination revealed a small spot on them indicating the presence of pneumonia. He retired to rest on that night without any serious apprehension being entertained by his family. But he never rose again. The following day he was worse, and on Wednesday he died easily and painlessly. His portrait and biography we hope to publish in the next number of The Christian Herald.

The Municipal Contest in Chicago Has Been watched keenly by the whole country, owing to the effort being made by Christian people of all denominations to check the rapid increase of vicious resorts in the city. They nominated a citizens' ticket with Judge Cary at its head, pledged to higher licenses and a rigorous enforcement of the laws against criminals of all classes. The result has been a disappointment. The citizens' ticket has been defeated, the mayor has been re-elected, and with him the city officers against whom the movement of the law and order party was directed. An effort is being made to show that the result is a personal triumph for Mr. Harrison, the mayor, and generally for the Democratic party. The analyses of the returns, however, rather show it to be a foreign victory. The cry of higher licenses aroused the hostility of the Irish and German citizens of Chicago who actively exerted themselves and contributed freely to secure the election of Mr. Harrison, who during his mayoralty has opposed the movement for higher license and restriction.

The People of Ohio Are to Have an Opportunity of voting directly on the liquor question. Both houses of the Legislature have concurred in submitting two propositions to amend the Constitution to a popular vote at the next State election. The alternatives to be submitted are prohibition and regulation. In both cases the section of the present schedule dealing with the question is to be repealed. In the one case it is proposed to insert instead of it the words : "The General Assembly shall regulate the traffic in intoxicating liquors so as to provide against evils resulting therefrom ; and its power to levy taxes or assessments thereon is not limited by any provision of this Constitution ;" and in the other case the words : "The manufacture of, and the traffic in, intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage are forever prohibited ; and the General Assembly shall provide by law for the enforcement of this provision."

The Supreme Court of Iowa Having Consented to a rehearing of the case in relation to the constitutionality of the prohibitory amendments, passed at the late election by a majority of thirty thousand, arguments were commenced on April 3d. The speakers for the amendment were the Hon. James F. Duncombe, Judge C. C. Newse and United States Senator James F. Wilson. The advocates against the amendment were State Senator John C. Bliss and ex-United States Senator George C. Wright. Senator Wilson concluded his argument on the evening of April 5th. He contended for the validity and legality of the law. He held that the enrolled joint resolution of the Nineteenth General Assembly, in the custody of the Secretary of State, was conclusive evidence of the judgment upon the regularity of the action of the Eighteenth General Assembly relative to the amendment involved. His closing point was that the Judicial Department has no jurisdiction over political questions, and cannot review the action of the General Assembly. The court takes time to consider its decision, and it is expected that it will not be given until the next term.

A Remarkable Record of Christian Work was presented at the anniversary of the American Tract Society recently held in Washington, D. C. Dr. Shearer in explaining the report said that during the past year the new publications amounted to seventy-four, including thirty-one volumes, being over 9000 pages, or a volume of 173 pages on an average per week. The whole number of volumes, new and old, issued were 292,000; tracts, 5,600,280 ; total, 86,314,468 pages, being 12,000,000 pages more than last year. The gratuitous distribution amounted to over 56,000,000 pages, of the value of nearly $38,000. The total receipts were reported as $373,000, and the expenditures $368,000. The donations and legacies amounted to $100,400.

Mr. C. W. Sawyer's Gospel Temperance Services in New York will be continued during the summer months in Cooper Union on Sundays, and in the Annex Hall on Tuesday and Friday evenings. The Annex Hall has recently been newly painted and renovated preparatory to the summer work. It was formally re-opened on Monday, April 2d, by a public meeting at which Mr. Wm. E. Dodge, Mr. F. A. Palmer and other Christian workers, who have assisted Mr. Sawyer in his work, met the converts and spent a social evening. The plans for the ensuing season were discussed, and arrangements made for extending the usefulness of the services.

The Baptism of a Converted Jew Took Place at Baltimore on April 1st. The convert, Mr. Victor Goldberg, is a Russian refugee who came to America last year. He went to Philadelphia where he became acquainted with Christian people who lent him books on Christianity, and introduced him to Mr. Paul Werber, whose efforts in spreading the knowledge of the truth among the Jews have been much blessed. Mr. Werber being himself a convert from Judaism is conversant with the attitude of his people toward Christianity, and was able to remove the doubts of his young Russian friend. Mr. Goldberg subsequently removed to Baltimore, where he made a public confession of faith in Christ. Mr. Goldberg was born in the Lithuanian Provinces of Russia. He was reared in the orthodox Hebrew Church and studied to become a Rabbi. For several years he visited the Talmud School, and his new teacher, Mr. Werber, says that he is a very good Hebrew scholar. He also speaks German and a little English.

A Curious Circular Has Been Issued in Iowa. A copy sent to the office of this journal, signed by the Prior of a Roman Catholic Abbey, invites subscriptions toward the removal of a heavy debt on the edifice. As an inducement to subscribe, the Prior offers a peculiar kind of premium graduated according to the amount of the contribution. He states that two daily masses, one for the living and one for the dead, will be celebrated every day for fifty years. Any person contributing a hundred dollars "will participate in the fruits" of those masses during the whole of the half century. Persons contributing smaller sums will participate for shorter periods. One dollar will purchase the benefit for six months. It is extraordinary that in this age of enlightenment and in the most highly educated nation under the sun a proposal of such a nature, fit only for the dark ages, should have been issued. It is evident that evangelical ministers as well as laymen have a great work still before them.

A Mormon Sunday-School Superintendent in Utah, writing to the American Tract Society, acknowledges his obligation under God to the publications of that society. A colporteur placed in the Sunday-school library about forty volumes, "and these," says the superintendent, "I concluded would be dangerous if they were within the reach of the children. And of course they should be taken from the library, but what to do with them I did not know. I did not like to burn them, and I would not sell them. So at last I concluded to give them away, which I did, with the exception of a few which I considered harmless ; these I kept myself. In this way God used my evil intentions to scatter these precious volumes among the people. Otherwise they might have lain unused in the Sunday-school library. Now as for the volumes that I kept myself. They were lying around for some time, and although read occasionally, they were not appreciated until the Lord in His infinite grace opened my eyes to His truth, and converted my soul. Then these volumes became very precious in my sight, and undoubtedly the reading of them was used by the Lord to aid in my conversion."

A Curious Vagary of the Telephone is Reported from Chicago. On Thursday evening, March 29th, for above an hour all who had occasion to use the telephone found it vibrating to musical tones. Private and public telephones, and even the police and fire-alarm instruments, were alike affected. The source of the music was a mystery until the following day, when it was learned that a telegraph wire, which passes near most of the telephone wires, was connected with the harmonic system; that tunes were being played over it, and that the telephone wires took up the sounds by induction. If one wire carrying sweet sounds from place to place could so affect another wire by simply being near to it, how ought Christians in communication with their Father in heaven to affect all with whom they come in contact in the world. The divine music of love and gentleness in their lives should be a blessing to society (Acts 4 : 13).

A Farmer was Surprised by a Strange Sight recently. He lives near Monticello, and on going to his barn one morning lately to feed his stock he was astonished to see quietly feeding with the cattle a large white doe. The moment the stranger perceived the farmer's presence, she became alarmed and endeavored to get away. Her fright, however, prevented her leaving in the same way as she entered, and she commenced a series of wild but ineffectual leaps. At last she fell heavily, her leg being broken, when the farmer mercifully ended her suffering with his shotgun. The moral this incident teaches may be profitably studied by Christians who are fond of worldly amusements, which they often declare to be harmless. The sons of God ought not to seek their pleasure or to find gratification among those who are yet in bondage to Satan. (2 Cor. 6 : 14-17.)

A Dog Succeeded in Rescuing his Canine companion from drowning at Newburgh, recently. The Newburgh Journal says: "A little dog fell off the docks the other day into an open place in the ice, and bade fair to drown; but a large dog, which saw the occurrence, leaped in after him. The large animal took hold of the small one and kept him up, but after paddling about in the water some time, found no place where they could get out. Some persons who were looking on then came to the rescue. They let Mr. Donoghue's boat bridge down to the surface of the water, and the large dog swam there and both were assisted out." This rescue was on a principle similar to that which operates in the rescue of lost sinners. All that men could do for their fellow-men would be of no avail, if Christ's work, His life and death, had not made a bridge by which all men can approach God (Rom. 5 : 2).

A Buffalo Man's Voyage of Pleasure has Come near ending in his death. A sailor named Gilfoy, a native of Buffalo, N. Y., set sail from San Francisco in a small sailing boat, saying that he was going to Australia on a voyage of pleasure. He took no one with him, and predictions were freely hazarded among those who knew of his adventure that he would never be heard of again. He has, however, been heard from twice. The first time from a homeward bound ship from Tahiti, which passed him nearly three months after he left San Francisco, and whose captain gave him his correct bearings and some fruit. Gilfoy's chief complaint then was of sharks which at night prevented him sleeping by striking the boat, and he had been compelled to put up a scarecrow to frighten them. His subsequent adventures are published in an Australian paper just received. His boat it appears was twice capsized, and was once pierced by a sword fish. A day came when his provisions were all gone, his water nearly spent, and his rudder having been washed away he was steering with a makeshift. Then he gave up hope, and let his boat drift with the current, careless where he went. He had been at sea five months, and he despaired of ever seeing land again. But that day he was seen by a passing vessel, was rescued and taken to Australia. How many young people there are setting out on the voyage of life who look forward to it as "a voyage of pleasure," yet who, as they have not taken God and His word as their guide, are likely to undergo a spiritual experience of which Gilfoy's voyage is a fit type (Prov. 3 : 1-10).

A Futile Rescue from a Burning House was effected recently at Peru, Ind. When the fire alarm was sent out, several brave men went to assist in the work of extinguishing the flames and rescuing any of the inmates who might be in danger. It was known that one man was still in the burning building after all the other inmates had been brought out. Two men volunteered to search for the poor fellow whose life was in danger. They entered, and at great risk, brought him out unconscious and half suffocated. As he recovered consciousness in the fresh air, he asked frantically for his money, and learning that it had not been saved, he broke away from his rescuers and returned to the burning house. When his charred body was found, after the fire was over, a number of loose coins under it, showed that he had reached his treasure but had not been able to carry it away. There is reason for fear that many who have been under conviction of sin, and who might have been converted, have returned into the world impelled by avarice, and have there sacrificed their souls to save their money (Luke 17 : 32).

At a Wedding in a Virginia Church an Arrangement in the decorations was made which was very significant. Miss Jennie B. Shepherd was to be married to Mr. H. A. Tabb. The church was tastefully decorated, and over the altar there was a monogram of gas jets, in which the initials of the bride and bridegroom were gracefully entwined. The ceremony commenced soon after sunset, and the brilliantly lighted church, with its centrepiece of the luminous monogram conspicuous, looked very bright as the wedding party entered. Dr. Murdaugh having read the first part of the marriage ceremony, the father gave away the bride. After this they advanced to the altar, where the ceremony was concluded. Just as the clergyman made the bride and bridegroom man and wife, the letter "S" in the monogram was turned out, leaving alone the letter "T," reminding all present of the fact that the name of the bride had been changed from Shepherd to Tabb. The incident was prettily suggestive rather than practically useful. One can but wish that by some means a reminder might be constantly before the eyes of Christians who profess to have become members of Christ's bride, that henceforth they forget honors, social distinctions and all they formerly held dear, and merge them all in the one name of Christian (Phil. 3 : 8).

A Dissolute Officer, who is not to be Discharged, is in one of the regiments on service in the West. He is a man of brilliant talents as a soldier and a writer for the press, but his moral character is so bad that his friends have lost hope of his reclamation. As a final resort, he was given a position as wagon-master, where it was hoped that severe discipline and removal from the haunts of civilization would effect a cure. On his arrival in Montana he indulged in some characteristic displays. The general in command of the post wrote to Washington in complaint of this unexpected assignment to his command, and asked the immediate discharge of the officer. The letter was referred to the General of the Army, on whose recommendation the appointment had been made. General Sherman read it, and returned it with a characteristic indorsement, somewhat as follows: "This man was appointed for the purpose of developing the latent good that is in him. Let him be subjected to a severe course of discipline. Send him to jail, put a ball and chain on him, shoot him if necessary, but don't discharge him." It would appear from this order that a stubborn attempt is to be made to effect a reformation by force, but those who know most of these cases will not be sanguine as to the result. Solomon writes of a war (Eccles. 8 : 8), in which, too, there is no discharge, and sinners may be assured that in that struggle God will certainly be the victor.

THE LORD'S LITTLE CHILDREN.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"I write unto you, little children, because your sins are forgiven you for his name's sake."—1 John 2 : 12.

"I have written unto you, little children, because ye know the Father."—1 John 2 : 13. (Revised Version.)

A Significant Change of Tense—The Three Classes in the Church—Well to Join the Infant Class—Who the Little Children Are—The Newly Converted—I. Their Privilege—Forgiven Sin—Only the Entrance Blessing—Yet Complete—On the Same Terms as the Apostles—Commands to Follow—II. Their Knowledge—Obtained Early—Includes Love—Trust—Imitation—III. Precepts for Them—Sin Not—Avoid Fickleness—Abide in Him—Be not Deceived—Love Each Other—Keep from Idols—Toys in the Church.

Probably you ask, "Why does John say first, 'I write,' and then, 'I have written'?" There is a beautiful touch of nature in this speedy change of tense. John was an extremely old man, and therefore while he says, "I write," he adds, "I have written," as if he felt that it might be the last time that he should take his pen in hand. Very soon with him the present tense would change into the past, and he indicates the fact by changing his mode of speech. Perhaps he even felt that possibly before the letter reached the brethren to whom he addressed it he would be no more among the sons of men. Therefore he says, "I write," indicating that while he was still with them, with warm and loving heart he solemnly exhorted them; and then he adds, "I have written," as if he had recorded his dying testimony, and left it as his last legacy of love. To us, to-day, John's words run altogether in the past tense—"I have written;" but we need not therefore forget that they were the well-considered words of a venerated father in Christ, and that he wrote them as one so near to his departure that he regarded himself as already on the move, and therefore scarcely knew which tense to use. Ah, my brethren, how soon our "I speak" will change into "I have spoken:" let this invest every word with solemnity.

Remember also what order of man John was—that disciple whom Jesus loved, whose head had leaned on Jesus' bosom, whose eyes had seen the King in His beauty, and whose strengthened gaze had looked within the gates of pearl. This is he who at one time saw the pierced heart of the Well-beloved pouring forth blood and water; and at another beheld the Lion of the tribe of Judah prevail to take the book and loose the seven seals thereof. It is the apostle of love who says to us, "I write to you," "I have written to you."

Observe that our text is addressed to the "little children." It is thought by many wise interpreters that under this term John includes the whole Church of God, and that afterward he divides that church into two companies—the fathers and the young men; those who under one aspect are all "little children," are under another regarded as young men or fathers. There is a sense in which every Christian is still a little child, a sense in which he ought to be so, ever dependent upon the great Father, ever ready to receive the word of the Father without questioning, ever teachable, ever restful in the Father's care, and full of love to Him who is his all in all. Of necessity we must ever be children before God; for our finite capacity is so limited that we are mere babes in knowledge in the presence of Infinite wisdom, and as very sucklings in understanding when contrasted with the great Father of spirits.

It may do us all good to

this morning, or, at least, to sit with the boys in the school of grace. Even those who have made the greatest advances in divine grace may do well to "become as little children," that they may still more fully enter into the kingdom of heaven, and have closer fellowship with "the holy child Jesus." It may even be an advance for some who have grown self-willed as they have advanced in knowledge if they will say with David, "Surely I have behaved and quieted myself, as a child that is weaned of his mother; my soul is even as a weaned child." Happy childhood! when it means entire submission to the Father, and sweet delight in His will.

Still, I am inclined to think that in this case John really does divide the entire church into three classes—the babes in grace, or the children, or as one of the words might properly be translated, the boys—those who have not long been born into the family; these are an interesting company. Then follow the young men; these are the second class, and a valued body of Christians they are, in the fulness of their vigor; strong in faith, giving glory to God; mighty in prayer; vehement in action, bold in testimony. May the Lord muster among our hosts a grand array of these vigorous heroes who shall earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints.

THE FIGHTING POWER OF THE CHURCH

militant must come out of them; these are they that turn the battle to the gate. Blessed is the man that hath his quiver full of them.

Then there is the third class; the fathers, the mature, the experienced; these do not quite so much delight in war as the young men do, but at home they diligently care for the household of faith, watching over the feeble, strengthening and comforting them; these are able by their experience to answer gainsayers, to edify the untaught, and to guide the ignorant. Their knowledge is deep, and they are, therefore, able to become teachers of others; they are men of spiritual force, and have come to the full stature of men in Christ Jesus, therefore they are the solid strength of the church. If the young men are the church's arm, these are the church's backbone. We need to have many such, though alas, it is to be feared that our churches are much like the apostolic ones, of which Paul said, "Ye have not many fathers."

This morning I am going to say nothing at all to the young men, nor to the fathers, except so far as they are willing to include themselves under the term of "little children;" and, as we have already said, there is just reason why they should do so. Little children, it is to you I speak this day; I mean you that have newly been converted, whose first cries of repentance are still in our ears. You, I mean, whose grace is feeble; who are new to everything in the house of God, and as yet need to be fed with the milk of simple elementary truth; you are the little children, dear to the whole family.

To you I shall speak this morning, as the Holy Spirit shall enable me. I would say these things to you: First, observe your privilege—"I write unto you, little children, because your sins are forgiven you." Then, note your knowledge—"I have written unto you, little children, because ye know, or have known, the Father." And thirdly, consider the precepts addressed to you. When we get to that point I shall ask you to refer to your Bibles that we may run through the whole of this epistle and see what John has to say to little children. May we receive the word with meekness, that we may grow thereby.

I. First, I want the babes in grace, the weak in faith, the lambs of the flock, to notice

THEIR PRIVILEGE.

"I write unto you, little children, because your sins are forgiven you for His name's sake." This is a privilege extremely desired by the little children. They have but lately felt the burden of guilt; they still smart under the lashes of conscience; the Spirit of God has but newly convinced them of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment; and, therefore, above everything, their prayer is, "Father, forgive me." To them the remission of sins stands out as the first and most desirable of all blessings; and truly they are right in their estimate; for what possession is there which can be called a blessing at all until sin be forgiven? It matters not how healthy a man may be; if his conscience be worried with his sin his inmost heart is sick. It is small comfort to him to have all the comforts of this life if his heart feels the gnawings of the undying worm of conscious guilt. "God be merciful to me a sinner," comes often from his breast as he beats upon it in the deep humiliation of his soul; for joy and rest there can be none to him till he hears the word, "The Lord hath put away thy sin; thou shalt not die." This assurance is as sweet to you as a seraph's song. I could not have told you a better piece of news. Far be it from me to stay your holy joy, and yet the Lord will show you greater things than these.

At your stage of experience pardon is the most prominent blessing of the covenant. A newly converted man does not know much about sanctification or union to Christ; perhaps he does not know much about election, calling, or sealing; but the principal point he dwells upon is pardon. Well, beloved child, many more blessings await you; pardon is but an entrance blessing, a welcome at the doorstep; there are rarer joys within the house. You have become an heir to a boundless inheritance; all things are yours; heaven, and Christ, and God are yours; yet I marvel not that at present all your heart is taken up with a sense of pardoned sin. I will not disturb you, but I will rejoice with you. I will even sit down and sing with you; let this be our hymn:

"Now, oh joy! my sins are pardon'd,
Now I can, and do believe;
All I have, and am, and shall be,
To my precious Lord I give."

Even the full-grown child of God highly values this boon so dear to little children, and although he has recived many other mercies beside, yet still it is a chief part of his joy that he has been cleansed from sin and clothed with righteousness. Ay, and our elder brothers, who are now in the king's country, this is a chief point even with them, that they have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb; therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve Him day and night in His temple. Yes, dear little children, you have obtained a most precious favor in which you do well to rejoice; "your sins are forgiven you for His name's sake."

Here let me observe that the forgiveness of sins is assuredly the possession of the new beginner in the divine life. He is as certainly forgiven as he ever shall be. The forgiveness of sins is not a matter of degrees or of growth. It is done in an instant, and done forever, never to be reversed. The child of God who was born but yesterday is not as completely sanctified as he will be; he is not as completely instructed as he will be; he is not as completely conformed to the image of Christ as he will be; but he is as

as the full-grown saint. Your iniquities are subdued by the Lord Jesus, who has come to save His people from their sins. Therefore, little children, praise your God, and sing unto His name with all your might—"Who forgiveth all our iniquities; who healeth all our diseases."

Note, also, that your sins are forgiven you on the same terms as those of the Apostle, and the greatest of the saints: "Your sins are forgiven you for His name's sake"; that is, for the sake of Jesus, for the sake of His glorious person, for the sake of His honorable offices, for the sake of His blood-shedding and atoning death, for the sake of His glorious resurrection, for the sake of His perpetual intercession before the throne of God. Your sins are not forgiven you because of anything you are or hope to be, nor because of anything that you have done or have suffered; you are forgiven for Christ's name's sake, and all the saints of God can say the same. This is a sure ground of hope. Quicksand there is none, but a solid rock is under our foot. Had the pardon been granted for our own work's sake, it might have been reversed upon our disobedience; but as sin is pardoned for Christ's sake, the pardon is irreversible, since there is no change in Christ

II. Secondly, I have to speak of

of these little children. "I have written unto you, little children, because ye have known, or know, the Father." The tiniest babe in the family of God knows the Father. For, first, as we have seen, his sins are forgiven him. By whom is that pardon given? Why, by the Father; and, therefore, he that has had his sins forgiven him necessarily knows the Father. When the poor prodigal felt the kisses of his father's love, and saw the best robe adorning his person, then he knew the Father. All the philosophers in the world do not know so much of the Father God as a forgiven sinner knows.

Moreover, this is a piece of knowledge, dear friends, which the child of God obtains very early in his spiritual life; for, whatever a child does not know, he knows his father. Think of your dear little one at home; he cannot as yet read a letter in the book; he knows nothing of the things which his elder brother studies; but he knows his father. He may not know very much about his father; he could not certainly speak to others about his father's business or his father's wealth, but yet he knows him. The child cannot help his father, or understand what his father does; but he knows his father, and would choose him out from among a thousand. See how his eyes twinkle now that father has come home; see him stretch out his little hands; see how eager he is to get into these dear arms! He knows his father, and never forgets that knowledge. Dear child of God, this is a piece of knowledge which you have also; and in this you will yield to none of all the sacred family.
